Counties

PREFATORY.

TO PERSONS without experience, the chronicling of events covering a period of hardly more than four decades and all of which is within the memories of living men may seem an easy task, but let the attempt be made and quickly will the illusion be dispelled. While early pioneer peoples possess remarkably retentive memories and recall events many years past with wonderful vividness and fidelity to truth, Mnemosyne seldom takes notes of initials, dates, the spelling of names and other minutiae essential to the historian's purpose. His chief reliance for these must ever be the printed page. There is no way known to the writer of discovering the full truth in regard to events which happened years ago but to find printed, contemporaneous accounts, and even when this is possible we cannot be sure that we are in possession of absolutely reliable information, for contemporaneous writers often err or view events with eyes partially blinded by prejudice or partisan bias. Where there is a multiplicity of conflicting authorities the task of weighing the relative value to be attached to each and of arriving at the truth or a close approximation thereto is always a delicate one and vexatious enough; but the most trying situation in which the historian finds himself is that which arises when no authorities whatsoever are to be found. Too often no printed accounts of any kind preserve for us the earliest history, and when records do exist their hiding-places cannot always be discovered. The happenings of a county are not chronicled in voluminous official reports as are the larger affairs of state and nation. The public acts of county and city officers are of course matters of record, but of events occurring among the people at large and developments incident to restless private enterprise, we have as a rule no account except such as is furnished by the dauntless pioneer newspaper men or can be gleaned from reminiscences of actual participants. The work of the former is often obliterated and ruined by fire or other destructive forces, while death and human frailty war against the latter source of information. Such being some of the difficulties under which the work herewith presented was prepared, it cannot be hoped that it is altogether free from errors. It is, however, the result of painstaking research, and we hope that it will, in part, at least, meet the expectations of those who have given it the encouragement of their patronage.

In the preparation of this work we have had occasion to interview many of the prominent citizens of Klickitat, Yakima and Kittitas counties, and it is with feelings of gratitude that we testify that these ladies and gentlemen have uniformly treated us with courtesy, freely imparting such information as they were able. It is impossible to acknowledge, except in a general way, all favors received, but the thanks of the company are due especially to the committees of pioneers who have read, or listened to the reading, of manuscript copies of the various county histories, calling attention to such errors and omissions as their intimate personal experiences in the affairs of these counties enabled them to discover. Special acknowledgments are also due to the following newspapers for the use of their files, namely: The Yakima Herald, The Yakima Republic, The Sunnyside Sun, The Goldendale Sentinel, The Klickitat County Agriculturist, The Ellensburg Dawn, The Ellensburg Localizer, The Ellensburg Capital, The Cascade Miner and The Cle-Elum Echo. The thanks of the compilers are likewise extended to Robert A. Turner, personally, for substantial assistance in many ways, to F. Dorsey Schnebly and Mrs. David J. Schnebly for the use of old Localizer files; to Thomas L. Gamble for his valuable diary; to the various county and state officials for numerous courtesies; to the United States Geological Survey for the gift of many valuable publications; to George N. Tuesley, Walter N. Granger, Jay A. Lynch, Alexander E. McCredy, the various photographers of the three counties, especially F. J. Tickner of North Yakima, O. W. Pautzke of Ellensburg, W. P. Flanary of Goldendale, H. B. Carratt of Centerville, and to Kiser Bros., of Portland, for photographs to use in illustrating the work.

ENDORSEMENTS.

The undersigned pioneer citizens of Klickitat county hereby certify that they have, as a committee, read carefully, while still in manuscript form, the history of said county, prepared and to be published by the Interstate Publishing Company, of Spokane; that they have given its compilers the benefit of such knowledge of the subject as has come to them by reason of long residence in the county and active participation in its development and the events which have happened within its borders; also that they have found the said history of Klickitat county accurate, impartial, comprehensive and in every sense reliable: hence are prepared to give it their unqualified endorsement as a standard work.

S. H. JONES.
E. W. PIKE.
GEO. W. MCCREDY.

We, the undersigned, pioneer citizens of Yakima county, Washington, hereby certify:

First.—That we have been for many years active participants in the affairs of said county and are thoroughly familiar with events that have transpired within its borders.

Second.—That we have carefully gone over the history of said county, compiled by William Sidney Shiach and to be published by the Interstate Publishing Company, of Spokane; also, that we have assisted its author in making a thorough final revision of the same.

Third.—That we have found the said history a well-arranged, well-written, truthful, comprehensive and impartial record of events, and we give it our unqualified endorsement as a standard work on the subject.

LEONARD L. THORP.
DAVID LONGMIRE.
J. P. MARKS.

The undersigned hereby certify that they are pioneer citizens of Kittitas county, Washington, and that they have been active participants for many years in the affairs of said county; hence believe themselves familiar with the principal events in its history. They certify further that they have revised the manuscript history of said county, prepared and to be published by the Interstate Publishing Company, of Spokane, calling the attention of its editor to such slight errors and omissions as their knowledge of the facts have enabled them to discover; also that they have found the said history of Kittitas county evidently fair and impartial toward all interests, comprehensive in its scope, logical in arrangement, pleasing in style, accurate and conservative in statement and in all respects an authentic work.

PART I.

INTRODUCTORY

CHAPTER I.

EXPLORATIONS BY WATER.

The opening of a new century is a fitting time to glance backward and reconstruct to the eye of the present the interesting and heroic events of the past, that by comparison between past and present the trend of progress may be traced and the future in a measure forecasted.

No matter what locality in the Northwest we may treat historically, we are compelled in our search for the beginnings of its story to go back to the old, misty Oregon territory, with its isolation, its pathos, its wild chivalry, its freedom and hospitality. Strange indeed is its earliest history, when, shrouded in uncertainty and misapprehension, it formed the ignis fatuus of the explorer, "luring him on with that indescribable fascination which seems always to have drawn men to the ever receding circle of the 'westmost west.'"

Shortly after the time of Columbus, attempts began to be made to reach the western ocean and solve the mystery of the various passages supposed to lead to Asia.

In 1500 Gasper Cortereal conceived the idea of finding a northern strait, to which he gave the name "Anian," and this mythical channel received much attention from these early navigators, some of whom even went so far as to claim that they had passed through it and had reached another ocean. Among the captains making this bold claim was Juan de Fuca. He is said to have been a Greek of Cephalonia whose real name was Apostolos Valerianos, and it is claimed that when he made his discovery he was in the service of the Spanish nation. Michael Lock tells his story in the following language:

"He followed his course, in that voyage, west and northwest in the South sea, all along the coast of Nova Spania and California and the Indies, now called North America (all which voyage he signified to me in a great map, and a sea card of my own, which I laid before him), until he came to the latitude of forty-seven degrees; and that, there finding that the land trended north and northwest, with a broad inlet of sea, between forty-seven and forty-eight degrees of latitude, he entered thereinto, sailing more than twenty days, and found that land still trending northwest, and northeast, and north, and also east and southeastward, and very much broader sea than it was at the said entrance, and that he passed by divers islands in that sailing; and that, at the entrance of said strait, there is, on the northwest coast thereof, a great headland or island, with an exceeding high pinnacle or spired rock, like a pillar, thereupon. Also he said that he went on land in divers places, and that he saw some people on the land clad in beasts' skins; and that the land was very fruitful and rich in gold, silver and pearls and other things, like Nova Spania. Also he said that he, being entered thus far into the said strait, and being come into the North sea already and finding the sea wide enough everywhere, and to be about thirty or forty leagues wide in the mouth of the straits where he entered, he thought he had now well discharged his office; and that not being armed to resist the force of savage people that might happen, he therefore set sail and turned homeward again toward Nova Spania, where he arrived at Acapulco, anno 1592, hoping to be rewarded by the viceroy for this service done in the said voyage."

The curious thing about this and some of the other legends is the general accuracy of the descriptions given by these old mariners. Professor W. D. Lyman thinks it is not impossible that they had either visited the Pacific coast in person or had seen other pilots who had, and that thus they gathered the material from which they fabricated their Munchausen tales.

Many years passed after the age of myth before there were authentic voyages. During the seventeenth century practically nothing was done in the way of Pacific coast explorations, but in the eighteenth, as by common consent, all the nations of Europe became suddenly infatuated again with the thought that on the western shores of America might be found the gold and silver and gems and furs and precious woods for which they had been striving so desperately upon the eastern coast. English, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, Russians and Americans entered their bold and hardy sailors into the race for the possession of the land of the occident. The Russians were the first in the field, that gigantic power, which the genius of Peter the Great, like one of the fabled genii, had suddenly transformed from the proportions of a grain of sand to a figure overtopping the whole earth, and which had stretched its arms from the Baltic to the Aleutian archipelago, and had looked southward across the frozen seas of Siberia to the open Pacific as offering another opportunity of expansion. Many years passed, however, before Peter's designs could be executed. It was 1728 when Vitus Behring entered upon his marvelous life of exploration. Not until 1741, however, did he thread the thousand islands of Alaska and gaze upon the glaciated summit of Mount Elias. And it was not until thirty years later that it was known that the Bay of Avatscha in Siberia was connected by open sea with China. In 1771 the first cargo of furs was taken directly from Avatscha, the chief port of eastern Siberia, to Canton. Then first Europe realized the vastness of the Pacific ocean. Then it understood that the same waters which frowned against the frozen bulwarks of Kamchatka washed the tropic islands of the South seas and foamed against the storm-swept rocks of Cape Horn.

Meanwhile, while Russia was thus becoming established upon the shores of Alaska, Spain was getting entire possession of California. These two great nations began to overlap each other, Russians becoming established near San Francisco. To offset this movement of Russia, a group of Spanish explorers, Perez, Martinez, Heceta, Bodega and Maurelle, swarmed up the coast beyond the site of the present Sitka.

England, in alarm at the progress made by Spain and Russia, sent out the Columbus of the eighteenth century, in the person of Captain James Cook, and he sailed up and down the coast of Alaska and of Washington, but failed to discover either the Columbia river or the Straits of Fuca.

His labors, however, did more to establish true geographical notions than had the combined efforts of all the Spanish navigators who had preceded him. His voyages materially strengthened England's claim to Oregon, and added greatly to the luster of her name. The great captain, while temporarily on shore, was killed by Indians in 1778, and the command devolved upon Captain Clark, who sailed northward, passing through Behring strait to the Arctic ocean. The new commander died before the expedition had proceeded far on its return journey; Lieutenant Gore, a Virginian, assumed control and sailed to Canton, China, arriving late in the year.

The main purposes of this expedition had been the discovery of a northern waterway between the two oceans and the extending of British territory, but, as is so often the case in human affairs, one of the most important results of the voyage was entirely unsuspected by the navigators and practically the outcome of an accident. It so happened that the two vessels of the expedition, the Revolution and the Discovery, took with them to China a small collection of furs from the northwest coast of America. These were purchased by the Chinese with great avidity, the people exhibiting a willingness to barter commodities of much value for them and endeavoring to secure them at almost any sacrifice. The sailors were not backward in communicating their discoveries of a new and promising market for peltries, and the impetus imparted to the fur trade was almost immeasurable in its ultimate effects. An entirely new regime was inaugurated in Chinese and East Indian commerce. The northwest coast of America assumed a new importance in the eyes of Europeans, and especially of the British. The "struggle for possession" soon began to be foreshadowed.

One of the principal harbors resorted to by fur-trading vessels was Nootka, used as a rendezvous and principal port of departure. This port became the scene of a clash between Spanish authorities and certain British vessels, which greatly strained the friendly relations existing between the two governments represented. In 1779, the viceroy of Mexico sent two ships, the Princess and the San Carlos, to convey Martinez and De Haro to the vicinity for the purpose of anticipating and preventing the occupancy of Nootka sound by fur traders of other nations, and that the Spanish title to the territory might be maintained and confirmed. Martinez was to base his claim upon the discovery by Perez in 1774. Courtesy was to be extended to foreign vessels, but the establishment of any claim prejudicial to the right of the Spanish crown was to be vigorously resisted.

Upon the arrival of Martinez in the harbor, it was discovered that the American vessel, Columbia, and the Iphigenia, a British vessel, under a Portuguese flag, were lying in the harbor. Martinez at once demanded the papers of both vessels and an explanation of their presence, vigorously asserting the claim of Spain that the port and contiguous territory were hers. The captain of the Iphigenia pleaded stress of weather. On finding that the vessel's papers commanded the capture, under certain conditions, of Russian, Spanish or English vessels, Martinez seized the ship, but on being advised that the orders relating to captures were intended only to apply to the defense of the vessel, the Spaniard released the Iphigenia and her cargo. The Northwest America, another vessel of the same expedition, was, however, seized by Martinez a little later.

It should be remembered that these British vessels had, in the inception of the enterprise, divested themselves of their true national character and donned the insignia of Portugal, their reasons being: First, to defraud the Chinese government, which made special harbor rates to the Portuguese, and, second, to defraud the East India Company, to whom had been granted the right of trading in furs in northwest America to the exclusion of all other British subjects, except such as should obtain the permission of the company. To maintain their Portuguese nationality they had placed the expedition nominally under the control of Juan Cavalho, a Portuguese trader. Prior to the time of the trouble in Nootka, however, Cavalho had become a bankrupt and new arrangements had become necessary. The English traders were compelled to unite their interests with those of King George's Sound Company, a mercantile association operating under license from the South Sea and East India companies, the Portuguese colors had been laid aside, and the true national character of the expedition assumed. Captain Colnutt was placed in command of the enterprise as constituted under the new regime, with instructions, among other things, "to establish a factory to be called Fort Pitt, for the purpose of permanent settlement and as a center of trade around which other stations may be established."

One vessel of the expedition, the Princess Royal, entered Nootka harbor without molestation, but when the Argonaut, under command of Captain Colnutt, arrived, it was thought best by the master not to attempt an entrance to the bay, lest his vessel should meet the same fate which had befallen the Iphigenia and the Northwest America. Later Colnutt called on Martinez and informed the Spanish governor of his intention to take possession of the country in the name of Great Britain and to erect a fort. The governor replied that possession had already been taken in the name of His Catholic Majesty and that such acts as he (Colnutt) contemplated could not be allowed. An altercation followed and the next day the Argonaut was seized and her captain and crew placed under arrest. The Princess Royal was also seized, though the American vessels in the harbor were in no way molested.

After an extended and at times heated controversy between Spain and Great Britain touching these seizures, the former government consented to make reparation and offered a suitable apology for the indignity to the honor of the flag. The feature of this correspondence of greatest import in the future history of the territory affected is, that throughout the entire controversy and in all the royal messages and debates in parliament no word was spoken asserting a claim of Great Britain to any territorial rights or denying the claim of sovereignty so positively and persistently avowed by Spain, neither was Spanish sovereignty denied nor in any way alienated by the treaty which followed. Certain real property was restored to British subjects, but a transfer of realty under the circumstances could not be considered a transfer of sovereignty.

We pass over the voyage of the illustrious French navigator, La Perouse, as of more importance from a scientific than from a political view-point; neither can we dwell upon the explorations of Captain Berkley, to whom belongs the honor of having ascertained the existence of the strait afterwards denominated Juan de Fuca. Of somewhat greater moment in the later history of the Northwest are the voyages of Meares, who entered and described the above mentioned strait, and who, in 1788, explored the coast at the point where the great Columbia mingles its crystal current with the waters of the sea. In the diplomatic battle of later days it was even claimed that he was the discoverer of that great "River of the West." Howbeit, nothing can be surer than that the existence of such a river was utterly unknown to him at the time. Indeed, his conviction of its non-existence was thus stated in his own account of the voyage: "We can now with safety assert that there is no such river as the St. Roc (of the Spaniard, Heceta) exists as laid down on the Spanish charts," and he gave a further unequivocal expression of his opinion by naming the bay in that vicinity Deception bay and the promontory north of it Cape Disappointment. "Disappointed and deceived," remarks Evans facetiously, "he continued his cruise southward to latitude forty-five degrees north."

It is not without sentiments of patriotic pride that we now turn our attention to a period of discovery in which the vessels of our own nation played a prominent part. The northern mystery, which had been partially resolved by the Spanish, English, French and Portuguese explorations, was now to be completely robbed of its mystic charm; speculation and myth must now give place to exact knowledge; the game of discovery must hereafter be played principally between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, and Anglo-Saxon energy, thoroughness and zeal are henceforth to characterize operations on the shores of the Pacific Northwest. The United States had but recently won their independence from the British crown and their energies were finding a fit field of activity in the titanic task of national organization. Before the constitution had become the supreme law of the land, however, the alert mind of the American had begun projecting voyages of discovery and trade to the Northwest, and in September, 1788, two vessels with the stars and stripes at their mastheads arrived at Nootka sound. Their presence in the harbor while the events culminating in the Nootka treaty were transpiring has already been alluded to. The vessels were the ship Columbia, Captain John Kendrick, and the sloop Washington, Captain Robert Gray, and the honor of having sent them to our shores belongs to one Joseph Barrel, a prominent merchant of Boston, and a man of high social standing and great influence. While one of the impelling motives of this enterprise had been the desire of commercial profit, the element of patriotism was not wholly lacking, and the vessels were instructed to make whatever explorations and discoveries they might.

After remaining a time on the coast, Captain Kendrick transferred the ship's property to the Washington, with the intention of taking a cruise in that vessel. He placed Captain Gray in command of the Columbia with instructions to return to Boston by way of the Sandwich islands and China. This commission was successfully carried out. The vessel arrived in Boston in September, 1790, was received with great eclat, refitted by her owners and again despatched to the shores of the Pacific with Captain Gray in command. In July, 1791, the Columbia, from Boston, and the Washington, from China, met not far from the spot where they had separated nearly two years before. They were not to remain long in company, for Captain Gray soon started on a cruise southward. On April 29, 1792, Gray met Vancouver just below Cape Flattery and an interesting colloquy took place. Vancouver communicated to the American skipper the fact that he had not yet made any important discoveries, and Gray, with equal frankness, gave the eminent British explorer an account of his past discoveries, "including," says Bancroft, "the fact that he had not sailed through Fuca strait in the Lady Washington, as had been supposed from Meares' narrative and map." He also informed Captain Vancouver that he had been "off the mouth of a river in latitude forty-six degrees, ten minutes, where the outset, or reflux, was so strong as to prevent his entrance for nine days."

The important information conveyed by Gray seems to have greatly disturbed the equipoise of Vancouver's mind. The entries in his log show that he did not entirely credit the statement of the American, but that he was considerably perturbed is evinced by the fact that he tried to convince himself by argument that Gray's statement could not have been correct. The latitude assigned by the American is that of Cape Disappointment, and the existence of a river mouth there, though affirmed by Heceta, had been denied by Meares; Captain Cook had also failed to find it; besides, had he not himself passed that point two days before and had he not observed that "if any inlet or river should be found it must be a very intricate one and inaccessible to vessels of our burden, owing to the reefs and broken water which then appeared in its neighborhood." With such reasoning, he dismissed the matter from his mind for the time being. He continued his journey northward, passed through the strait of Fuca, and engaged in a thorough and minute exploration of that mighty inland sea, to a portion of which he gave the name of Puget sound.

Meanwhile Gray was proceeding southward "in the track of destiny and glory." On May 7th he entered the harbor which now bears his name, and four days later he passed through the breakers and over the bar, and his vessel's prow plowed the waters of that famous "River of the West," whose existence had been so long suspected. The storied "Oregon" for the first time heard other sound than "its own dashing."

Shortly afterward Vancouver came to Cape Disappointment to explore the Columbia, of which he had heard indirectly from Captain Gray. Lieutenant Broughton, of Vancouver's expedition, sailed over the bar, ascended the river a distance of more than one hundred miles to the site of the present Vancouver, and with a modesty truly remarkable, took "possession of the river and the country in its vicinity in His Britannic Majesty's name, having every reason to believe that the subjects of no other civilized nation or state had ever entered it before." This, too, though he had received a salute of one gun from an American vessel, the Jennie, on his entrance to the bay. The lieutenant's claim was not to remain forever unchallenged, as will appear presently.

CHAPTER II.

EXPLORATIONS BY LAND.

With the exploration of Puget sound and the discovery of the Columbia, history-making maritime adventure practically ceased. But as the fabled strait of Anian had drawn explorers to the Pacific shores in quest of the mythical passage to the treasures of Ind, so likewise did the fairy tales of La Hontan and others stimulate inland exploration. Furthermore, the mystic charm always possessed by a terra incognita was becoming irresistible to adventurous spirits, and the possibilities of discovering untold wealth in the vaults of its "Shining mountains" and in the sands of its crystal rivers were exceedingly fascinating to the lover of gain.

The honor of pioneering in overland exploration belongs to one Verendrye, who, under authority of the governor-general of New France, in 1773 set out on an expedition to the Rocky mountains from Canada. This explorer and his brother and sons made many important explorations, but as they failed to find a pass through the Rocky mountains, by which they could come to the Pacific side, their adventures do not fall within the purview of our volume. They are said to have reached the vicinity of the present city of Helena.

If, as seems highly probable, the events chronicled by Le Page in his charming "Histoire de la Louisiane," published in 1758, should be taken as authentic, the first man to scale the Rocky mountains from the east and to make his way overland to the shores of the Pacific was a Yazoo Indian, Moncacht-ape, or Moncachabe, by name. But "the first traveler to lead a party of civilized men through the territory of the Stony mountains to the South sea" was Alexander Mackenzie, who, in 1793, reached the coast at fifty-two degrees, twenty-four minutes, forty-eight seconds north, leaving as a memorial of his visit, inscribed on a rock with vermilion and grease, the words, "Alexander Mackenzie, from Canada by land, July 22, 1793." His field of discovery was also without the scope of our purpose, being too far north to figure prominently in the international complications of later years.

Western exploration by land had, however, elicited the interest of one whose energy and force were sufficient to bring to a successful issue almost any undertaking worth the effort. While the other statesmen and legislators of his time were fully engaged with the problems of the moment, the great mind of Thomas Jefferson, endowed as it was with a wider range of vision and more comprehensive grasp of the true situation, was projecting exploring expeditions into the Northwest. In 1786, while serving as minister to Paris, he had fallen in with the ardent Ledyard, who was on fire with the idea of opening a large and profitable fur trade in the north Pacific region. To this young man he had suggested the idea of journeying to Kamchatka, then in a Russian vessel to Nootka sound, from which, as a starting point, he should make an exploring expedition eastward to the United States. Ledyard acted on the suggestion, but was arrested as a spy in the spring of 1787 by Russian officials and so severely treated as to cause a failure of his health and a consequent failure of his enterprise.

The next effort of Jefferson was made in 1792, when he proposed to the American Philosophical Society that it should engage a competent scientist "to explore northwest America from the eastward by ascending the Missouri, crossing the Rocky mountains and descending the nearest river to the Pacific ocean." The idea was favorably received. Captain Meriwether Lewis, who afterward distinguished himself as one of the leaders of the Lewis and Clarke expedition, offered his services, but for some reason Andre Michaux, a French botanist, was given the preference. Michaux proceeded as far as Kentucky, but there received an order from the French minister, to whom, it seems, he also owed obedience, that he should relinquish his appointment and engage upon the duties of another commission.

It was not until after the opening of a new century that another opportunity for furthering his favorite project presented itself to Jefferson. An act of congress, under which trading houses had been established for facilitating commerce with the Indians, was about to expire by limitation, and President Jefferson, in recommending its continuance, seized the opportunity to urge upon congress the advisability of fitting out an expedition, the object of which should be "to explore the Missouri river and such principal stream of it as, by its course of communication with the waters of the Pacific ocean, whether the Columbia, Oregon, Colorado or any other river, may offer the most direct and practical water communication across the continent, for the purpose of commerce."

Congress voted an appropriation for the purpose, and the expedition was placed in charge of Captains Meriwether Lewis and William Clarke. President Jefferson gave the explorers minute and particular instructions as to investigations to be made by them. They were to inform themselves, should they reach the Pacific ocean, "of the circumstances which may decide whether the furs of those parts may be collected as advantageously at the head of the Missouri (convenient as is supposed to the Colorado and Oregon or Columbia) as at Nootka sound or any other part of that coast; and the trade be constantly conducted through the Missouri and the United States more beneficially than by the circumnavigation now practiced." In addition to the instructions already quoted, these explorers were directed to ascertain if possible on arriving at the seaboard if there were any ports within their reach frequented by the sea vessels of any nation, and to send, if practicable, two of their most trusted people back by sea with copies of their notes. They were also, if they deemed a return by the way they had come imminently hazardous, to ship the entire party and return via Good Hope or Cape Horn, as they might be able.

A few days before the initial steps were taken in discharge of the instruction of President Jefferson, news reached the seat of government of a transaction which added materially to the significance of the enterprise. Negotiations had been successfully consummated for the purchase of Louisiana on April 30, 1803, but the authorities at Washington did not hear of the important transfer until the first of July. Of such transcendent import to the future of our country was this transaction and of such vital moment to the section with which our volume is primarily concerned, that we must here interrupt the trend of our narrative to give the reader an idea of the extent of territory involved, and, if possible, to enable him to appreciate the influence of the purchase. France, by her land explorations and the establishment of trading posts and forts, first acquired title to the territory west of the Mississippi and east of the Rocky mountains, though Great Britain claimed the territory in accordance with her doctrine of continuity and contiguity, most of her colonial grants extending in express terms to the Pacific ocean. Spain also claimed the country by grant of Pope Alexander VI. A constant warfare had been waged between France and Great Britain for supremacy in America. The latter was the winner in the contest, and, in 1762, France, apparently discouraged, ceded to Spain the province of Louisiana. By the treaty of February 10, 1763, which gave Great Britain the Canadas, it was agreed that the western boundary between English and Spanish possessions in America should be the Mississippi river, Great Britain renouncing all claims to the territory west of that boundary. In 1800 Spain retroceded Louisiana to France "with the same extent it has now in the hands of Spain and which it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be according to the treaties subsequently made between Spain and other states."

The order for the formal delivery of the province to France was issued by the Spanish king on October 15, 1802, and, as above stated, the United States succeeded to the title by treaty of April 30, 1803.

Exact boundaries had not been established at the time of the Louisiana purchase, but some idea of the vastness of the territory thereby acquired by the United States may be had when we consider that it extended from the present British line to the Gulf of Mexico and included what are now the states of Minnesota, North Dakota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas and Louisiana, the territory of Oklahoma, Indian territory, more than three-fourths of Montana and Wyoming, and parts of Colorado and New Mexico.

And so the Lewis and Clarke expedition, which had in its inception for its chief object to promote the commercial interests of the United States, acquired a new purpose, namely, the extending of geographical and scientific knowledge of our own domain. Upon its members a further duty devolved, that of informing the natives that obedience was now due to a new great father.

The expedition of Lewis and Clarke excited a peculiar interest at the time of its occurrence, and has since occupied a unique place in our history. The description of this expedition which follows is condensed from the writings upon the subject of Professor W. D. Lyman, of Whitman College, Walla Walla.

To our colonial ancestors, caged between the sea and the domains of hostile natives and rival colonies, afterward absorbed in a death struggle with the mother country, all the vast interior was a sealed book. And when the successful issue of the Revolutionary war permitted them to turn around and see where they were, still more when the great purchase of Louisiana from France enabled them to look toward the tops of the "Shining mountains" with a sense of proprietorship, all the romance and enthusiasm and excitement of exploration, hitherto sternly denied them by their narrow lot, seized and fascinated all classes.

On the 14th day of May, 1804, the Lewis and Clarke party left St. Louis by boat upon the muddy current of the Missouri, to search for the unknown mountains and rivers between that point and the Pacific. Their plan was to ascend the Missouri to its source, cross the divide, strike the headwaters of the Columbia, and, descending it, reach the sea.

And what manner of men were undertaking this voyage, fraught with both interest and peril? Meriwether Lewis, the leader of the party, was a captain in the United States army, and in Jefferson's judgment was, by reason of endurance, boldness and energy, the fittest man within his knowledge for the responsible duties of commander. His whole life had been one of reckless adventure. It appears that at the tender age of eight he was already illustrious for successful midnight forays upon the festive 'coon and the meditative 'possum. He was lacking in scientific knowledge, but when appointed captain of the expedition had, with characteristic pluck, spent a few spare weeks in study of some of the branches most essential to his new work. William Clarke, second in command, was also a United States officer, and seems to have been equally fitted with Lewis for his work. The party consisted of fourteen United States regulars, nine Kentucky volunteers, two French voyageurs, a hunter, an interpreter and a negro. To each of the common soldiers the government offered the munificent reward of retirement upon full pay with a recommendation for a soldier's grant of land. Special pains were taken to encourage the party to keep complete records of all they saw and heard and did. This was done with a vengeance, inasmuch that seven journals besides those of the leaders were carefully kept, and in them was recorded nearly every event from the most important discoveries down to the ingredients of their meals and doses of medicine. They were abundantly provided with beads, mirrors, knives, etc., wherewith to woo the savage hearts of the natives.

After an interesting and easy journey of five months, they reached the country of the Mandans, and here they determined to winter. The winter having been profitably spent in making the acquaintance of the Indians and in collecting specimens of the natural history of the plains—which they now sent back to the president with great care—they again embarked in a squad of six canoes and two pirogues. June 13th they reached the great falls of the Missouri.

A month was spent within sound of the thunder and in sight of the perpetual mist cloud rising from the abyss, before they could accomplish the difficult portage of eighteen miles, make new canoes, mend their clothes and lay in a new stock of provisions.

The long bright days, the tingling air of the mountains, the pleasant swish of the water as their canoes breasted the swift current, the vast campfires and the nightly buffalo roasts—all these must have made this the pleasantest section of their long journey.

The party seems to have pretty nearly exhausted its supply of names, and after having made heavy drafts on their own with various permutatory combinations, they were reduced to the extremity of loading innocent creeks with the ponderous names of Wisdom, Philosophy and Philanthropy. Succeeding generations have relieved the unjust pressure in two of these cases with the sounding appellations of Big Hole and Stinking Water.

On the 12th day of August the explorers crossed the great divide, the birthplace of mighty rivers, and descending the sunset slope, found themselves in the land of the Shoshones. They had brought with them a Shoshone woman, rejoicing in the pleasant name of Sacajawea, for the express purpose of becoming acquainted with this tribe, through whom they hoped to get horses and valuable information as to their proper route to the ocean. But four days were consumed in enticing the suspicious savages near enough to hear the words of their own tongue proceeding from the camp of the strangers. When, however, the fair interpreter had been granted a hearing, she speedily won for the party the faithful allegiance of her kinsmen. They innocently accepted the rather general intimation of the explorers that this journey had for its primary object the happiness and prosperity of the Shoshone nation, and to these evidences of benevolence on the part of their newly adopted great father at Washington, they quickly responded by bringing plenty of horses and all the information in their poor power.

It appears that the expedition was at that time on the headwaters of the Salmon river near where Fort Lemhi afterward stood. With twenty-nine horses to carry their abundant burdens, they bade farewell to the friendly Shoshones on the last day of August, and committed themselves to the dreary and desolate solitudes to the westward. They soon became entangled in the ridges and defiles, already spotted with snow, of the Bitter Root mountains.

Having crossed several branches of the great river, named in honor of Captain Clarke, and becoming distressed at the increasing dangers and delay, they turned to the left, and, having punished a brawling creek for its inhospitality by inflicting on it the name Colt Killed, commemorative of their extremity for food, they came upon a wild and beautiful stream. Inquiring the name of this from the Indians, they received the answer "Koskooskie." This in reality meant simply that this was not the stream for which they were searching. But not understanding, they named the river Koskooskie. This was afterward called the Clearwater, and is the most beautiful tributary of the Snake.

The country still frowned on them with the same forbidding rocky heights and snow-storms as before. It began to seem as though famine would ere long stare them in the face, and the shaggy precipices were marked with almost daily accidents to men and beasts. Their only meat was the flesh of their precious horses.

Under these circumstances Clarke decided to take six of the most active men and push ahead in search of game and a more hospitable country. A hard march of twenty miles rewarded him with a view of a vast open plain in front of the broken mountain chain across which they had been struggling. It was three days, however, before they fairly cleared the edge of the mountain and emerged on the great prairie north and east of where Lewiston now is. They found no game except a stray horse, which they speedily despatched. Here the advance guard waited for the main body to come up, and then altogether they went down to the Clearwater, where a large number of the Nez Perce Indians gathered to see and trade with them. Receiving from these Indians, who, like all that they had met, seemed very amicably disposed, the cheering news that the great river was not very distant, and seeing the Clearwater to be a fine, navigable stream, they determined to abandon the weary land march and make canoes. Five of these having been constructed, they laid in a stock of dog meat and then committed themselves to the sweeping current with which all the tributaries of the Columbia hastened to their destined place. They left their horses with the Nez Percés, and it is worthy of special notice that these were remarkably faithful to their trust. Indeed, it may be safely asserted that the first explorers of this country almost uniformly met with the kindest reception.

On the 10th of October, having traveled sixty miles on the Clearwater, its pellucid current delivered them to the turbid, angry, sullen, lava-banked Snake. This great stream they called Kimooenim, its Indian name. It was in its low season, and it seems from their account that it, as well as all the other streams, must have been uncommonly low that year.

Thus they say that on October 13th they descended a very bad rapid four miles in length, at the lower part of which the whole river was compressed into a channel only twenty-five yards wide. Immediately below they passed a large stream on the right, which they called Drewyer's river, from one of their men. This must have been the Palouse river, and certainly it is very rare that the mighty Snake becomes attenuated at that point to a width of twenty-five yards. Next day as they were descending the worst rapid they had yet seen (probably the Monumental rapid), it repelled their effrontery by upsetting one of the boats. No lives were lost, but the cargo of the boat was badly water-soaked. For the purpose of drying it, they stopped a day, and finding no other timber, they were compelled to use a very appropriate pile which some Indians had stored away and covered with stones. This trifling circumstance is noticed because of the explorers' speaking in connection with it of their customary scrupulousness in never taking any property of the Indians, and of their determination to repay the owner, if they could find him, on their return. If all explorers had been as particular, much is the distress and loss that would have been avoided.

They found almost continuous rapids from this point to the mouth of the Snake, which they reached on October 16th. Here they were met by a regular procession of nearly two hundred Indians. They had a grand pow-wow, and both parties displayed great affection, the whites bestowing medals, shirts, trinkets, etc., in accordance with the rank of the recipient, and the Indians repaying the kindness with abundant and prolonged visits and accompanying gifts of wood and fish. On the next day they measured the rivers, finding the Columbia to be nine hundred and sixty yards wide and the Snake five hundred and seventy-five. They indulge in no poetic reveries as they stand by the river which has been one principal object of their search, but they seem to see pretty much everything of practical value. In the glimmering haze of the pleasant October morning they notice the vast bare prairie stretching southward until broken by the rounded summits of the Blue mountains. They find the Sohulks, who live at the junction of the rivers, a mild and happy people, the men being content with one wife each, whom they actually assist in family work.

Captain Clarke ascended the Columbia to the mouth of a large river coming from the west, which the Indians called the Tapteal. This was, of course, the Yakima. The people living at its mouth rejoiced in the liquid name of Chinnapum. Here Captain Clarke shot what he called a prairie cock, the first he had seen. It was no doubt a sage hen.

After two days of rest, being well supplied with fish, dog, roots, etc., and at peace with their own consciences and all the world, with satisfaction at the prospect of soon completing their journey, they re-embarked. Sixteen miles below the mouth of the Kimooenim, which they now began to call the Lewis river, they descried, cut clear against the dim horizon line of the southwest, a pyramidal mountain, covered with snow—their first view of Mount Hood.

The next day, being in the vicinity of Umattilla, they saw another snowy peak at a conjectured distance of one hundred and fifty miles. Near here Captain Clarke, having landed, shot a crane and a duck. Some Indians near were almost paralyzed with terror, but at last they recovered enough to make the best possible use of their legs. Following them, Captain Clarke found a little cluster of huts. Pushing aside the mat door of one of them, he entered, and in the bright light of the unroofed hut discovered thirty-two persons, all of whom were in the greatest terror, some wailing and wringing their hands.

Having by kind looks and gestures soothed their grief, he held up his burning-glass to catch a stray sunbeam with which to light his pipe. Thereat the consternation of the Indians revived, and they refused to be comforted. But when the rest of the party arrived with the two Indian guides who had come with them from the Clear-water, terror gave way to curiosity and pleasure. These Pishquitpaws—such was their name—explained to the guides their fear of Captain Clarke by saying that he came from the sky accompanied by a terrible noise, and they knew there was a bad medicine in it.

Being convinced now that he was a mortal after all, they became very affectionate, and having heard the music of two violins, they became so enamored of the strangers that they stayed up all night with them and collected to the number of two hundred to bid them good-bye in the morning. The principal business of these Indians seemed to be catching and curing salmon, which, in the clear water of the Columbia, the explorers could see swimming about in large numbers. Continuing with no extraordinary occurrence, they passed the river now called the John Day, to which they applied the name Lapage. Mount Hood was now almost constantly in view, and since the Indians told them it was near the great falls of the Columbia, they called it the Timm (this seems to be the Indian word for falls) mountain.

On the next day they reached a large river on the left, which came thundering through a narrow channel into the equally turbulent Columbia. This river, which Captain Lewis judged to contain one-fourth as much water as the Columbia (an enormous over-estimate), answered to the Indian name of Towahnahooks. It afterwards received from the French the name now used, Des Chutes.

They now perceived that they were near the place hinted at by nearly every Indian that they had talked with since crossing the divide—the great falls. And a weird, savage place it proved to be. Here the clenched hands of trachyte and basalt, thrust through the soil from the buried realm of the volcanoes, almost clutch the rushing river. Only here and there between the parted fingers can he make his escape.

After making several portages they reached that extraordinary place (now called The Dalles) where all the waters gathered from half a million square miles of earth are squeezed into a crack forty-five yards wide. The desolation on either side of this frightful chasm is a fitting margin. As one crawls to the edge and peeps over, he sees the waters to be of inky blackness. Streaks of foam gridiron the blackness. There is little noise compared with that made by the shallow rapids above, but rather a dismal sough, as though the rocks below were rubbing their black sides together in a vain effort to close over the escaping river. The river here is "turned on edge." In fact, its depth has not been found to this day. Some suppose that there was once a natural tunnel here through which the river flowed, and that in consequence of a volcanic convulsion the top of the tunnel fell in. If there be any truth in this, the width of the channel is no doubt much greater at the bottom than at the top. Lewis and Clarke, finding that the roughness of the shore made it almost impossible to carry their boats over, and seeing no evidence of rocks in the channel, boldly steered through this "witches' cauldron." Though no doubt hurled along with frightful rapidity and flung like foam flakes on the crest of the boiling surges, they reached the end of the "chute" without accident, to the amazement of the Indians who had collected on the bluff to witness the daring experiment. After two more portages the party safely entered the broad, still flood beginning where the town of The Dalles now stands. Here they paused for two days to hunt and caulk their boats. They here began to see evidences of the white traders below, in blankets, axes, brass kettles, and other articles of civilized manufacture. The Indians, too, were more inclined to be saucy and suspicious.

The Dalles seemed to be a dividing line between the Indian tribes. Those living at the falls, where Celilo now is, called the Eneeshurs, understood and "fellowshipped" with the up-river tribes, but at the narrows and thence to The Dalles was a tribe called the Escheloots. These were alien to the Indians above, but on intimate terms with those below the Cascades. Among the Escheloots the explorers first noticed the peculiar "cluck" in speech common to all down-river tribes. The flattening of the head, which above belonged to females only, was now the common thing.

The place where Lewis and Clarke camped while at The Dalles was just below Mill creek (called by the natives Quenett), on a point of rock near the location of the present car shops.

The next Indian tribe, extending apparently from the vicinity of Crate's point to the Cascades, capped the climax of tongue-twisting names by calling themselves Chilluckitte-quaws.

Nothing of extraordinary character seems to have been encountered between The Dalles and the Cascades. But the explorers had their eyes wide open, and the calm majesty of the river and savage grandeur of its shores received due notice. They observed and named most of the streams on the route, the first of importance being the Cataract river (now the Klickitat), then Labieshe's river (Hood river), Canoe creek (White Salmon) and Crusatte's river. This last must have been Little White Salmon, though they were greatly deceived as to its size, stating it to be sixty yards wide. In this vicinity they were much struck with the sunken forest, which, at that low stage of the water, was very conspicuous. They correctly inferred that this indicated a damming up of the river at a very recent time. Indeed, they judged that it must have occurred within twenty years. It is well known, however, that submerged trees or piles, as indicated by remains of old Roman wharves in Britain, may remain intact for hundreds of years; but it is nevertheless evident that the closing of the river at the Cascades is a very recent event. It is also evident from the sliding, sinking and grinding constantly seen there now that a similar event is liable to happen at any time.

The Cascades having been reached, more portages were required. Slow and tedious though they were, the explorers seem to have endured them with unflinching patience. They were cheered by the prospect of soon putting all the rapids behind and launching their canoes on the unobstructed vastness of the lower river. This was prosperously accomplished on the 2d of November. They were greatly delighted with the verdure which now robbed the gaunt nakedness of the rocks. The island formed at the lower cascade by Columbia slough also pleased them by its fertility and its dense growth of grass and strawberry vines. From this last circumstance they named it Strawberry island. At the lower part of that cluster of islands, that spired and turreted rock of the old feudal age of the river, when the volcano kings stormed each other's castles with earthquakes and spouts of lava, riveted their attention. They named it Beacon rock, but it is now called Castle rock. They estimated its height at eight hundred feet and its circumference at four hundred yards, the latter being only a fourth of the reality.

The tides were now noticeable. This fact must have struck a new chord of reflection in the minds of these hardy adventurers, this first-felt pulse-beat of the dim vast of waters which grasps half the circumference of the earth. And so, as this mighty heart throb of the ocean, rising and falling in harmony with all nature, celestial and terrestrial, pulsed through a hundred and eighty miles of river, it might have seemed one of the ocean's multiplied fingers outstretched to welcome them, the first organized expedition of the new republic to this "westmost west." It might have betokened to them the harmony and unity of future nations as exemplified in the vast extent, the liberty, the human sympathies, the diversified interests, industries, and purposes of that republic whose motto yet remains "One from many."

The rest of their journey was a calm floating between meadows and islands from whose shallow ponds they obtained ducks and geese in great numbers. They thought the "Quick Sand river"—Sandy—to be a large and important stream. They noticed the Washongal creek, which from the great number of seals around its mouth they called Seal river. But strange to say, they missed the Willamette entirely on their down trip. The Indians in this part of the river called themselves Skilloots. Dropping rapidly down the calm but misty stream, past a large river called by the Indians the Cowaliske—Cowlitz—to the country of the Wakhkiacs, at last, on the 7th of November, the dense fog with which morning had enshrouded all objects suddenly broke away and they saw the bold, mountainous shores on either side vanish away in front, and through the parted headlands they looked into the infinite expanse of the ocean.

Overjoyed at the successful termination of their journey, they sought the first pleasant camping ground and made haste to land. The rain, which is sometimes even now observed to characterize that part of Oregon, greatly marred the joy of their first night's rest within sound of the Pacific's billows.

Six days passed in moldy and dripping inactivity at a point a little above the present Chinook. They then spent nine much pleasanter days at Chinook point. This, however, not proving what they wanted for a permanent camp, they devoted themselves to explorations with a view to discovering a more suitable location.

The party wintered in a log building at a point named by them Fort Clatsop. On the 23d of March, 1806, they turned their faces homeward, first, however, having given to the chiefs of the Clatsops and Chinooks certificate of hospitable treatment and posted on the fort the following notice: "The object of this last is that, through the medium of some civilized person, who may see the same, it may be made known to the world that the party consisting of the persons whose names are hereunto annexed and who were sent out by the government of the United States to explore the interior of the continent of North America, did penetrate the same by way of the Missouri and Columbia rivers, to the discharge of the latter into the Pacific ocean, at which they arrived on the 14th day of November, 1805, and departed on their return to the United States by the same route by which they had come."

Of this notice several copies were left among the Indians, one of which fell into the hands of Captain Hall, of the brig Lydia, and was conveyed to the United States.

The expedition made its way with no little difficulty up the Columbia river. They discovered on their return a large tributary of that river (the Willamette) which had escaped their notice on their outward journey, and made careful inquiry of the Indians concerning it, the results of which were embodied in their map of the expedition.

At the mouth of the John Day river their canoes were abandoned, their baggage was packed on the backs of a few horses they had purchased from the Indians, and traveling in this manner, they continued their homeward march, arriving at the mouth of the Walla Walla river April 27th. The great chief Yellept was then the leader of the Walla Walla nation, and by him the explorers were received with such generous hospitality that they yielded to the temptation to linger a couple of days before undertaking further journeyings among the mountain fastnesses. Such was the treatment given them by these Indians that the journal of the expedition makes this appreciative notation concerning them: "We may indeed justly affirm that of all the Indians that we have seen since leaving the United States, the Walla Wallas are the most hospitable, honest and sincere."

Of the return journey for the next hundred and fifty miles, that venerable pioneer missionary, the late Dr. H. K. Hines, writes as follows: "Leaving these hospitable people on the 29th of April, the party passed eastward on the great 'Nez Perce trail.' This trail was the great highway of the Walla Wallas, Cayuses and Nez Perces to the buffalo ranges, to which they annually resorted for game and supplies. It passed up the valley of the Touchet, called by Lewis and Clarke the 'White Stallion,' thence over the high prairie ridges and down the Alpowa to the crossing of the Snake river, then up the north bank of Clearwater to the village of Twisted Hair, where the exploring party had left their horses on the way down the previous autumn. It was worn deep and broad by the constant rush of the Indian generations from time immemorial, and on many stretches on the open plains and over the smooth hills, twenty horsemen could ride abreast in parallel columns. The writer has often passed over it when it lay exactly as it did when the tribes of Yellept and Twisted Hair traced its sinuous courses, or when Lewis and Clarke and their companions first marked it with the heel of civilization. But the plow has long since obliterated it, and where the monotonous song of the Indian march was droningly chanted for so many barbaric ages, the song of the reaper thrills the clear air as he comes to his garner bringing in the sheaves. A more delightful ride of a hundred and fifty miles than this that the company of Lewis and Clarke made over the swelling prairie upland and along the crystal streams between Walla Walla and the village of Twisted Hair, in the soft May days of 1806, can scarcely be found anywhere on earth."

To trace the journeyings of these explorers further is not within the province of this work, but in order to convey a general idea of the labors and extent of the voyage, we quote the brief summary made by Captain Lewis himself:

"The road by which we went out by the way of the Missouri to its head is 3,096 miles; thence by land by way of Lewis river over to Clarke's river and down that to the entrance of Travelers' Rest creek, where all the roads from different routes meet; thence across the rugged part of the Rocky mountains to the navigable waters of the Columbia, 398 miles; thence down the river 640 miles to the Pacific ocean—making a total distance of 4,134 miles. On our return in 1806 we came from Travelers' Rest directly to the falls of the Missouri river, which shortens the distance about 579 miles, and is a much better route, reducing the distance from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean to 3,555 miles. Of this distance 2,575 miles is up the Missouri to the falls of that river; thence passing through the plains and across the Rocky mountains to the navigable waters of the Kooskooskie river, a branch of the Columbia, 340 miles, 200 of which is good road, 140 miles over a tremendous mountain, steep and broken, 60 miles of which is covered several feet deep with snow, and which we passed on the last of June; from the navigable part of the Kooskooskie we descended that rapid river 73 miles to its entrance into Lewis river, and down that river 154 miles to the Columbia, and thence 413 miles to its entrance into the Pacific ocean. About 180 miles of this distance is tide land. We passed several 'bad rapids and narrows, and one considerable fall, 286 miles above the entrance of this river, 37 feet 8 inches; the total distance descending the Columbia waters 640 miles—making a total of 3,555 miles, on the most direct route from the Mississippi at the mouth of the Missouri to the Pacific ocean."

The safe return of the explorers to their homes in the United States naturally created a sensation throughout that country and the world. Leaders and men were suitably rewarded, and the fame of the former will live while the rivers to which their names have been given continue to pour their waters into the sea. President Jefferson, the great patron of the expedition, paying a tribute to Captain Lewis in 1813, said: "Never did a similar event excite more joy throughout the United States. The humblest of its citizens have taken a lively interest in the issue of this journey, and looked with impatience for the information it would furnish. Nothing short of the official journals of this extraordinary and interesting journey will exhibit the importance of the service, the courage, devotion, zeal and perseverance under circumstances calculated to discourage, which animated this little band of heroes, throughout the long, dangerous and tedious travel."

CHAPTER III.

THE ASTOR EXPEDITION.

While the limits of this volume render a full treatment of the early Northwest history impossible, it is necessary to write briefly of those mammoth forces of the first ages of the country, the great fur companies, those gigantic commercial organizations, whose plans were so bold, far-reaching and comprehensive, and whose theater of action included such vast areas of the earth's surface.

The profits of the fur trade were such as might well entice daring and avarice to run the gauntlet of icebergs, of starvation, of ferocious savages and of stormy seas. The net returns from a single voyage might liquidate even the enormous cost of the outfit. For instance, Ross, one of the clerks of Astor's company, and located at Okanogan, relates that one morning before breakfast he bought of Indians one hundred and ten beaver skins at the rate of five leaves of tobacco per skin. Afterward a yard of cotton cloth, worth, say, ten cents, purchased twenty-five beaver skins, the value of which in the New York market was five dollars a piece. For four fathoms of blue beads, worth, perhaps, a dollar, Lewis and Clarke obtained a sea otter's skin, the market price of which varied from forty-five to sixty dollars. Ross notes in another place that for one hundred and sixty-five dollars in trinkets, cloth, etc., he purchased peltries valued in the Canton market at eleven thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. Indeed, even the ill-fated voyage of Mr. Astor's partners proved that a cargo worth twenty-five thousand dollars in New York might be replaced in two years by one worth a quarter of a million, a profit of a thousand per cent. We can not wonder then at the eager enterprise and fierce, sometimes bloody, competition of the fur traders.

The fur-producing animals of especial value in the old Oregon country were three in number. The first, the beaver, was found in great abundance in all the interior valleys, the Willamette country, as was discovered, being pre-eminent in this respect. The two others, the sea otter and the seal, were found on the coast. The sea otter fur was the most valuable, its velvety smoothness and glossy blackness rendering it first in the markets of the world of all furs from the temperate zone of North America, and inferior only to the ermine and sable, and possibly to the fiery fox of the far north.

Such, then, was the prospect which prompted the formation of the Pacific Fur Company, which shall have the first place in our narrative as being the first to enter the Columbia river basin, though it was long antedated in organization by several other large fur-trading corporations. The sole and prime mover of this enterprise was that famed commercial genius, John Jacob Astor, a native of Heidelberg, who had come to America poor, and had amassed a large fortune in commercial transactions. In 1810 there was conceived in the brain of this man a scheme which for magnitude of design and careful arrangement of detail was truly masterful, and in every sense worthy of the great entrepreneur. Even the one grand mistake which wrecked the enterprise was the result of a trait of character which "leaned to virtue's side." Broad-minded and liberal himself, he did not appreciate the danger of entrusting his undertaking to the hands of men whose national prejudices were bitterly anti-American and whose previous connection with a rival company might affect their loyalty to this one. He regarded the enterprise as a purely commercial one, and selected its personnel accordingly, hence the failure of the venture.

Mr. Astor's plan contemplated the prosecution of the fur trade in every unsettled territory of America claimed by the United States, the trade with China and the supply of the Russian settlements with trading stock and provisions, the goods to be paid for in peltries. A vessel was to be despatched at regular intervals from New York, bearing supplies of goods to be traded to the Indians. She was to discharge her cargo at a depot of trade to be established at the mouth of the Columbia river, then trade along the coast with Indians and at the Russian settlements until another cargo had been in part secured, return to the mouth of the river, complete her lading there, sail thence to China, receive a return cargo of Canton silks, nankeen and tea, and back to New York. Two years would pass in completing this vast commercial "rounding up." An important part of the plan was the supply of the Russian posts at New Archangel, the object being twofold—first, to secure the profits accruing therefrom, and, second, to shut off competition in Mr. Astor's own territory, through the semi-partnership with the Russians in furnishing them supplies. Careful arrangements had been made with the Russian government to prevent any possible clash between the vessels of the two companies engaged in the coast trade. "It was," says Brewerton, "a colossal scheme and deserved to succeed; had it done so it would have advanced American settlement and actual occupancy on the northwest coast by at least a quarter of a century, giving employment to thousands, and transferred the enormous profits of the Hudson's Bay and North West British Fur Companies from English to American coffers."

Like a prudent business man, Mr. Astor anticipated that, though the Northwest Company had no trading posts in the region west of the Rocky mountains and south of fifty-two degrees north, its enmity and jealousy would be speedily aroused when a new competitor entered the field. He resolved to soften enmity by frankness, so wrote to the directors of the British company the details of his plan and generously offered them a third interest in the enterprise. This ingenuousness on his part found no response in the characters of the shrewd and unscrupulous men in whom he had so unwisely confided. Nobleness, in this instance, failed to enkindle nobleness. They met candor with duplicity, generosity with perfidy.

Playing for time, they pretended, Cæsar-like, to take the matter under advisement, and at once despatched David Thompson, the astronomer and surveyor of their company, with instructions "to occupy the mouth of the Columbia, to explore the river to its headwaters, and, above all, to watch the progress of Mr. Astor's enterprise." They then declined the proposal.

But Mr. Astor proceeded with his project energetically and skillfully. He associated with himself as partners in the enterprise (and here was his great mistake) Donald Mackenzie, Alexander Mackay, who had accompanied Alexander Mackenzie on his voyage of discovery, hence possessed invaluable experience, and Duncan Macdougall, all late of the Northwest Company, and, though men of great skill and experience, schooled in the prejudices of the association with which they had so long maintained a connection and able to see only through British eyes. To the partners already enumerated were subsequently added Wilson P. Hunt and Robert Maclellan, Americans; David and Robert Stuart and Ramsey Crooks, Scotchmen; John Clarke, a Canadian, and others.

Wilson P. Hunt was given the post of chief agent on the Columbia, his term of office being five years, and when he was obliged to be absent temporarily, a substitute was to be elected by the partners who happened to be present, to act in his place. Each partner obligated himself in the most solemn manner to go where sent and to faithfully execute the objects of the company, but before subscribing to this bond two of the British perfidiously communicated to the British minister, Mr. Jackson, temporarily in New York, the details of Mr. Astor's plan and inquired of him concerning their status as British subjects trading under the American flag in the event of war. They were given assurance that in case of war they would be protected as English subjects and merchants. Their scruples thus put at rest, they entered into the compact.

The larger part of the expedition was to go via Cape Horn and the Sandwich islands to the mouth of the Columbia, there to await the arrival of the Hunt party, which was sent out by land. To convey them thence the ship Tonquin, a vessel of two hundred and ninety tons burden, was fitted up for sea. She was commanded by Captain Thorne, a lieutenant of the United States navy on leave, and had on board Indian trading goods, the frame timbers for a coasting schooner, supplies of all kinds, and in fact, everything essential to comfort.

Before the vessel had left the harbor, Mr. Astor was apprised that a British war vessel was cruising off the coast for the purpose of intercepting the Tonquin, and impressing the Canadians and British who were on board. This was a ruse of the Northwest Company to delay the expedition so that their emissary, Thompson, should arrive at the mouth of the Columbia first. But Mr. Astor secured as convoy the now famous United States frigate, Constitution, commanded by the equally famous Captain Isaac Hull, and the Tonquin, thus protected, proceeded safely on her way. She arrived at her destination March 22, 1811, after a voyage the details of which may be found in Irving's Astoria, Franchere's narrative, or in some of the publications based upon the latter work. On the 12th of the following month a part of the crew crossed the river in a launch and established at Fort George a settlement to which the name Astoria was given in honor of the projector of the enterprise. They at once addressed themselves to the task of constructing the schooner, the framed materials for which had been brought with them in the Tonquin. An expedition also was made by Mr. Mackay to determine the truth or falsity of the rumor that a party of whites were establishing a post at the upper cascades of the river, but when the first rapids were reached the expedition had to be abandoned, the Indian crew positively refusing to proceed further.

On the 1st of June, the ill-fated Tonquin started north, Mr. Mackay accompanying. We must now pursue her fortunes to their terrible conclusion. Mr. Franchere, a Frenchman, one of Mr. Astor's clerks, is the chief authority for the story. With his account, Irving seems to have taken some poetic license. According to that graceful writer, with a total force of twenty-three and an Indian of the Chehalis tribe called Lamaze, for interpreter, the Tonquin entered the harbor of Neweetee. Franchere calls the Indian Lamanse, and the harbor, he says, the Indians called Newity. We shall probably be safe in following Bancroft, who surmises that the place was Nootka sound, where, in 1803, the ship Boston and all her crew but two had been destroyed.

Captain Thorne had been repeatedly and urgently warned by Mr. Astor against allowing more than four or five Indians on board at once, but the choleric skipper was not of the kind to listen to the voice of caution. When Indians appeared with a fine stock of sea otter skins, and the indications were for a profitable trade, he forgot everything in his eagerness to secure the peltry. But long experience with the whites and the instructions of their wily chief, Maquinna, had rendered these tribes less pliable and innocent than the captain expected. Being unable to strike a bargain with any of them and losing patience, Thorne ordered all to leave the deck. They paid no attention, and the captain, becoming violently enraged, seized their leader by the hair and hurried him toward the ship's ladder, emphasizing his exit by a stroke with a bundle of furs. The other Indians left forthwith.

When Mr. Mackay, who was on shore at the time, returned to the ship, he became indignant at Thorne, and urged that he set sail at once. Lamanse, the Chehalis Indian, seconded him, asserting that all prospects of profitable trade were destroyed and that a longer stay in the harbor was attended with very great danger, but advice and importunity were vain.

Early next morning a number of Indians, demure and peaceable, paddled over to the vessel, holding aloft bundles of fur as an evidence of their wish to trade. Thorne called Mackay's attention to the success of his method of dealing with the red men. "Just show them that you are not afraid," said he, "and they will behave themselves." The Indians exchanged their furs for whatever was offered, making no remonstrances or demands for higher prices.

Other canoe loads of savages came aboard and still others, the self-satisfied Thorne welcoming all in his blandest manner. The more watchful sailors became suspicious and alarmed, but they well knew that remonstrance against the course of Captain Thorne was vain. Soon, however, even he noticed that the Indians had become massed at all the assailable points of the vessel. He was visibly startled by this discovery, but pretending not to be aware that anything was wrong, he ordered his men to get ready for sailing, and the Indians to leave the vessel.

The latter started towards the ladder, but as they did so, they drew from the unsold bundles of furs the weapons therein concealed.

"In an instant the wild war-yell broke the awful silence, and then the peaceful deck of the Tonquin saw a slaughter grim and pitiless.

Lewis, the clerk, and Mackay were almost instantly despatched. Then a crowd, with fiendish triumph, set upon the captain, bent on evening up at once the old score. The brawny frame and iron will of the brave, though foolhardy, old salt made him a dangerous object to attack, and not until half a dozen of his assailants had measured their bleeding lengths on the slippery deck did he succumb. Then he was hacked to pieces with savage glee. Meanwhile four sailors, the only survivors besides the interpreter, Lamanse, by whom the story was told, having gained access to the hold, began firing on the triumphant Indians; and with such effect did they work, that the whole throng left the ship in haste and sought the shore. Lamanse, meanwhile, was spared, but held in captivity for two years. The next day, the four surviving sailors attempted to put to sea in a small boat, but were pursued and probably murdered by the Indians. And then, like a band of buzzards circling around a carcass, the Indian canoes began to cluster around the deserted ship."

But an awful retribution was about to overtake the Indians. Cautiously at first, but with more boldness as they observed the apparent lifelessness of everything on the ship, they began next day to climb aboard, and soon several hundred of them were rifling the storehouses, gloating over the disfigured bodies of their victims, and strutting across the deck, clad in gaudy blankets, and lavishly adorned with beads and tinsels.

Then came a terrible boom, and the luckless Tonquin, with all on board, both quick and dead, was scattered in fragments over the face of the deep. Her powder magazine had exploded, destroying the ship and her enemies in one awful ruin. According to Lamanse, as quoted by Franchere, two hundred Indians were destroyed by this explosion.

Franchere was unable to state what caused the ship to be blown up, but surmises that the four sailors attached a slow train to the magazine before their departure. As Franchere is the only known authority, it seems certain that Irving must have fabricated his account, which is to the effect that Lewis, wounded, remained on the ship after the four sailors had gone, and that he enticed the savages aboard, that he might destroy himself and them in one final retribution.

A report that the Tonquin was destroyed reached Astoria in due time, the news being borne by Indians. At first the story was entirely discredited, but as time passed and no Tonquin appeared, it became more and more evident that there must be some truth in it. No details of the tragedy were known, however, until Lamanse reappeared some two years later.

On July 15, 1811, David Thompson, with eight white men, arrived at Astoria. His expedition had been long delayed on the eastern side of the Rocky mountains, in the search for a pass. Desertions among his crew also impeded his progress, and the final result was that he had to return to the nearest post and remain over winter. In the early spring he hurried forward. The party distributed many small flags among the Indians along the Columbia, built huts at the forks of the river and took formal possession of the country drained by the Columbia and its tributaries in the name of the King of Great Britain, and for the company which sent them out. But the main object of the expedition was not realized. They were unable to occupy the mouth of the Columbia, and the perfidy of the Northwest Company failed of its reward. Hostile though the expedition was, it was received at Astoria with open-handed cordiality, Macdougall furnishing Thompson with supplies for the return journey against the urgent remonstrance of David Stuart. Such generosity to one's commercial enemy is, to say the least, a little unusual, but the magnanimity displayed has for some reason failed to call forth the plaudits of historians.

At the time of Mr. Thompson's arrival, David Stuart was about to start for the Spokane country to establish a post, and he delayed his departure for a short time that his and Mr. Thompson's party might travel together. At the confluence of the Columbia and Okanogan rivers, Mr. Stuart erected Fort Okanogan, the first interior post west of the Rocky mountains within the limits of the present state of Washington.

January 8, 1812, a part of the Hunt expedition reached Astoria in a pitiable condition. The adventures of different members of this party form a sad chapter in the history of the fur trade. Hunt was met by overwhelming obstacles from the very first. In his efforts to get men for his expedition he was harassed in every way possible by persons interested in rival fur companies, and when, at last, owing to his own indomitable perseverance and Astor's unstinted purse, he got a party together, the battle was by no means won. In April, 1811, Hunt set his face toward the Pacific. With him were sixty men, four of whom, Crooks, Mackenzie, Miller and Maclellan, were partners, and one, Reed, was a clerk. The rest were free trappers and Canadian voyageurs, except two English naturalists, Bradbury and Nuttall.

The earlier portions of their journey afforded many interesting and some exciting experiences, but all went fairly well with them until the mountains were entered, when their troubles began. The story of their wanderings, their struggles, hardships and starvation on that terrible winter trip through the interminable labyrinths of the mountains, and on the desolate and forbidding lava plains is heart-rending in the extreme. Detachments under Mackenzie and Maclellan passed through the mountains to Snake river before winter was fairly upon them, though even they had to endure extreme suffering. It was these who reached Astoria in January as before stated. On the 15th of February the main party under Mr. Hunt also reached the scene. As they drew near Astoria, the whole population of that settlement came pouring down to meet them, the foremost being Mackenzie and Maclellan, who, having abandoned hope that Hunt and his men could survive the famine and the rigors of winter, were the more rejoiced to see them alive. "The Canadians, with French abandon, rushed into each other's arms, crying and hugging like so many school girls, and even the hard-visaged Scotchmen and nonchalant Americans gave themselves up to the unstinted gladness of the occasion." Crooks and John Day, with four Canadians, had been left sick on the banks of the Snake. It was not thought likely that they would ever be seen alive again, but the next summer, Stuart and Maclellan, while journeying from Okanogan to Astoria, found the two leaders, naked and haggard, near the mouth of the Umatilla. Their pitiable plight was speedily relieved, but poor John Day never recovered and soon was numbered among the dead. The Canadians were afterward found alive, though destitute, among the Shoshones.

On the 5th of May, 1812, the Beaver, another of Astor's vessels, reached Astoria. Among those on board was Ross Cox, author of Adventures on the Columbia River, a work of great historical value. About this time, also, Robert Stuart, while bearing despatches by land to Mr. Astor, discovered the South Pass through the Rocky mountains, which in later years became the great gateway to the Pacific for immigrant trains.

Pity it is that the historian must record the failure of an enterprise so wisely planned as that of Astor, so generously supported and in the execution of which so much devoted self-abnegation was displayed, so many lives sacrificed. But the clouds were now beginning to darken above the little colony on the shores of the Pacific. On August 4th the Beaver sailed northward for Sitka, with Mr. Hunt aboard. While there an agreement was entered into between that gentleman and the Russian governor, Baranoff, the gist of which was that the Russian and American companies were to forbear interference with each other's territory and to operate as allies in expelling trespassers on the rights of either. The Beaver had been instructed to return to Astoria before sailing to Canton, but instead she sailed direct, so Mr. Hunt was carried to Oahu, there to await a vessel expected from New York, on which he should obtain passage to Astoria. But he did not arrive until too late to avert the calamity which befell the Pacific Fur Company. War was declared between Great Britain and the United States. Mr. Astor learned that the Northwest Company was preparing a ship mounting twenty guns, the Isaac Todd, wherewith to capture Astoria. He appealed to the United States for aid, but his efforts were unavailing. Discouragements were thickening around the American settlement. Mackenzie was unsuccessful at his post on the Shahapтин river, and had determined to press for a new post. He visited Clarke, and while the two were together, John George MacTavish, of the Northwest Company, paid them a visit and vauntingly informed them of the sailing of the Isaac Todd, and of her mission, the capture or destruction of Astoria. Mackenzie returned at once to his post on the Shahapтин, broke up camp, cached his provisions, and set out in haste for Astoria, at which point he arrived January 16, 1813. Macdougall was agent-in-chief at Astoria in the absence of Hunt. It was resolved by him and Mackenzie that they should abandon Astoria in the spring and recross the mountains. Mackenzie at once set off to recover his cached provisions and to trade them for horses for the journey. He also carried despatches to Messrs. Clarke and David Stuart, advising them of the intention to abandon Astoria and directing them to make preparations accordingly. Mackenzie met a party of the Northwest Company, with MacTavish as one of the leaders, and the parties camped, as Irving says, "mingled together as united by a common interest instead of belonging to rival companies trading under hostile flags."

On reaching his destination, Mackenzie found his cache had been robbed by Indians. He and Clarke and Stuart met at Walla Walla as per arrangement, and together descended the Columbia, reaching Astoria June 12th.

Stuart and Clarke refused to break up their posts and to provide horses or make other preparations for leaving the country. Furthermore, Mackenzie's disappointment in finding his cache broken into and its contents stolen made it necessary that the departure should be delayed beyond July 1st, the date set by Macdougall for dissolution of the company. Treason was to have time and opportunity to do its worst. MacTavish, who was camped at the fort, began negotiations for the purchase of trading goods, and it was proposed by Macdougall to trade him the post on the Spokane for horses to be delivered the next spring, which proposition was eventually accepted. An agreement for the dissolution of the company to take effect the next June was signed by the four partners, Clarke and Stuart yielding to the pressure much against their wills. Hunt, who arrived on the 20th of August, also reluctantly yielded, the discouraging circumstances having been pictured to him by Macdougall, who pretended to be animated by a desire to save Mr. Astor's interests before the place should fall into the hands of the British, whose war vessels were on their way to effect its capture. Hunt then sailed to secure a vessel to convey the property to the Russian settlements for safe keeping while the war lasted, first arranging that Macdougall should be placed in full charge of the establishment after January 1st should he fail to return.

While en route to advise Messrs. Clarke and Stuart of the new arrangement, Mr. Mackenzie and party met MacTavish and J. Stuart with a company of men descending the river to meet the Phoebe and the Isaac Todd. Clarke had been advised of the situation and was accompanying them to Astoria. Mackenzie decided to return also to the fort, and with Clarke attempted to slip away in the night and so reach Astoria before the members of the Northwest Company arrived, but was discovered and followed by two of MacTavish's canoes. Both MacTavish and Mackenzie reached their objective point on October 7th, and the party of the former camped at the fort. Next day Macdougall, by way of preparation for his final coup, read a letter announcing the sailing of the Phoebe and the Isaac Todd with orders "to take and destroy everything American on the Northwest coast."

"This dramatic scene," says Evans, "was followed by a proposition of MacTavish to purchase the interests, stocks, establishments, etc., of the Pacific Fur Company. Macdougall then assumed sole control and agency because of the non-arrival of Hunt, and after repeated conference with MacTavish, in which the presence of the other partners was ignored, the sale was concluded at certain rates. A few days later J. Stuart arrived with the remainder of the Northwest party. He objected to MacTavish's prices, and lowered the rates materially. Mr. Stuart's offer was accepted by Macdougall and the agreement of transfer was signed October 16th. By it Duncan Macdougall, for and on behalf of himself, Donald Mackenzie, David Stuart and John Clarke, partners of the Pacific Fur Company, dissolved July 1st, pretended to sell to his British confreeres and co-conspirators of the Northwest Company 'the whole of the establishments, furs and present stock on hand, on the Columbia and Thompson's rivers.'" Speaking of the transaction in a letter to John Quincy Adams, secretary of state, Mr. Astor himself says:

"Macdougall transferred all of my property to the Northwest Company, who were in possession of it by sale, as he called it, for the sum of fifty-eight thousand dollars, of which he retained fourteen thousand dollars as wages said to be due to some of the men. From the price obtained for the goods, etc., and he having himself become interested in the purchase and made a partner of the Northwest Company, some idea may be formed as to this man's correctness of dealing. He sold to the Northwest Company eighteen thousand one hundred and seventy pounds of beaver at two dollars, which was at that time selling in Canton at five and six dollars per skin. I estimate the whole property to be worth nearer two hundred thousand dollars than forty thousand dollars, about the sum I received in bills on Montreal."

Charitably disposed persons may suggest that Macdougall's actions were in a measure justifiable; that a British force was actually en route to capture Astoria, and that the post, being without adequate means of defense, must surely fall; that it was better to save a pittance than that all should be lost. Macdougall's conduct subsequent to the transfer of Mr. Astor's property was, however, "in studied and consistent obedience to the interests of the Northwest Company." On his return on February 28, 1814, in the brig Pedler, which he purchased to convey Mr. Astor's property to a place of safety, Mr. Hunt found his old partner, whom he had left in charge of the fort, still presiding over it, but now a dignitary in the camp of the enemy. There was no other course open to him than to digest the venom of his chagrin as best he could, take his diminutive drafts on Montreal, and set sail in the Pedler for New York. Macdougall had been given a full partnership in the Northwest Company. What was the consideration?

It is needless to add that on the arrival of the British vessels, Astoria became a British possession. The formal change of the sovereignty and raising of the union jack took place on December 12th, and as if to obliterate all trace of Mr. Astor's operations, the name of Astoria was changed to Fort George. The arrival of the Isaac Todd the following spring with a cargo of trading goods and supplies enabled the Northwest Company to enter vigorously into the prosecution of its trade in the territory of its wronged and outraged rival.

"Thus disgracefully failed," says Evans, "a magnificent enterprise, which merited success for sagacity displayed in its conception, its details, its objects; for the liberality and munificence of its projector in furnishing means adequate for its thorough execution; for the results

it had aimed to produce. It was inaugurated purely for commercial purposes. Had it not been transferred to its enemies, it would have pioneered the colonization of the northwest coast by citizens of the United States; it would have furnished the natural and peaceful solution of the question of the right to the territory drained by the Columbia and its tributaries.

* * * * *

"The scheme was grand in its aim, magnificent in its breadth of purpose and area of operation. Its results were naturally feasible, not over-anticipated. They were but the logical and necessary sequence of the pursuit of the plan. Mr. Astor made no miscalculation, no omission; neither did he permit a sanguine hope to lead him into any wild or imaginary venture. He was practical, generous, broad. He executed what Sir Alexander Mackenzie urged should be adopted as the policy of British capital and enterprise. That one American citizen should have individually undertaken what two mammoth British companies had not the courage to try was but an additional cause which had intensified national prejudice into embittered jealousy on the part of his British rivals, the Northwest Company."

By the first article of the treaty of Ghent, entered into between Great Britain and the United States, December 14, 1814, it was agreed "that all territory, places and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other, during or after the war, should be restored." Astoria, therefore, again became the possession of the United States, and in September, 1817, the government sent the sloop-of-war Ontario "to assert the claim of the United States to the sovereignty of the adjacent country, and especially to reoccupy Astoria or Fort George." The formal surrender of the fort is dated October 6, 1818.

Mr. Astor had urged the United States to repossess Astoria, and intended fully to resume operations in the basin of the Columbia, but the Pacific Fur Company was never reorganized, and never again did the great captain of industry engage in trade on the shores of the Pacific.

CHAPTER IV.

THE NORTHWEST AND HUDSON'S BAY COMPANIES.

It is pertinent now to inquire somewhat more particularly into the fortunes and antecedent history of the Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies, which are each in turn to operate exclusively in the territory with which our volume is concerned. By the Joint-Occupancy treaty of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, it was mutually covenanted "that any country which may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open, for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention, to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claims which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of the said country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or state to any part of said country; the only object of the high contracting parties in this respect being to prevent disputes and differences among themselves."

The Northwest Company, whose members were, of course, British subjects, was, therefore, permitted to operate freely in all disputed territory, and it made good use of its privileges. Its operations extended far and wide in all directions; its emissaries were sent wherever there was a prospect of profitable trade; it respected no rights of territory; it scrupled at no trickery or dissimulation. When it learned of the expedition of Lewis and Clarke it sent Daniel W. Harmon with a party, instructing him to reach the mouth of the Columbia in advance of the Americans. The poor health of the leader prevented this. Of its efforts to circumvent Mr. Astor's occupancy of the mouth of the Columbia we have already spoken.

It showed also its intention to confirm and strengthen British title to all territories adversely claimed, and wherever a post was established the territory contiguous thereto was ceremoniously taken possession of "in the name of the king of Great Britain for the Northwest Company."

Although organized in 1774, the Northwest Company did not attain to high prestige until the dawn of the nineteenth century. Then, however, it seemed to take on new life, and before the first half decade was passed it had become the successful rival of the Hudson's Bay Company for the fur trade of the interior of North America. The Hudson's Bay Company when originally chartered in 1670 was granted in a general way the right to traffic in Hudson's bay and the territory contiguous thereto, and the Northwest Company began to insist that the grant should be more strictly construed. The boundaries of Prince Rupert's land, as the Hudson's bay territory was named, had never been definitely determined, and there had long been contention in those regions which were claimed by that company, but denied to it by the other fur traders. Beyond the recognized area of the Hudson's bay territory, the old Northwest Company (a French corporation which had fallen at the time of the fall of Canada into the possession of the British) had been a competitor of the Hudson's Bay Company. When this French association went out of existence the contest was kept up by private merchants, but without lasting success. The new Northwest Company, of Montreal, united and cemented into one organization all these individuals for the better discharge of the common purpose. It is interesting to note the theory of trade of this association as contrasted with that of the Hudson's Bay Company.

From established posts as centers of operations, the Montreal association despatched parties in all directions to visit the villages and haunts of the natives and secure furs from every source possible. It went to the natives for their goods, while the rival company so arranged its posts that these were convenient to the whole Indian population, then depended upon the aborigines to bring in their peltry and exchange the same for such articles as might supply their wants or gratify their fancies. Consequently the one company required many employees, the other comparatively few. The clerks or traders of the Montreal association were required to serve an apprenticeship of seven years at small wages. That term successfully completed, the stipend was doubled. Skill and special aptitude in trading brought speedy promotions, and the chance to become a partner in the business was an unfailing incentive to strenuous effort. The Hudson's Bay Company, on the other hand, had established fixed grades of compensation. Promotion was slow, coming periodically rather than as a reward for specially meritorious service, and though faithfulness to duty was required, no incentive was offered for special endeavor. The Hudson's Bay Company based its territorial title upon a specific grant from the crown, while the rival association sought no other title than such as priority of occupancy and pre-emption afforded. It claimed as its field of operation all unoccupied territory wherever located.

Such, in general, were the methods of the two companies whose bitter rivalry was carried to such an extent that both were brought to the verge of bankruptcy and that civil strife was at one point actually precipitated. In 1811 Lord Selkirk, a Scotch nobleman of wealth, who had become the owner of a controlling interest in the Hudson's Bay Company, attempted a grand colonization scheme. His project was to send out agricultural colonies to the basin of the Red River of the North. The enmity of the Northwest Company was at once aroused. It fully realized that Selkirk's scheme was inimical to its business, especially so because his grant lay directly across its pathway between Montreal and the interior. The effect would be to "cut its communication, interposing a hostile territory between its posts and the center of operations." The company protested that the grant was illegal, that it was corruptly secured, and urged that suit be instituted to test Lord Selkirk's title. But the government favored the project and refused to interfere. A colony was established at Assinaboia. Its governor prohibited the killing of animals within the territory, and the agents of the Northwest Company treated his proclamation with contempt. Matters grew worse and worse until hostilities broke out, which ended in a decisive victory for the Northwest Company in a pitched battle fought June 19, 1816, twenty-two of the colonists being killed. Numerous arrests of Northwesters engaged in the conflict followed, but all were acquitted in the Canadian courts. The British cabinet ordered that the governor-general of Canada should "require the restitution of all captured posts, buildings and trading stations, with the property they contained, to the proper owners, and the removal of any blockade or any interruption to the free passage of all traders and British subjects with their merchandise, furs, provisions and effects, through the lakes, rivers, roads and every route of communication used for the purpose of the fur trade in the interior of North America, and the full and free permission of all persons to pursue their usual and accustomed trade without hindrance or molestation."

But the competition between the companies continued. Both were reduced to the verge of bankruptcy. Something had to be done. The governor-general of Canada appointed a commission to investigate conditions, and that commission recommended a union of the two companies. Nothing, however, of material benefit resulted. Eventually, in the winter of 1819-20, Lord Bathurst, British secretary of state for the colonies, took up the matter, and through his mediation a union was finally effected. On March 20, 1821, it was mutually agreed that both companies should operate under the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company, furnishing equal amounts of capital and sharing equally the profits, the arrangement to continue in force for twenty-one years. By "an act for regulating the fur trade and establishing a criminal and civil jurisdiction in certain parts of North America," passed in the British parliament July 2, 1821, the crown was empowered to issue a license to the combined companies for exclusive trade "as well over the country to the east as beyond the Rocky mountains, and extending to the Pacific ocean, saving the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company over this territory." "That is to say," explains Evans, "in the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company by their charter, this license does not operate. The company in the Hudson's bay territory already enjoyed exclusive privileges; and this license recognized that territory as a province, excepting it as a British province from the operation of this license."

Agreeably to the provisions of the statute just referred to a license was granted to the Hudson's Bay Company and to William and Simon McGillivray and Edward Ellice, as representatives of the shareholders of the Northwest Company. The license was one of exclusive trade as far as all other British subjects were concerned, and was to be in force for a period of twenty-one years. It was to extend to all "parts of North America to the northward and westward of the lands and territories belonging to the United States or to any European government, state or power, reserving no rent."

Of the grantees a bond was required conditioned upon the due execution of civil process where the matter in controversy exceeded two hundred pounds, and upon the delivery for trial in the Canadian courts of all persons charged with crime. Thus it will be seen that Americans operating in the Oregon territory (which was, by act of the British parliament and the license issued under it, treated as being outside of "any legally defined civil government of the United States") were subject to be taken when accused of crime to Canada for trial. How did that comport with the treaty of 1818, one provision of which was that neither power should assert rights of sovereignty against the other? The fact that the British government required and the company agreed to enforce British law in the "territory westward of the Stony mountains" shows clearly the wish of the ever earth-hungry

British lion to circumvent the treaty of 1818 and make Oregon in fact and verity a British possession.

By 1824 all the rights and interests of the stockholders late of the Northwest Company had passed into the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company. The absorption of the one corporation by the other was complete. The treacherous and perfidious treatment of Mr. Astor and the demoralization of his partners availed the greedy Northwesters but little, for they were soon after conquered and subdued and forever deprived of their identity as a company by their powerful rival and enemy.

The Hudson's Bay Company now became the sole owner and proprietor of the trade west of the Rocky mountains, and of all the rights accruing under the license of trade of December 5, 1821. An extended narration of the methods and rules of this corporation would be very interesting, but, mindful of our assigned limits and province, we must be brief. The company has been aptly characterized by Evans as an "imperium in imperio," and such it was, for it was in possession of well-nigh absolute power over its employees and the native races with whom it traded. It was constituted "the true and absolute lords and proprietors of the territories, limits and places, save always the faith, allegiance and sovereign dominion due to us (the crown), our heirs and successors, for the same, to hold as tenants in fee and common socage, and not by knight's service, reserving as a yearly rent, two elk and two black beavers." Power was granted, should occasion arise, to "send ships-of-war, men or ammunition to any fort, post or place for the defense thereof; to raise military companies, and appoint their officers; to make war or conclude peace with any people not Christian, in any of their territories," also "to seize the goods, estate or people of those countries for damage to the company's interests, or for the interruption of trade; to erect and build forts, garrisons, towns, villages; to establish colonies, and to support such establishments by expeditions fitted out in Great Britain; to seize all British subjects not connected with the company or employed by them or in such territory by their license and send them to England." Should one of its factors, traders or other employees "contemn or disobey an order, he was liable to be punished by the president or council, who were authorized to prescribe the manner and measure of punishment. The offender had the right to appeal to the company in England, or he might be turned over for trial by the courts. For the better discovery of abuses and injuries by servants, the governor and company, and their respective president, chief agent or governor in any of the territories, were authorized to examine upon oath all factors, masters, pursers, supercargoes, commanders of castles, forts, fortifications, plantations, or colonies, or other persons, touching or concerning any matter or thing sought to be investigated." To further strengthen the hands of the company the charter concludes with a royal mandate to all "admirals, vice-admirals, justices, mayors, sheriffs, constables, bailiffs, and all and singular other our officers, ministers, liegemen, subjects whatsoever, to aid, favor, help and assist the said governor and company to enjoy, as well on land as on the seas, all the premises in said charter contained, whensoever required."

"Endowed with an empire over which the company exercised absolute dominion, subject only to fealty to the crown, its membership, powerful nobles and citizens of wealth residing near and at the court, jealously guarding its every interest, and securing for it a representation in the government itself, is it to be wondered," asks Evans, "that this imperium in imperio triumphantly asserted and firmly established British supremacy in every region in which it operated?"

Something of the modus operandi of the company must now be given. The chief factors and chief traders were paid no salaries, but in lieu thereof were given forty per cent. of the profits, divided among them on some basis deemed equitable by the company. The clerks received salaries varying from twenty to one hundred pounds per annum. Below these again were the servants, whose term of enlistment (for such in effect it was) was for five years, and whose pay was seventeen pounds per year without clothing. The servant was bound by indentures to devote his whole time and labor to the company's interests; to yield obedience to superior officers; to defend the company's property; to faithfully obey orders, laws, etc.; to defend officers and agents to the best of his ability; to serve in the capacity of a soldier whenever called upon so to do; to attend military drill; and never to engage or be interested in any trade or occupation except in accordance with the company's orders and for its benefit. In addition to the pittance paid him, the servant was entitled, should he desire to remain in the country after the expiration of his term of enlistment, to fifty acres of land, for which he was to render twenty-eight days' service per annum for seven years. If dismissed before the expiration of his term, the servant, it was agreed, should be transported to his European home free of charge. Desertion or neglect might be punished by the forfeiture of even the wretched pittance he was to receive. It was, furthermore, the policy of the company to encourage marriage with the Indian women, its purpose being to create family ties which should bind the poor slave to the soil. By the time the servant's term of enlistment had expired, there was, therefore, no choice left him but to re-enlist or accept the grant of land. "In times of peace, laborers and operators were ever on hand at mere nominal wages; in times of outbreak they were at once transformed into soldiers amenable to military usage and discipline."

The system was certainly a fine one, viewed from the standpoint of the company, but while it may command admiration for its ingenuity, it is certainly not to be commended for magnanimity. Its design and purpose was to turn the wealth of the country into the coffers of the English noblemen who owned Hudson's Bay stock, though this should be done at the expense of the manhood, the self-respect and the independence of the poor sons of toil who foolishly or from necessity bound themselves to its service.

The Indian policy of the company was no less politic than its treatment of its employees, but it had much more in it that was truly commendable. Its purpose did not bring its employees into conflict with the Indian nor require his expulsion, neither was there danger of the lands of the savage being appropriated or the graves of his people disturbed. The sale of intoxicants was positively and for the most part successfully prohibited. Conciliation was the wisest policy of the company, and it governed itself accordingly; but when punishment was merited, it was administered with promptness and severity. When depredations were committed the tribe to which the malefactor belonged was pursued by an armed force and compelled to deliver the guilty to his fate. A certain amount of civilization was introduced, and with it came an increase of wants, which wants could be supplied only at the company's forts. Indians were sent on hunting and trapping expeditions in all directions, so that concentration of tribes became difficult, and if attempted, easily perceived in time to prevent trouble. Thus the company secured an influence over the savage and a place in his affections from which it could not easily be dislodged.

In their treatment of missionaries, civil and military officers and others from the United States, the company's factors and agents were uniformly courteous and kind. Their hospitality was in the highest degree commendable, meriting the gratitude of the earliest visitors and settlers. The poor and unfortunate never asked assistance in vain. But woe to the American who attempted to trade with the Indians, to trap, hunt or do anything which brought him into competition with the British corporation! All the resources of a company supplied with an abundance of cheap labor, supported by the friendship and affection of the aboriginal peoples, backed by almost unlimited capital, and fortified by the favor of one of the wealthiest and most powerful nations of the world, were at once turned to crush him. Counter-establishments were formed in his vicinity, and he was hampered in every way possible and pursued with the relentlessness of an evil fate until compelled to retire from the field.

Such being the conditions, there was not much encouragement for American enterprise in the basin of the Columbia. It is not, however, in the American character to yield a promising prospect without a struggle, and several times efforts were made at competition in the Oregon territory. Of some of these we must speak briefly. The operations of William H. Ashley west of the Rocky mountains did not extend to the Oregon country and are of importance to our purpose only because in one of his expeditions, fitted out in 1826, he brought a six-pounder, drawn by mules, across the Rocky mountains, thereby demonstrating the feasibility of a wagon road. In 1826 Jedediah S. Smith, of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company, encouraged by some previous successes in the Snake river district, set out for the country west of the Great Salt Lake. He proceeded so far westward that no recourse was left him but to push onward to the Pacific, his stock of provisions being so reduced and his horses so exhausted as to render an attempt to return unwise. He went south to San Diego for horses and supplies, and experienced no little difficulty on account of the suspicions of the native Californians, who were jealous of all strangers, especially those from the United States. Eventually, however, he was able to proceed northward to the Rogue river, then along the shore to the Umpqua, in which vicinity serious difficulty with Indians was experienced. Fifteen of the nineteen who constituted the party were massacred; indeed, all who happened to be in the camp at the time except one were killed. This man, aided by friendly Indians, reached Fort Vancouver, and told his story to the magnanimous chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, Dr. John McLoughlin, who offered the Indians a liberal reward for the safe return of Smith and his two companions. A party of forty men was equipped at once to go to the Umpqua country, but before they got started, Smith and the men arrived. McLoughlin took steps to secure the property stolen from Smith, and so successfully did he manage the affair that peltries to the value of over three thousand dollars were recovered and the murderers were severely punished by other Indians. Smith was conquered by kindness, and at his solicitation the Rocky Mountain Fur Company retired from the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Of various other expeditions by Americans into the Oregon country and of the attempts by American vessels to trade along the coast, we cannot speak. Some reference must, however, be made to the work of Captain B. L. E. Bonneville, who, in 1831, applied for a two years' leave of absence from the United States army that he might "explore the country to the Rocky mountains and beyond, with a view to ascertain the nature and character of the several tribes of Indians inhabiting those regions; the trade which might profitably be carried on with them; quality of soil, productions, minerals, natural history, climate, geography, topography, as well as geology of the various parts of the country within the limits of the territories of the United States between our frontier and the Pacific." The request was granted. While Bonneville was informed that the government would be to no expense in fitting up the expedition, he was instructed that he must provide himself with suitable instruments and maps, and that he was to "note particularly the number of warriors that may be in each tribe of natives that may be met with, their alliances with other tribes, and their relative position as to a state of peace or war; their manner of making war, mode of subsisting themselves during a state of war and a state of peace; the arms and the effect of them; whether they act on foot or on horseback; in short, every information useful to the government." It would seem that a government which asked such important services ought to have been willing to make some financial return, at least to pay the expenses. But Captain Bonneville had to secure financial aid elsewhere. During the winter an association was formed in New York which furnished the necessary means, and on May 1, 1832, the expedition set out, the party numbering one hundred and ten men. They took with them in wagons a large quantity of trading goods to be used in traffic with the Indians in the basins of the Colorado and Columbia rivers. Bonneville himself went as far west as Fort Walla Walla. Members of his expedition entered the valleys of the Humboldt, Sacramento and Colorado rivers, but they were unable to compete with the experienced Hudson's Bay and Missouri Companies, and the enterprise proved a financial failure. The expedition derives its chief importance from the fact that it forms the basis of one of Irving's most fascinating works, which, "in language more thrilling and varied than romance, has pictured the trapper's life, its dangers, its exciting pleasures, the bitter rivalry of competing traders, the hostility of the savages," presenting a picture of the fur trade which will preserve to latest posterity something of the charm and fascination of that wild, weird traffic.

Captain Nathaniel J. Wyeth, of Massachusetts, projected in 1832 an enterprise of curious interest and some historical importance. His plan was to establish salmon fisheries on the Columbia river, to be operated as an adjunct to and in connection with the fur and Indian trade. He crossed overland to Oregon, despatching a vessel with trading goods via Cape Horn, but his vessel was never again heard from, so the enterprise met defeat. The next year Captain Wyeth returned to Boston, leaving, however, most of his party in the country. Many of the men settled in the Willamette valley, and one of them found employment as an Indian teacher for the Hudson's Bay Company.

Not to be discouraged by one failure, Captain Wyeth, in 1834, fitted out another land expedition and despatched to the Columbia another vessel, the May Dacre, laden with trading goods. On reaching the confluence of the Snake and Port Neuf rivers, Wyeth erected a trading post, to which he gave the name of Fort Hall. Having sent out his hunting and trapping parties, and made arrangements for the season's operations, he proceeded to Fort Vancouver, where, about the same time, the May Dacre arrived. He established a trading house and salmon fishery on Wapato (now Sanvie's) island, which became known as Fort William. The fishery proved a failure, and the trading and trapping industry could not stand the competition and harassing tactics of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the constant hostility of the Indians. George B. Roberts, who came to Oregon in 1831 as an employee of the Hudson's Bay Company, is quoted as having accounted for the trouble with the red men in this way. He said: "The island was thickly inhabited by Indians until 1830, when they were nearly exterminated by congestive chills and fever. There were at the time three villages on the island. So fatal were the effects of the disease, that Dr. McLoughlin sent a party to rescue and bring away the few that were left, and to burn the villages. The Indians attributed the introduction of the fever and ague to an American vessel that had visited the river a year or two previously. It is not therefore a matter of surprise to any who understand Indian character and their views as to death resulting from such diseases, that Wyeth's attempted establishment on Wapato island was subject to continued hostility. He was of a race to whom they attributed the cause of the destruction of their people; and his employees were but the lawful compensation according to their code for the affliction they had suffered."

Wyeth eventually returned to Massachusetts disheartened. Fort Hall ultimately passed into the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company, and with its acquisition by them, practically ended American fur trade west of the Rocky mountains. But though Wyeth's enterprise failed so signally, his account of it, published by order of congress, attracted the attention of Americans to Oregon, and did much to stimulate its settlement.

It will readily be seen then that whatever advantage the establishment of fur-trading enterprises might give in the final settlement of the Oregon question was with the British. We shall attempt a brief and succinct account of the "struggle for possession" in a later chapter, but it will here be our task to determine in some measure what the political mission of the Hudson's Bay Company might be and what part that association was playing in international affairs. In 1837 the company applied to the home government for a new license, granting enlarged privileges. In enforcing its request, it pointed forcibly to its efficient services in successfully crushing out American enterprise and strengthening British title to the territory, contrary to the spirit and letter of the Joint-Occupancy treaties of 1818 and 1827.

In presenting the petition, the company's chief representative in England, Sir John Henry Pelly, called the attention of the lords to the service rendered in securing to the mother country a branch of trade wrested from subjects of Russia and the United States of America; to the six permanent establishments it had on the coast, and the sixteen in the interior, besides the migratory and hunting parties; to its marine of six armed vessels; to its large pasture and grain farms, affording every species of agricultural produce and maintaining large herds of stock. He further averred that it was the intention of the company to still further extend and increase its farms, and to establish an export trade in wool, hides, tallow and other produce of the herd and the cultivated field, also to encourage the settlement of its retired servants and other emigrants under its protection. Referring to the soil, climate and other circumstances of the country, he said they were such as to make it "as much adapted to agricultural pursuits as any other spot in America; and," said he, "with care and protection, the British dominion may not only be preserved in this country, which it has been so much the wish of Russia and America to occupy to the exclusion of British subjects, but British interest and British influence may be maintained as paramount in this interesting part of the coast of the Pacific."

Sir George Simpson, who was in charge of the Hudson's Bay Company's affairs in America, in making his plea for the renewal of the license, referred to the international import of the company's operations in this language: "The possession of that country to Great Britain may be an object of very great importance; and we are strengthening that claim to it (independent of the claims of prior discovery and occupation for the purpose of Indian trade) by forming the nucleus of a colony through the establishment of farms, and the settlement of some of our retired officers and servants as agriculturists."

One might almost expect that Great Britain might utter some word of reproof to a company which could have the audacity to boast of violating her treaty compacts with a friendly power. Not so, however. She was a party to the breach of faith. Instead of administering merited reproof, she rewards the wrongdoers by the prompt issuing of a new license to extend and be in force for a period of twenty-one years. This renewed license, the date of which is May 31, 1838, granted to the company "the exclusive privilege of trading with the Indians in all such parts of North America, to the northward and westward of the islands and territories belonging to the United States of America, as shall not form part of any of our (British) provinces in North America or any lands or territories belonging to the said United States of America, or to any European government, state, or power. Without rent for the first five years, and afterward the yearly rent of five shillings, payable on the first of June."

The company was again required to furnish a bond conditioned on their executing, by their authority over the persons in their employ, "all civil and criminal process by the officers or persons usually empowered to execute such process within all territories included in the grant, and for the producing or delivering into custody, for the purpose of trial, all persons in their employ or acting under their authority within the said territories, who shall be charged with any criminal offences."

The license, however, prohibited the company "from claiming or exercising any trade with the Indians on the northwest coast of America westward of the Rocky mountains to the prejudice or exclusion of any of the subjects of any foreign state, who, under or by force of any convention for the time being between Great Britain and such foreign states may be entitled to and shall be engaged in such trade." But no provision could be framed, nor was it the wish of the grantors to frame any, which should prevent the Hudson's Bay Company from driving out by harassing tactics and fierce competition any American who might enter the Oregon territory as a trader.

One of the strangest ruses of this wonderfully shrewd and resourceful company must now receive notice. It was not in the power of the British government to convey lands in the Oregon country, neither could the Hudson's Bay Company in any way acquire legal title to realty. It therefore determined upon a bold artifice. A co-partnership was formed on the joint stock principle, the personnel of the company consisting largely of Hudson's Bay Company stockholders. The name adopted for it was the Puget Sound Agricultural Company. The idea of this association was to acquire a possessory right to large tracts of rich tillable and grazing lands, use these for agricultural purposes and pasturage until the Oregon controversy was settled, then, should the British be successful in that controversy, apply at once for articles of incorporation and a grant. It was, of course, the purpose of the promoters, from motives of self-interest as well as of patriotism, to strengthen the claim of the mother country in every possible way. Great Britain never acquired title to the lands in question; the Puget Sound Agricultural Company never gained a corporate existence; it never had anything more than a bare possessory right to any lands, a right terminating on the death or withdrawal from the company of the person seized therewith. Logically, then, we should expect the absolute failure of the scheme. But it did not fail. So forceful was this legal figment and the Hudson's Bay Company behind it, that they had the power to demand as one of the conditions upon which peace might be maintained between the two governments chiefly concerned in the Oregon controversy, that "the farms, lands and other property of every description belonging to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, on the north side of the Columbia river, shall be confirmed to the said company. In case, however, the situation of those lands and farms should be considered by the United States to be of public and political importance, and the United States government should signify a desire to obtain possession of the whole or a part thereof, the property so required shall be transferred to the government at a proper valuation, to be agreed upon between the parties."

The Puget Sound Company laid claim under the treaty to two tracts—the tract of the Nisqually, containing two hundred and sixty-one square miles, and the Cowlitz farm, containing three thousand five hundred and seventy-two acres. When the matter came up for settlement, the company asked five millions of dollars in liquidation of its claims. So the United States was forced, in the interests of peace and humanity, into an illogical agreement to purchase lands, the claim to which was established in open violation of the Joint-Occupancy treaties of 1818 and 1827. She was forced by a provision of the treaty of 1846 to obligate herself to purchase lands which the same treaty conceded as belonging to her. More humiliating still, she was compelled to reward a company for its acts of hostility to her interests in keeping out her citizens and breaking up their establishments. But the sacrifice was made in the interests of peace and civilization, and who shall say that in conserving these it lacked an abundant justification?

CHAPTER V.

PERIOD OF SETTLEMENT.

Already, it is hoped, there has been conveyed to the mind of the reader as clear an impression as the limits of this volume will permit of the first faint knockings of civilization's standard-bearers upon our western shores, of some of the expeditions by which the land so long a terra incognita was robbed of its mystery and the overland route to it discovered, and of the regime of the trapper and fur trader. It remains to treat of missionary occupancy, of the advent of the pioneer settler, of the diplomatic struggle for the possession of the country and of that second struggle for possession which cost so much hardship and sacrifice on the part of both the white and the red race and left so tragic a stain on our earlier annals.

With Wyeth's overland expedition, previously mentioned, were Dr. Nuttall, a naturalist, and J. K. Townsend, an ornithologist, both sent out by a Boston scientific society; also Rev. Jason Lee and his nephew, Rev. Daniel Lee, Cyrus Shepherd, Courtney M. Walker and P. L. Edwards, a missionary party sent out by the Methodist Missionary Board of the United States. This body of unpretentious evangelists of gospel truth were destined to exert an influence of which they little dreamed upon the imperial Hudson's Bay Company and the struggle for sovereignty in Oregon. The scientific men and the missionaries left Wyeth, who was delayed in the construction of Fort Hall, and were guided the remainder of the way by A. R. McLeod and Thomas McKay, Hudson's Bay men, to old Fort Walla Walla, which they reached September 1st. The journey from that point to Vancouver was accomplished in two weeks. Little did these devoted servants of the British fur monopoly realize that the unassuming missionary party they so kindly piloted from Fort Hall to Vancouver would prove so potential in antagonizing their interests, and those of the imperial power whose patronage they enjoyed. The missionary party, it has been said, "was but another Trojan horse within whose apparently guileless interior was confined a hostile force, which would, within a decade of years, throw wide open the gates of exclusive privilege and introduce within the jealously guarded walls a host of foes, to the utter destruction of entrenched monopoly and the final overthrow of British dominion and pretention on the Pacific coast! Well might Governor McLoughlin, the autocrat of the Pacific Northwest, when he welcomed this modest party of meek Methodists, and assigned them land near Salem, have recalled the misgivings of the Trojan prophetess: 'Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes'—"I distrust the Greeks, though they offer gifts." The American missionary was an advance agent of Yankee invasion."

About the time Wyeth's main party arrived at Vancouver came also the ship on which were his goods for the fur trade, and the furniture and supplies of the missionary party. On October 6th the goods of the missionaries were landed at Wheatland, as they named the place where the mission was to be established. By November 3d a log house was advanced sufficiently for occupation, but before the roof was on Indian children had been admitted as pupils, and by December 14th twenty-one persons, of whom seventeen were children, were baptized by Jason Lee at Vancouver.

Wyeth's enterprise, as well as all previous efforts of a like character inaugurated by Americans, was met by crushing and ruinous opposition from the autocratic British monopoly, but the missionaries were assisted and encouraged in every way. Bonneville, Wyeth and other American adventurers and traders had come to Oregon to compete with the British traders or to colonize against the interests of their fatherland. Lee and his party were there to Christianize the pagan inhabitants, to instruct the ignorant, to minister to the sick and the dying, and to set a godly example to the irreligious, the reckless and semi-barbarous employees and ex-servants of the corporation. Hence the difference in their reception. The Hudson's Bay Company, shrewd and vigilant though it was, did not and could not foresee that the attempt to convert the Indian would fail, owing to causes over which the missionaries had no control, and that the mission people would form a settlement of their own, around which would naturally cluster all the elements of society independent of the British corporation; that a social and political force would spring up hostile to the commercial interests and political ambitions of the company, potential to destroy its autocratic sway in the land and forceful to effect the final wresting of the country entirely from its control. The coming of the missionaries has been well styled the entrance of the wedge of American occupancy.

The event which prompted the outfitting of this missionary enterprise is one of the strangest and most romantic character. It shows how affairs apparently the most trivial will deeply influence and sometimes greatly change the current of human history. In one of the former historical works, in the compilation of which the writer has had a part, the story is told by Colonel William Parsons, of Pendleton, Oregon, substantially as follows:

"Far up in the mountains of Montana, in one of the many valleys which sparkle like emeralds on the western slope of the Stony range, a handful of natives, whom the whites call by the now inappropriate name of 'Flatheads,' met to ponder over the unique tale repeated by some passing mountaineer of a magic book possessed by the white man, which assured its owners of peace and comfort in this life and eternal bliss in the world beyond the grave. The Flatheads were a weak and unwarlike people; they were sorely beset by the fierce Blackfeet, their hereditary foes, through whose terrible incursions the Flatheads had been reduced in numbers and harassed so continuously that their state was most pitiable. To this remnant of a once proud race the trapper's story was a rainbow of promise; the chiefs resolved to seek this book, and possess themselves of the white man's treasure. They chose an embassy of four of their wisest and bravest men, and sent them trustfully on the tribe's errand. The quest of 'three kings of the orient,' who, two thousand years ago, started on their holy pilgrimage to the manger of the lowly babe of Bethlehem, was not more weird, nor was the search of the knights of King Arthur's round table for the Holy Grail more picturesque and seemingly more hopeless. Though they knew that there were men of the pale-face race on the lower waters of the Columbia, and one of these doubtless had told them of the book, they knew that these uncouth trappers, hunters and fishers were ungodly men in the main and not custodians of the precious volume for which their souls so earnestly longed. These were not like the fishers of old by the sea of Galilee, who received the gospel gladly, and, following the footsteps of the Master, themselves became fishers of men, but were scoffers, swearers and contemners of holy things. So the Indians, like the ancient wise men, turned their faces towards the east.

"They threaded their toilsome way by stealth through the dreaded Blackfoot country, scaled the perilous Stony mountains, descending the eastern slope, followed the tributaries of the Missouri through the dreaded country of the Dakotahs, and then pursued the windings of the Missouri till they struck the Father of Waters, arriving at St. Louis in the summer of 1832. Indians were no rarity in this outpost of civilization, and the friendless and forlorn Flatheads soon discovered that the white trappers, hunters, flatboat men, traders, teamsters, and riff-raff of a bustling young city were about the last people in the world to supply Indians who had no furs to sell with either spiritual or material solace. The embassy was not only without money, but its members could not even speak the language of the pale-faces. Nor was anyone found who could serve as interpreter. It would have been easy enough to have obtained a Bible, if they could have met with a stray colporteur, but none was in evidence, and the average denizen of St. Louis was better provided with cartridge belts and guns than with literature of any sort. In despair they applied to Governor Clarke, the official head of the territory, whose headquarters were in the town—the same William Clarke who, with Captain Meriwether Lewis, had led the expedition to the mouth of the Columbia nearly thirty years before. It is possible that they may have heard of Clarke by reason of his travels through their country a generation previous. By means of signs and such few words of jargon as they could muster they attempted to explain to Governor Clarke the purpose of their visit but it is evident that they succeeded none too well. In response to their prayer for spiritual food, he bestowed on them blankets, beads and tobacco—the routine gifts to importunate redskins—and the discouraged Flatheads abandoned their illusive quest for the magic book. Before leaving for home, the Indians made a farewell call on Governor Clarke, during which they, or one of them, made a speech. Just what the speaker said, or tried to say, may be a matter of doubt, but the report made of it and given to the press is a marvel of simple eloquence. It is as follows:

"We came to you over a trail of many moons from the setting sun. You were the friend of our fathers, who have all gone the long road. We came with our eyes partly opened for more light for our people who sit in darkness. We go back with our eyes closed. How can we go back blind to our blind people? We made our way to you with strong arms, through many enemies and strange lands, that we might carry back much to them. We go back with both arms broken and empty. The two fathers who came with us—the braves of many winters and wars—we leave here asleep by your great water and wigwams. They were tired with their journey of many moons and their moccasins were worn out.

"Our people sent us to get the white man's Book of Heaven. You took us where they worship the Great Spirit with candles, but the Book was not there. You showed us the images of good spirits, and pictures of the good land beyond, but the Book was not among them to tell us the way. You made our feet heavy with burdens of gifts, and our moccasins will grow old with carrying them, but the Book is not among them. We are going back the long, sad trail to our people. When we tell them, after one more snow, in the big council, that we did not bring the Book, no word will be spoken by our old men nor by our young braves. One by one they will rise up and go out in silence. Our people will die in darkness, and they will go on the long path to the other hunting grounds. No white man will go with them, and no Book of Heaven to make the way plain. We have no more words.

"The story of the Flathead embassy and their unique quest subsequently reached George Catlin through the medium of Governor Clarke. Catlin was an artist who had made a special study of Indian types and dress, and had painted with great ability and fidelity many portraits of noted chiefs. In the national museum at Washington, D. C., may be seen a very extensive collection of his Indian paintings, supplemented with almost innumerable recent photographs, among which are those of Chief Joseph, the great Nez Perce warrior, and the Umatilla reservation chieftains—Homeli, Peo and Paul; Showeway. Mr. Catlin was not only a portrait painter, but a gifted writer. He converted the plain, unvarnished tale of Governor Clarke concerning the Flatheads into an epic poem of thrilling interest, and gave it to the press. Its publication in the religious journals created a great sensation, and steps were immediately taken to answer the Macedonian cry of the Flatheads. The sending of Jason Lee and his party to Oregon was a result.

"The quest of the Flatheads, the sad deaths of all their ambassadors save one on the journey, and the temporary failure of their project seemed a hopeless defeat, but they 'buidled wiser than they knew,' for the very fact of their mission stirred mightily the hearts of the church people, and through that instrumentality the attention of Americans was sharply directed to the enormous value of the Pacific Northwest. The interest thus excited was timely—another decade of supine lethargy and the entire Pacific coast from Mexico to the Russian possessions would have passed irretrievably under British control.

"The Flatheads' search for the magic book was to all appearance an ignominious failure, but their plaintive cry, feeble though it was, stirred the mountain heights, and precipitated an irresistible avalanche of American enterprise into the valley of the Columbia, overwhelming the Hudson's Bay Company with its swelling volume of American immigration.

"In a lesser way, also, their mission succeeded, though success was long on the road. The western movement of white population engulfed the hated Blackfeet, thinned their numbers till they were no longer formidable, even to the Flatheads, confined them within the narrow limits of a reservation in northern Montana, where they were ordered about by a consequential Indian agent, and collared and thrust into the agency jail for every trifling misdemeanor, by the agency police; while the one time harassed and outraged Flathead roams unvexed through his emerald vales, pursues without fear to its uttermost retreat in the Rockies the lordly elk or the elusive deer, tempts the wily trout from the dark pool of the sequestered mountain torrent with the seductive fly, or lazily floats on the surface of some placid lake, which mirrors the evergreen slopes of the environing hills, peacefully withdrawing, now and again, the appetizing salmon trout from its cool, transparent depths, to be transferred presently, in exchange for gleaming silver, to some thrifty pale-face housewife or some unctuous Chinese cook for a tenderfoot tourist's dinner—forgetful all and fearless of Blackfoot ambush or deadly foray. Of a verity, the childlike quest for the magic book was not without its compensation to the posterity of the Flathead ambassadors!"

Of those Americans who came to Oregon with the early expeditions, three in 1832 and twenty-two in 1834 became permanent settlers. The names of these are preserved by W. H. Gray in his history of Oregon as follows: "From Captain Wyeth's party of 1832, there remained S. H. Smith, Sergeant, and Tibbets, a stonecutter; and from his party of 1834, James O'Neil and T. J. Hubbard. From the wreck of the William and Ann, a survivor named Felix Hathaway remained. With Ewing Young from California in 1834, a party came who remained in Oregon, consisting of Joseph Gale, who died in Union county, that state, in 1882; John McCarty, Carmichael, John Hauxhurst, John Howard, Kilborn, Brandywine, and a colored man named George Winslow. An English sailor named Richard McCary reached the Willamette from the Rocky mountains that year, as did also Captain J. H. Crouch, G. W. LeBreton, John McCaddan and William Johnson from the brig Maryland. This made (with the missionaries heretofore named) twenty-five residents at the close of 1834, who were not in any way connected with the Hudson's Bay Company, all of whom were here for other than transient purposes. There were no arrivals in 1835."

However, the year 1836 was, as may be gleaned from previous pages, an important one for Oregon. While, as Gray states, there were no permanent residences established in Oregon in 1835, that was the year in which Rev. Samuel Parker and Dr. Marcus Whitman were sent out by the American Board to explore the country and report upon it as a field for missionary labors. These gentlemen were met at the trappers' rendezvous on Green river by the noted Chief Lawyer, by whom they were persuaded into the plan of establishing their proposed mission among his people, the Nez Percés. When this conclusion was reached, Dr. Whitman started back to the east accompanied by two Nez Perce boys, Mr. Parker continuing his journey westward to the shores of the Pacific. It was agreed that Parker should seek out a suitable location among the Nez Percés for the mission, while Dr. Whitman should make arrangements for the westward journey of a sufficient force and for the establishment and outfitting of the post. The results of Mr. Parker's journeyings are embodied in a work of great historic value from his own pen, entitled "Parker's Exploring Tour Beyond the Rocky Mountains." From information conveyed by this volume, Gilbert summarizes the conditions in Oregon in 1835 as follows:

"Fort Vancouver on the Columbia, under charge of Dr. John McLoughlin, was established in 1824, and consisted of an enclosure by stockade, thirty-seven rods long by eighteen wide, that faced the south. About one hundred persons were employed at the place, and some three hundred Indians lived in the immediate vicinity. There were eight substantial buildings within the stockade, and a large number of small ones on the outside. There were 459 cattle, 100 horses, 200 sheep, 40 goats and 300 hogs belonging to the company at this place; and during the season of 1835 the crops produced in that vicinity amounted to 5,000 bushels of wheat, 1,300 bushels of potatoes, 1,000 bushels of barley, 1,000 bushels of oats, 2,000 bushels of peas, and garden vegetables in proportion. The garden, containing five acres, besides its vegetable products, included apples, peaches, grapes and strawberries. A grist mill with machinery propelled by oxen was kept in constant use, while some six miles up the Columbia was a saw mill containing several saws, which supplied lumber for the Hudson's Bay Company. Within the fort was a bakery employing three men, also shops for blacksmiths, joiners, carpenters and a tinner.

"Fort Williams, erected by N. J. Wyeth at the mouth of the Willamette, was nearly deserted, Mr. Townsend, the ornithologist, being about the only occupant at the time. Wyeth had gone to his Fort Hall in the interior. Of Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia, but two log houses and a garden remained, where two white men dragged out a dull existence, to maintain possession of the historic ground. Its ancient, romantic grandeur had departed from its walls, when dismantled to assist in the construction and defenses of its rival, Fort Vancouver. Up the Willamette river was the Methodist mission, in the condition already noted, while between it and the present site of Oregon City were the Hudson's Bay Company's French settlements of Gervais and McKay, containing some twenty families, whose children were being taught by young Americans. In one of these settlements a grist mill had just been completed. East of the Cascade mountains Fort Walla Walla was situated at the mouth of a river by that name. It was 'built of logs and was internally arranged to answer the purposes of trade and domestic comfort, and externally for defense, having two bastions, and was surrounded by a stockade.' It was accidentally burned in 1841 and rebuilt of adobe within a year. At this point the company had 'horses, cows, hogs, fowls, and they cultivated corn, potatoes and a variety of garden vegetables.' This fort was used for a trading post, where goods were stored for traffic with the Indians. Fort Colville, on the Columbia, a little above Kettle Falls, near the present line of Washington territory, a strongly stockaded post, was occupied by a half dozen men with Indian families, and Mr. McDonald was in charge. Fort Okanogan, at the mouth of the river of that name, established by David Stuart in 1811, was, in the absence of Mr. Ogden, in charge of a single white man. Concerning Fort Hall, nothing is said; but it fell into the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company in 1836. It was then a stockaded fort, but was rebuilt with adobe in 1838. Mr. Parker is also silent in regard to Fort Boise, which was constructed on Snake river from poles in 1834 as a rival establishment to Fort Hall, was occupied in 1835 by the Hudson's Bay Company, and later was more substantially constructed from adobe. If there were other establishments in 1835, west of the Rocky mountains, between the forty-second and forty-ninth parallels, the writer has failed to obtain evidences of them."

Meanwhile, Whitman was working in the east with characteristic energy, and he succeeded in raising funds and securing associates for two missions in Oregon territory. The population of Oregon was accordingly increased in the year 1836 by five persons, namely, Dr. Marcus Whitman, Narcissa (Prentiss) Whitman, Rev. H. H. Spalding and wife, and W. H. Gray. The ladies mentioned gained the distinction of having been the first white women whose feet pressed the soil of old Oregon, and whose blue and dark eyes looked into the dusky, mystic orbs of the daughters of the Columbia basin. A few months later the Methodist mission was also blessed by the purifying presence of noble womanhood, but the laurels of pioneerhood have ever rested upon the worthy brows of Mrs. Whitman and Mrs. Spalding, and so far as we know, no fair hand has ever been raised to pluck them thence. The missionary party brought with them eight mules, twelve horses and sixteen cows, also three wagons laden with farming utensils, blacksmiths' and carpenters' tools, clothing, seeds, etc., to make it possible for them to support themselves without an entire dependence upon the Hudson's Bay Company for supplies. Two of the wagons were abandoned at Fort Laramie, and heavy pressure was brought upon Dr. Whitman to leave the third at the rendezvous on Green river, but he refused to do so. He succeeded in getting it to Fort Hall intact, then reduced it to a two-wheeled cart, which he brought on to Fort Boise, thus demonstrating the feasibility of a wagon road over the Rocky mountains.

Although a reinforcement for the Methodist mission sailed from Boston in July, 1836, it failed to reach its destination on the Willamette until May of the following year, so that the American population at the close of 1836 numbered not to exceed thirty persons, including the two ladies.

Until 1836 there were no cattle in the country except those owned by the Hudson's Bay Company, and those brought from the east by the Whitman party. The Hudson's Bay Company wished to continue this condition as long as possible, well knowing that the introduction of cattle or any other means of wealth production among the American population would necessarily render the people that much more nearly independent. When, therefore, it was proposed by Ewing Young and Jason Lee that a party should be sent to California for stock, the idea was antagonized by the autocratic Columbia river monopoly. Thanks largely to the assistance of William A. Slacum, of the United States navy, by whom money was advanced and a free passage to California furnished to the people's emissaries, the projectors of the enterprise were rendered independent of the Hudson's Bay Company. Ewing Young was captain of the expedition; P. L. Edwards, of the Willamette mission, was also one of its leading spirits. The men purchased seven hundred head of cattle at three dollars per head and set out upon their return journey. They succeeded in getting about six hundred head to the Willamette country, notwithstanding the bitter hostility of the Indians. Gilbert quotes from the diary of P. L. Edwards, which he says was shown him by the latter's daughter in California, to prove that the trouble with the Indians was caused by the wanton and cold-blooded murder by members of the party of a friendly Indian who was following the band. The Indian hostilities were not incited by the Hudson's Bay Company, as some have stated, but may properly be laid at the doors of the men who committed this barbarous outrage in revenge for wrongs suffered by a party to which they belonged two years before.

The arrival of neat cattle in the Willamette country provided practically the first means of acquiring wealth independent of the Hudson's Bay Company. "This success in opposition to that interest," says Gilbert, "was a discovery by the settlers, both Americans and ex-employees, that they possessed the strength to rend the bars that held them captives under a species of peonage. With this one blow, directed by missionaries, and dealt by ex-American hunters, an independent maintenance in Oregon had been rendered possible for immigrants."

As before stated, the reinforcements for the Methodist mission arrived in May, 1837. By it the American population was increased eight persons, namely, Elijah White and wife, Alanson Beers and wife, W. H. Wilson, the Misses Annie M. Pitman, Susan Downing and Elvina Johnson. In the fall came another reinforcement, the personnel of which was Rev. David Leslie, wife and three daughters, the Rev. W. H. K. Perkins and Miss Margaret Smith. Add to these Dr. J. Bailey, an English physician, George Gay and John Turner, who also arrived this year, and the thirty or thirty-one persons who settled previously, and we have the population of Oregon independent of the Hudson's Bay Company's direct or indirect control in the year 1837.

In January of that year, W. H. Gray, of the American Board's mission, set out overland to the east for reinforcements to the missionary force of which he was a member. His journey was not an uneventful one as will appear from the following narrative, clothed in his own words, which casts so vivid a light upon transcontinental travel during the early days that we feel constrained to quote it:

Our sketches, perhaps, would not lose in interest by giving a short account of a fight which our Flathead Indians had at this place with a war party of the Blackfeet. It occurred near the present location of Helena, in Montana. As was the custom with the Flathead Indians in traveling in the buffalo country, their hunters and warriors were in advance of the main camp. A party of twenty-five Blackfeet warriors was discovered by some twelve of our Flatheads. To see each other was to fight, especially parties prowling about in this manner, and at it they went. The first fire of the Flatheads brought five of the Blackfeet to the ground and wounded five more. This was more than they expected, and the Blackfeet made little effort to recover their dead, which were duly scalped and their bodies left for food for the wolves, and the scalps borne in triumph to the camp. There were but two of the Flatheads wounded: one had a flesh wound in the thigh, and the other had his right arm broken by a Blackfoot ball.

The victory was complete, and the rejoicing in camp corresponded to the number of scalps taken. Five days and nights the usual scalp dance was performed. At the appointed time the big war drum was sounded, when the warriors and braves made their appearance at the appointed place in the open air, painted as warriors. Those who had taken the scalps from the heads of their enemies bore them in their hands upon the ramrods of their guns.

They entered the circle, and the war song, drums, rattles and noises all commenced. The scalp-bearers stood for a moment (as if to catch the time), and then commenced hopping, jumping and yelling in concert with the music. This continued for a time, when some old painted woman took the scalps and continued to dance. The performance was gone through with as many nights as there were scalps taken.

Seven days after the scalps were taken, a messenger arrived bearing a white flag, and a proposition to make peace for the purpose of trade. After the preliminaries had all been completed, in which the Hudson's Bay Company trader had the principal part to perform, the time was fixed for a meeting of the two tribes. The Flatheads, however, were all careful to dig their warpits, make their corrals and breastworks, and, in short, fortify their camp as much as if they expected a fight instead of peace. Ermatinger, the company's leader, remarked that he would sooner take his chances of a fight off-hand than endure the anxiety and suspense of the two days we waited for the Blackfeet to arrive. Our scouts and warriors were all ready and on the watch for peace or war, the latter of which from the recent fight they had had was expected most. At length the Blackfeet arrived, bearing a red flag with "H. B. C." in white letters upon it, and advancing to within a short distance of the camp, were met by Ermatinger and a few Flathead chiefs, shook hands and were conducted to the trader's lodge—the largest one in the camp—and the principal chiefs of both tribes, seated upon buffalo and bear skins, all went through with the ceremony of smoking a big pipe, having a long handle or stem trimmed with horse hair and porcupine quills. The pipe was filled with the traders' tobacco and the Indians' killikinick. The war chiefs of each tribe took a puff of the pipe, then passed it each to his right-hand man, and so around till all the circle had smoked the big medicine pipe, or pipe of peace, which on this occasion was made by the Indians from a soft stone which they find in abundance in their country, having no extra ornamental work upon it. The principal chief in command, or great medicine man, went through the ceremony, puffed four times, blowing his smoke in four directions. This was considered a sign of peace to all around him, which doubtless included all he knew anything about. The Blackfeet, as a tribe, are a tall, well formed, slim built and active people. They travel principally on foot, and are considered very treacherous.

The peace made with so much formality was broken two days afterward by killing two of the Flatheads when caught not far from the main camp.

It was from this Flathead tribe that the first Indian delegation was sent to ask for teachers. Three of their number volunteered to go with Gray to the States in 1837 to urge their claim for teachers to come among them. The party reached Ash Hollow, where they were attacked by about three hundred Sioux warriors, and, after fighting for three hours, killed some fifteen of them, when the Sioux, by means of a French trader then among them, obtained a parley with Gray and his traveling companions—two young men who had started to go to the United States with him. While the Frenchman was in conversation with Gray, the treacherous Sioux made a rush upon the three Flatheads, one Snake and one Iroquois Indian belonging to the party, and killed them. The Frenchman then turned to Gray and told him and his companions they were prisoners, and must go to the Sioux camp, first attempting to get possession of their guns. Gray informed them at once: "You have killed our Indians in a cowardly manner, and you shall not have our guns," at the same time telling the young men to watch the first motion of the Indians to take their lives, and if we must die to take as many Indians with us as we could. The Sioux had found in the contest thus far that, notwithstanding they had conquered and killed five, they had lost fifteen, among them one of their war chiefs, besides several severely wounded. The party was not further molested till they reached the camp, containing between one and two hundred lodges. A full explanation was had of the whole affair. Gray had two horses killed under him and two balls passed through his hat, both inflicting slight wounds. The party were feasted, and smoked the pipe of peace over the dead body of the chief's son. Next day they were allowed to proceed with nine of their horses; the balance, with the property of the Indians, the Sioux claimed as part pay for their losses, doubtless calculating to waylay and take the balance of the horses. Be that as it may, Gray and his young men reached Council Bluffs in twenty-one days, traveling nights and during storms to avoid the Indians on the plains.

Gray proceeded east, and with the energy and courage which ever characterized him, set about the task of securing the needed reinforcements. He succeeded in enlisting Rev. Cushing Eells, Rev. E. Walker and Rev. A. B. Smith, with their wives, also a young man named Cornelius Rogers. He also succeeded in inducing a young woman to become his own bride and to share with him the dangers and tedium of a transcontinental journey and whatever of weal or woe the new land might have in store for them. Mention should likewise be made of the noted John A. Sutter, an ex-captain of the Swiss guard, who accompanied this expedition and who afterward became an important character in the early history of California.

Two priests, Rev. F. N. Blanchet and Modest Demers, also came during this year, so the seeds of sectarian strife, which did so much to neutralize the efforts and work of the Protestant missionaries, then began to be sown. The population of Oregon, independent of the Hudson's Bay Company, must have been about sixty at the close of the year 1838.

In the fall of 1839 came Rev. J. S. Griffin and Mr. Munger, with their wives, Ben Wright, Lawson, Keiser and Deiger, also T. H. Farnham, author of "Early Days in California," Sidney Smith, Blair and Robert Shortess. W. H. Gray, in his history of Oregon, estimates the population as follows: "Protestant missionaries, 10; Roman priests, 2; physicians, 2; laymen, 6; women, 13; children, 10; settlers, 20; settlers under Hudson's Bay control with American tendencies, 10; total, 83."

In 1838 Jason Lee made a journey overland to the states for the purpose of procuring a force wherewith to greatly extend his missionary operations. His wife died during his absence and the sad news was forwarded to him by Dr. McLoughlin, Dr. Whitman and a man hired by Gray. In June, 1840, Lee returned with a party of forty-eight, of whom eight were clergymen, one was a physician, fifteen were children and nineteen were ladies, five of them unmarried. Their names are included in Gray's list of arrivals for 1840, which is as follows:

"In 1840 Mrs. Lee, second wife of Rev. Jason Lee; Rev. J. H. Frost and wife; Rev. A. F. Waller, wife and two children; Rev. W. W. Kone and wife; Rev. G. Hines, wife and sister; Rev. L. H. Judson, wife and two children; Rev. J. L. Parish, wife and three children; Rev. G. P. Richards, wife and three children; Rev. A. P. Olley and wife. Laymen: Mr. George Abernethy, wife and two children; Mr. H. Campbell, wife and one child; Mr. W. W. Raymond and wife; Mr. H. B. Brewer and wife; Dr. J. L. Babcock, wife and one child; Rev. Mrs. Daniel Lee, Mrs. David Carter, Mrs. Joseph Holman and Mrs. E. Phillips. Methodist Episcopal Protestant mission: Robert Moore, James Cook and James Fletcher, settlers. Jesuit priest: P. J. De Smet, Flathead mission. Rocky mountain men with native wives: William Craig, Robert or Dr. Newell, J. L. Meek, George Ebbetts, William M. Dougherty, John Larison, George Wilkinson, a Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Algear, and William Johnson, author of 'Leni Leoti; or, The Prairie Flower.'" Mr. Gray estimates the population of all the Oregon territory, not including Hudson's Bay operatives, at about two hundred.

In 1841 eight young men built and equipped a vessel, named the Star of Oregon, in which they made a trip to San Francisco. Joseph Gale served as captain of the doughty little craft, of which Felix Hathaway had been master builder. The vessel was exchanged at Yerba Buena (San Francisco) for three hundred and fifty cows. Gale remained in the Golden State through the winter, then set out overland to Oregon with a party of forty-two immigrants, who brought with them, as J. W. Nesmith informs us, one thousand two hundred and fifty head of cattle, six hundred head of mares, colts, horses and mules, and three thousand sheep. The incident forms the theme of one of Mrs. Eva E. Dye's most charming descriptions, but its strategic importance in helping to Americanize Oregon and break up the cattle monopoly seems to have been overlooked by many other writers.

The Joseph Gale who figured so prominently in this undertaking was afterward a member of the first triumvirate executive committee of the provisional government. He is affectionately remembered in eastern Oregon, where he passed the closing years of his eventful life.

By the close of the year 1841 the independent population of Oregon had reached two hundred and fifty-three, thirty-five of whom are classed as settlers. In 1842 came an immigration of one hundred and eleven persons, two of whom, A. L. Lovejoy and A. M. Hastings, were lawyers. In this year, also, came the Red river immigration of English and Scotch and of French-Canadian half-breeds to the Puget sound country. This immigration was inspired by the Hudson's Bay Company, which designed it as an offset to the growing American power in the Oregon country. It had, however, very little political effect, as many of its members drifted southward into the Willamette country and became members of the provisional government. The year 1842 is also memorable for the famous winter ride of Dr. Whitman.

In 1843 came the largest immigration the Oregon country had yet known, piloted across the plains and over the mountains by Whitman himself. Its eight hundred and seventy-five persons, with their wagons and thirteen hundred head of cattle, settled forever the question of the national character of Oregon. J. W. Nesmith has preserved for us the names of all the male members of this expedition over sixteen years of age, as also of those remaining from the immigrations of the year previous. In 1844 came eight hundred more Americans, and in 1845 a much larger number, estimated by some at three thousand. The year 1846 added another thousand to Oregon's American population. In it the ownership of the country was definitely settled by treaty with Great Britain, and the famous world problem was solved.

It is impossible here to adequately treat of life and conditions in the Northwest during those early days of American occupation. Some idea of the inner life of the first settlers of Oregon may be gained from the following excerpt from a lecture by Colonel J. W. Nesmith, delivered before the Oregon Pioneer Association:

The business of the country was conducted entirely by barter. The Hudson's Bay Company imported and sold many articles of prime necessity to those who were able to purchase. Wheat or beaver skins would buy anything the company had for sale. But poor, wayworn emigrants, just arriving in the country, were as destitute of wheat and beaver as they were of coin. The skins purchased by the company were annually shipped in their own vessels to London, while the wheat was shipped to the Russian possessions on the north and to California, to fill a contract that the Hudson's Bay Company had with the Russian Fur Company. A small trade in lumber, salt, salmon, shingles and hoop-poles gradually grew up with the Sandwich islands, and brought in return a limited supply of black and dirty sugar in grass sacks, together with some salt and coffee.

There being no duty collected upon importations into Oregon previous to 1840, foreign goods were comparatively cheap, though the supply was always limited; nor had the people means to purchase beyond the pure necessities. Iron, steel, salt, sugar, coffee, tea, tobacco, powder and lead, and a little ready-made clothing and some sewing and domestics, were the principal articles purchased by the settlers. The Hudson's Bay Company, in their long intercourse with the Indians, had, from prudential motives, adopted the plan in their trade of passing articles called for out through a hole in the wall or partition. Persons were not allowed inside among the goods to make selections, and the purchaser had to be content with what was passed out to him through the aperture. Thus in buying a suit of clothes, there was often an odd medley of color and size. The settlers used to say that Dr. McLaughlin, who was a very large man, had sent his measure to London, and all the clothing was made to fit him. The hickory shirts we used to buy came down to our heels and the wrist-bands protruded a foot beyond the hands; and as Sancho Panza said of sleep, "they covered one all over like a mantle." They were no such "teatsy sark" affairs of "Pansley ham" as befuddled Tam O'Shanter saw when peeping in upon the dancing warlocks of "Alloway's auld haunted kirk." A small sized settler, purchasing one, could, by reasonable curtailment of the extremities, have sufficient material to clothe one of the children.

* * * * *

The pioneer home was a log cabin with a puncheon floor and mud chimney, all constructed without sawed lumber, glass or nails, the boards being secured upon the roof by heavy-weight poles. Sugar, coffee, tea and even salt were not every-day luxuries, and in many cabins were entirely unknown. Moccasins made of deer and elk skins and soled with rawhide made a substitute for shoes, and were worn by both sexes. Buckskin was the material from which the greater portion of the male attire was manufactured, while the cheapest kind of coarse cotton goods furnished the remainder. A white or boiled shirt was rarely seen and was a sure indication of great wealth and aristocratic pretension. Meat was obtained in some quantities from the wild game of the forests or the wild fowl with which the country abounded at certain seasons, until such time as cattle or swine became sufficiently numerous to be slaughtered for food. The hides of both wild and domestic animals were utilized in many ways. Clothing, moccasins, saddles and their rigging, bridles, ropes, harness and other necessary articles were made from them. A pair of buckskin pants, moccasins, a hickory shirt and some sort of cheaply extemporized hat, rendered a man comfortable as well as presentable in the best society, the whole outfit not costing one-tenth part of the price of the essential gewgaws that some of our exquisite sons now sport at the ends of their watch chains, on their shirt-fronts or dainty fingers. Buckskin clothing answered wonderfully well for rough-and-tumble wear, particularly in dry weather, but I have known them after exposure to a hard day's rain to contract in a single night by a warm fire a foot in longitude, and after being subjected to a webfoot winter or two, and a succeeding dry summer, they would assume grotesque and unfashionable shapes, generally leaving from six inches to a foot of nude and arid skin between the top of the moccasins and the lower end of the breeches; the knees protruded in front, while the rear started off in the opposite direction, so that when the wearer stood up the breeches were in a constant struggle to sit down and vice versa.

The pioneers brought garden seeds with them, and much attention was paid to the production of vegetables, which, with milk, game and fish, went a long way toward the support of the family. Reaping machines, threshers, headers, mowing machines, pleasure carriages, silks, satins, laces, kid gloves, plug hats, high-heeled boots, crinolines, bustles, false hair, hair dye, jewelry, patent medicines, railroad tickets, postage stamps, telegrams, pianos and organs, together with a thousand and one other articles to purchase which the country is now drained of millions of dollars annually, were then unknown and consequently not wanted. A higher civilization has introduced us to all these modern improvements, and apparently made them necessary, together with the rum mill, the jail, the insane asylum, the poor-house, the penitentiary and the galleys.

Of the people who lived in Oregon during this period, Judge Bennett, in his book entitled "Recollections of an Old Pioneer," says:

"Among the men who came to Oregon the year I did, some were idle, worthless young men, too lazy to work at home and too gentle to steal, while some were gamblers, and others reputed thieves. But when we arrived in Oregon, they were compelled to work or starve. It was a bare necessity. There was no able relative or indulgent friend upon whom the idle could quarter themselves, and there was little or nothing for the rogues to steal. There was no ready way by which they could escape into another country, and they could not conceal themselves in Oregon. I never knew so fine a population, as a whole community, as I saw in Oregon most of the time I was there. They were all honest because there was nothing to steal; they were all sober because there was no liquor to drink; there were no misers because there was nothing to hoard; they were all industrious because it was work or starve."

Such was the general character of the early pioneer as depicted by men who knew whereof they spoke. Another characteristic strongly appeals to the mind of the historian—his political capabilities. His environment and isolation from the rest of the world compelled him to work out for himself many novel and intricate economic problems; the uncertainty as to the ownership of the Oregon territory and the diverse national prejudices and sympathies of its settlers made the formation of a government reasonably satisfactory to the whole population an exceedingly difficult task. There were, however, men in the new community determined to make the effort, and the reader will be able to judge from what follows how well they succeeded.

As early as 1838 some of the functions of government were exercised by members of the Methodist mission. Persons were chosen by that body to officiate as magistrates and judges, and their findings were generally acquiesced in by persons independent of the Hudson's Bay Company because of the unorganized condition of the community, though there was doubtless a strong sentiment among the independent settlers in favor of trusting to the general morality and disposition to do right rather than to any political organization. The most important act of the mission officers was the trial of T. J. Hubbard for the killing of a man who attempted to enter his house at night with criminal intent. Rev. David Leslie presided as judge during this noteworthy judicial proceeding, which resulted in the acquittal of the defendant on the ground that his act was excusable.

As early as 1840 efforts began to be made to induce the United States government to extend to the people of the Northwest its jurisdiction and laws, although to do this was an impossibility except by abrogation of the Joint-Occupancy treaty of 1827 and the satisfactory settlement of the title—all which would require at least a year's time. A petition was, nevertheless, drafted, signed by David Leslie and a number of others and forwarded to congress. It was not entirely free from misstatements and inaccuracies, but is considered, nevertheless, an able and important state paper. Inasmuch as the population of Oregon, including children, did not exceed two hundred at this time, the prayer of the petitioners, it need hardly be said, was not granted. But it must not be supposed that the document was therefore without effect. It did its part toward opening the eyes of the people of the east and of congress to the importance and value of Oregon, and toward directing public attention to the domain west of the Rocky mountains.

Notwithstanding the paucity of the white people of Oregon, the various motives that impelled them thither had divided them into four classes—the Hudson's Bay Company, the Catholic clergy and their following, the Methodist missions and the settlers. The Catholics and the company were practically a unit politically. The settlers favored the missions only in so far as they served the purpose of helping to settle the country, caring little about their religious influence and opposing their ambitions.

The would-be organizers of a government found their opportunity in the conditions presented by the death of Ewing Young. This audacious pioneer left considerable property and no legal representatives, and the question was, what should be done with his belongings? Had he been a Hudson's Bay man or a Catholic, the company or the church would have taken care of the property. Had he been a missionary, his coadjutors might have administered, but being a plain American citizen, there was no functionary possessed of even a colorable right to exercise jurisdiction over his estate. In the face of this emergency, the occasion of Young's funeral, which occurred February 17, 1841, was seized upon for attempting the organization of some kind of a government. At an impromptu meeting, it was decided that a committee should perform the legislative functions and that the other officers of the new government should be a governor, a supreme judge with probate jurisdiction, three justices of the peace, three constables, three road commissioners, an attorney-general, a clerk of the court and public recorder, a treasurer and two overseers of the poor. Nominations were made for all these offices, and the meeting adjourned until next day, when, it was hoped, a large representation of the citizens of the valley would assemble at the mission house.

The time specified saw the various factions in full force at the place of meeting. A legislative committee was appointed as follows: Revs. F. N. Blanchet, Jason Lee, Gustavus Hines and Josiah L. Parish; also Messrs. D. Donpierre, M. Charlevo, Robert Moore, E. Lucier and William Johnson. No governor was chosen; the Methodists secured the judgeship, and the Catholics the clerk and recorder. Had the friends of the organization been more fortunate in their choice of a chairman of the legislative committee, the result of the movement might have been different, but Rev. Blanchet never called a meeting of his committee, and the people who assembled on June 1st to hear and vote upon proposed laws, found their congregating had been in vain. Blanchet resigned; Dr. Bailey was chosen to fill the vacancy, and the meeting adjourned until October. First, however, it ordered the committee to confer with Commodore Wilkes, of the American squadron, and John McLoughlin, chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, with regard to forming a constitution and code of laws.

Wilkes discouraged the movement, considering it unnecessary and impolitic to organize a government at the time. He assigned the following reasons:

"First—On account of their want of right, as those wishing for laws were, in fact, a small minority of the settlers.

"Second—That these were not yet necessary, even by their own account.

"Third—That any laws they might establish would be but a poor substitute for the moral code they all now followed, and that evil-doers would not be disposed to settle near a community entirely opposed to their practices.

"Fourth—The great difficulty they would have in enforcing any laws and defining the limits over which they had control, and the discord this might occasion in their small community.

"Fifth—They not being the majority and the larger portion of the population Catholics, the latter would elect officers of their party, and they would thus place themselves entirely under the control of others.

"Sixth—The unfavorable impression it would produce at home, from the belief that the missionaries had admitted that in a community brought together by themselves, they had not enough of moral force to control it and prevent crime, and therefore must have recourse to a criminal code."

The friends of the movement could not deny the cogency of this reasoning, and, it appears, concluded to let the matter drop. The October meeting was never held, and thus the first attempt at forming a government ended. However, the judge elected made a satisfactory disposition of the Young estate.

But the question of forming an independent or provisional government continued to agitate the public mind. During the winter of 1842-3 a lyceum was organized at Willamette Falls, now Oregon City, at which the propriety of taking steps in that direction was warmly debated. On one evening the subject for discussion was: "Resolved, That it is expedient for the settlers on this coast to establish an independent government." McLoughlin favored the resolution and it carried. Mr. Abernethy, defeated in this debate, skillfully saved the day by introducing as the topic of the next discussion: "Resolved, That if the United States extends its jurisdiction over this country within four years, it will not be expedient to form an independent government." This resolution was also carried after a spirited discussion, destroying the effect of the first resolution.

Meanwhile, the settlers in the vicinity of the Oregon Institute were skillfully working out a plan whereby a provisional government might be formed. They knew the sentiment of their confreers at the Falls, the result of the deliberations at that place having been reported to them by Mr. Le Breton; they knew also that their designs would meet with opposition from both the Hudson's Bay Company and the mission people. The problem to be solved was how to accomplish their ends without stirring up opposition which would overwhelm them at the very outset. Their solution of this problem is a lasting testimony to their astuteness and finesse.

As a result of the formation of the Willamette Cattle Company and its success in importing stock from California, almost every settler was the owner of at least a few head, and, of course, the Hudson's Bay Company and the missions also had their herds. The fact that wolves, bears and panthers were destructive to the cattle of all alike furnished one bond of common interest uniting the diverse population of Oregon, and this conference furnished the conspirators their opportunity. Their idea was that having got an object before the people on which all could unite, they might advance from the ostensible object, protection for domestic animals, to the more important, though hidden object, "preservation for both property and person." The "wolf meeting," as it is called, convened on the 2d of February, 1843, and was fully attended. It was feared that Dr. I. L. Babcock, the chairman, might suspect the main object, but in this instance he was less astute than some others. The utmost harmony prevailed. It was moved that a committee of six should be appointed by the chair to devise a plan and report at a future meeting, to convene, it was decided, on the first Monday in March next at ten o'clock a. m.

After the meeting pursuant to adjournment had completed its business by organizing a campaign against wolves, bears and panthers, and adopting rules and regulations for the government of all in their united warfare upon pests, one gentleman arose and addressed the assembly, complimenting it upon the justice and propriety of the action taken for the protection of domestic animals, but "How is it, fellow-citizens," said he, "with you and me and our children and wives? Have we any organization upon which we can rely for mutual protection? Is there any power or influence in the country sufficient to protect us and all we hold dear on earth from the worse than wild beasts that threaten and occasionally destroy our cattle? Who in our midst is authorized at this moment to protect our own and the lives of our families? True, the alarm may be given as in a recent case, and we may run who feel alarmed, and shoot off our guns, while our enemy may be robbing our property, ravishing our wives and burning the houses over our defenseless families. Common sense, prudence and justice to ourselves demand that we act in consistency with the principles we commenced. We have mutually and unitedly agreed to defend and protect our cattle and domestic animals; now, fellow-citizens, I submit and move the adoption of the two following resolutions, that we may have protection for our persons and lives, as well as our cattle and herds:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the propriety of taking measures for the civil and military protection of this colony.

"Resolved, That said committee consist of twelve persons."

If an oratorical effort is to be judged by the effect produced upon the audience, this one deserves place among the world's masterpieces. The resolutions carried unanimously. The committee appointed consisted of I. L. Babcock, Elijah White, James A. O'Neil, Robert Shortess, Robert Newell, Etienne Lucier, Joseph Gervais, Thomas Hubbard, C. McRoy, W. H. Gray, Sidney Smith and George Gay. Its first meeting was held before a month had elapsed, the place being Willamette Falls. Jason Lee and George Abernethy appeared and argued vehemently against the movement as premature. When the office of governor was stricken from the list, the committee unanimously decided to call another meeting for the ensuing 2d of May.

W. H. Gray, in his history of Oregon, describes this decisive occasion thus:

"The 2d of May, the day fixed by the committee of twelve to organize a settlers' government, was close at hand. The Indians had all learned that the 'Bostons' were going to have a big meeting, and they also knew that the English and French were going to meet with them to oppose what the 'Bostons' were going to do. The Hudson's Bay Company had drilled and trained their voters for the occasion, under the Rev. F. N. Blanchet and his priests, and they were promptly on the ground in an open field near a small house, and, to the amusement of every American present, trained to vote 'No' to every motion put; no matter if to carry their point they should have voted 'Yes,' it was 'No.' Le Breton had informed the committee, and the Americans generally, that this would be the course pursued, according to instructions, hence our motions were made to test their knowledge of what they were doing, and we found just what we expected was the case. The priest was not prepared for our manner of meeting him, and, as the record shows, 'considerable confusion was existing in consequence.' By this time we had counted votes. Says Le Breton, 'We can risk it; let us divide and count.' 'I second the motion,' says Gray. 'Who's for a divide?' sang out old Joe Meek, as he stepped out. 'All for the report of the committee and an organization, follow me.' This was so sudden and unexpected that the priest and his voters did not know what to do, but every American was soon in line. Le Breton and Gray passed the line and counted fifty-two Americans and but fifty French and Hudson's Bay men. They announced the count — 'Fifty-two for and fifty against.' 'Three cheers for our side!' sang out old Joe Meek. Not one of those old veteran mountain voices was lacking in that shout for liberty. They were given with a will, and in a few seconds the chairman, Judge I. L. Babcock, called the meeting to order, and the priest and his band slunk away into the corners of the fences and in a short time mounted their horses and left."

After the withdrawal of the opponents of this measure, the meeting became harmonious, of course. Its minutes show that A. E. Wilson was chosen supreme judge; G. W. Le Breton, clerk of the court and recorder; J. L. Meek, sheriff; W. H. Willson, treasurer; Messrs. Hill, Shortess, Newell, Beers, Hubbard, Gray, O'Neil, Moore and Dougherty, legislative committee; and that constables, a major and captains were also chosen. The salary of the legislative committee was fixed at $1.25 per diem each member, and it was instructed to prepare a code of laws to be submitted to the people at Champoeg on the 5th day of July.

On the day preceding this date, the anniversary of America's birth was duly celebrated, Rev. Gustavus Hines delivering the oration.

Quite a number who had opposed organization at the previous meeting were present on the 5th and announced their determination to acquiesce in the action of the majority and to yield obedience to any government which might be formed, but representatives of the Hudson's Bay Company even went so far in their opposition as to address a letter to the leaders of the movement asserting their ability to defend both themselves and their political rights.

A review of the "Organic laws" adopted at this meeting would be interesting, but such is beyond the scope of our volume. Suffice it to say that they were so liberal and just, so complete and comprehensive, that it has been a source of surprise to students ever since that untrained mountaineers and settlers, without experience in legislative halls, could conceive a system so well adapted to the needs and conditions of the country. The preamble runs: "We, the people of Oregon territory, for the purposes of mutual protection, and to secure peace and prosperity among ourselves, agree to adopt the following laws and regulations, until such time as the United States of America extend their jurisdiction over us." The two weaknesses, which were soonest felt, were the result of the opposition to the creation of the office of governor and to the levying of taxes. The former difficulty was overcome by substituting, in 1844, a gubernatorial executive for the triumvirate which had theretofore discharged the executive functions, and the latter by raising the necessary funds by popular subscription. In 1844, also, a legislature was substituted for the legislative committee.

Inasmuch as the first election resulted favorably to some who owed allegiance to the British government as well as to others who were citizens of the United States, the oath of office was indited as follows: "I do solemnly swear that I will support the organic laws of the provisional government of Oregon, so far as the said organic laws are consistent with my duties as a citizen of the United States, or a subject of Great Britain, and faithfully demean myself in office. So help me God."

Notwithstanding the opposition to the provisional government, the diverse peoples over whom it exercised authority, and the weaknesses in it resulting from the spirit of compromise of its authors, it continued to exist and discharge all the necessary functions of sovereignty until, on August 14, 1848, in answer to the numerous memorials and petitions, and the urgent appeals of Messrs. Thornton and Meek, congress at last decided to give to Oregon a territorial form of government with all the rights and privileges usually accorded to territories of the United States. Joseph Lane, of Indiana, whose subsequent career presents so many brilliant and so many sad chapters, was appointed territorial governor.

CHAPTER VI.

THE OREGON CONTROVERSY.

The reader is now in possession of such facts as will enable him to approach intelligently the contemplation of the great diplomatic war of the century, the Oregon controversy. It may be safely asserted that never before in the history of nations did diplomacy triumph over such wide differences of opinion and sentiment and effect a peaceable adjustment of such divergent international interests. Twice actual conflict of arms seemed imminent, but the spirit of compromise and mutual forbearance ultimately won, a fact which shows that the leaven of civilization was working on both sides of the Atlantic, and gives reason to hope that the day when the swords of the nations shall be beaten into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks may not be as far in the future as some suppose.

We need not attempt to trace all the conflicting claims which were at any time set up by different nations to parts or the whole of the old Oregon territory, nor to go into the controversy in all its multiform complications, but will confine our inquiry mainly to the negotiations after Great Britain and the United States became the sole claimants. France early established some right to what was denominated "the western part of Louisiana," which, in 1762, she conveyed to Spain. This was retroceded to France some thirty-eight years later, and in 1803 was by that nation conveyed with the rest of Louisiana to the United States. So France was left out of the contest. In 1819, by the treaty of Florida, Spain ceded to the United States all right and title whatsoever which she might have to the territory on the Pacific, north of the forty-second parallel.

What then were the claims of the United States to this vast domain? Naturally, they were of a three-fold character. Our government claimed first in its own right. The Columbia river was discovered by a citizen of the United States and named by him. The river had been subsequently explored from its sources to its mouth by a government expedition under Lewis and Clarke. This had been followed and its effects strengthened by American settlements upon the banks of the river. While Astoria, the American settlement, had been captured in the war of 1812-15, it had been restored in accordance with the treaty of Ghent, one provision of which was that "all territory, places and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, shall be restored without delay."

It was a well established and universally recognized principle of international law that the discovery of a river followed within a reasonable time by acts of occupancy, conveyed the right to the territory drained by the river and its tributary streams. This, it was contended, would make the territory between forty-two degrees and fifty-one degrees north latitude the rightful possession of the United States.

The Americans claimed secondly as the successors of France. By the treaty of Utrecht, the date whereof was 1713, the north line of the Louisiana territory was established as a dividing line between the Hudson's bay territory and the French provinces in Canada. For centuries it had been a recognized principle of international law that "continuity" was a strong element of territorial claim. All European powers, when colonizing the Atlantic seaboard, construed their colonial grants to extend, whether expressly so stated or otherwise, entirely across the continent to the Pacific ocean, and most of these grants conveyed in express terms a strip of territory bounded north and south by stated parallels of latitude, and east and west by the oceans. Great Britain herself had stoutly maintained this principle, even going so far as to wage with France for its integrity the war which was ended by the treaty of 1763. By that England acquired Canada and renounced to France all territory west of the Mississippi river. It was therefore contended on the part of the United States that England's claim by continuity passed to France and from France by assignment to this nation. This claim, of course, was subject to any rights which might prove to belong to Spain.

Thirdly, the United States claimed as the successor of Spain all the rights which that nation might have acquired by prior discovery or otherwise having accrued to the United States by the treaty of Florida.

In the negotiations between Great Britain and the United States which terminated in the Joint-Occupancy treaty of 1818, the latter nation pressed the former for a final quit-claim to all territory west of the Rocky mountains. In so doing it asserted its intention "to be without reference or prejudice to the claims of any other power," but it was contended on the part of the American negotiators, Gallatin and Rush, that the discovery of the Columbia by Gray, its exploration by Lewis and Clarke, and the American settlement at Astoria, rendered the claim of the United States "at least good against Great Britain to the country through which such river flowed, though they did not assert that the United States had a perfect right to the country."

When, however, the United States succeeded to Spain, it was thought that all clouds upon its title were completely dispelled, and thereafter it was the contention of this government that its right to sole occupancy was perfect and indisputable. Great Britain, however, did not claim that her title amounted to one of sovereignty or exclusive possession, but simply that it was at least as good as any other. Her theory was that she had a right of occupancy in conjunction with other claimants, which by settlement and otherwise might be so strengthened in a part or the whole of the territory as to ultimately secure for her the right to be clothed with sovereignty.

In the discussion of the issue, the earliest explorations had to be largely left out of the case, as they were attended with too much vagueness and uncertainty to bear any great weight. The second epoch of exploration was, therefore, lifted to a position of prominence it could not otherwise have enjoyed. Perez and Heceta, for the Spaniards, the former in 1774, the latter a year later, had explored the northwest coast to the fifty-fifth parallel and beyond, Heceta discovering the mouth of the Columbia river. To offset whatever rights might accrue from these explorations, England had only the more thorough but less extensive survey of Captain James Cook, made in 1778. The advantage in point of prior discovery would, therefore, seem to be with the United States as assignee of Spain.

After the Joint-Occupancy treaty of 1818 had been signed, negotiations on the subject were not reopened until 1824. In that year, obedient to the masterly instructions addressed to him on July 22, 1823, by John Quincy Adams, secretary of state, Richard Rush, minister to England, entered into negotiations with the British ministers, Canning and Huskisson, for the adjustment of the boundary. Mr. Rush was instructed to offer the forty-ninth parallel to the sea, "should it be earnestly insisted upon by Great Britain." He endeavored with great persistency to fulfil his mission, but his propositions were rejected. The British negotiators offered the forty-ninth parallel to the Columbia, then the middle of that river to the sea, with perpetual right to both nations of navigating the harbor at the mouth of the river. This proposal Mr. Rush rejected, so nothing was accomplished. By treaty concluded in February, 1825, an agreement was entered into between Great Britain and Russia, whereby the line of fifty-four degrees, forty minutes, was fixed as the boundary between the territorial claims of the two nations, a fact which explains the cry of "Fifty-four, forty or fight" that in later days became the slogan of the Democratic party.

In 1826-7 another attempt was made to settle the question at issue between Great Britain and the United States. Albert Gallatin then represented this country, receiving his instructions from Henry Clay, secretary of state, who said: "It is not thought necessary to add much to the argument advanced on this point in the instructions given to Mr. Rush and that which was employed by him in the course of the negotiations to support our title as derived from prior discovery and settlement at the mouth of the Columbia river, and from the treaty which Spain concluded on the 22d of February, 1819. That argument is believed to have conclusively established our title on both grounds. Nor is it conceived that Great Britain has or can make out even a colorless title to any portion of the northern coast." Referring to the offer of the forty-ninth parallel in a despatch dated February 24, 1827, Mr. Clay said: "It is conceived in a genuine spirit of concession and conciliation, and it is our ultimatum and you may so announce it." In order to save the case of his country from being prejudiced in future negotiations by the liberality of offers made and rejected, Mr. Clay instructed Gallatin to declare "that the American government does not hold itself bound hereafter, in consequence of any proposal which it has heretofore made, to agree to a line which has been so proposed and rejected, but will consider itself at liberty to contend for the full measure of our just claims; which declaration you must have recorded in the protocol of one of your conferences; and to give it more weight, have it stated that it has been done by the express direction of the president."

Mr. Gallatin sustained the claim of the United States in this negotiation so powerfully that the British plenipotentiaries, Huskisson, Grant and Addington, were forced to the position that Great Britain did not assert any title to the country. They contented themselves with the contention that her claim was sufficiently well founded to give her the right to occupy the country in common with other nations, such concessions having been made to her by the Nootka treaty. The British negotiators complained of the recommendation of President Monroe in his message of December 7, 1824, to establish a military post at the mouth of the Columbia river, and of the passage of a bill in the house providing for the occupancy of the Oregon river. To this the American replied by calling attention to the act of the British parliament of 1821, entitled "An act for regulating the fur trade and establishing a criminal and civil jurisdiction in certain parts of North America." He contended with great ability and force that the recommendation and bill complained of did not interfere with the treaty of 1818 and that neither a territorial government nor a fort at the mouth of the river could be rightly complained of by a government which had granted such wide privileges and comprehensive powers to the Hudson's Bay Company.

Before the conclusion of these negotiations, Mr. Gallatin had offered not alone the forty-ninth parallel, but that "the navigation of the Columbia river shall be perpetually free to subjects of Great Britain in common with citizens of the United States, provided that the said line should strike the northeasternmost or any other branch of that river at a point at which it was navigable for boats." The British, on their part, again offered the Columbia river, together with a large tract of land between Admiralty inlet and the coast, protesting that this concession was made in the spirit of sacrifice for conciliation and not as one of right. The proposition was rejected and the negotiations ended in the treaty of August 6, 1827, which continued the Joint-Occupancy treaty of 1818 indefinitely, with the proviso that it might be abrogated by either party on giving the other a year's notice.

"There can be no doubt," says Evans, "that, during the continuance of these two treaties, British foothold was strengthened and the difficulty of the adjustment of boundaries materially enhanced. Nor does this reflect in the slightest degree upon those great publicists who managed the claim of the United States in those negotiations. Matchless ability and earnest patriotism, firm defense of the United States' claim, and withal a disposition to compromise to avoid rupture with any other nation, mark these negotiations in every line. The language and intention of these treaties are clear and unmistakable. Neither government was to attempt any act in derogation of the other's claim; nor could any advantage inure to either; during their continuance the territory should be free and open to citizens and subjects of both nations. Such is their plain purport; such the only construction which their language will warrant. Yet it cannot be controverted that the United States had thereby precluded itself from the sole enjoyment of the territory which it claimed in sovereignty; nor that Great Britain acquired a peaceable, recognized and uninterrupted tenancy-in-common in regions where her title was so imperfect that she herself admitted that she could not successfully maintain, nor did she even assert it. She could well afford to wait. Hers was indeed the policy later in the controversy styled masterly inactivity: 'Leave the title in abeyance, the settlement of the country will ultimately settle the sovereignty.' In no event could her colorless title lose color; while an immediate adjustment of the boundary would have abridged the area of territory in which, through her subjects, she already exercised exclusive possession, and had secured the entire enjoyment of its wealth and resources. The Hudson's Bay Company, by virtue of its license of trade excluding all other British subjects from the territory, was Great Britain's trustee in possession—an empire company, omnipotent to supplant enterprises projected by citizens of the United States. Indeed, the territory had been appropriated by a wealthy, all-powerful monopoly, with whom it was ruinous to attempt to compete. Such is a true exhibit of the then condition of Oregon, produced by causes extrinsic to the treaty, which the United States government could neither counteract nor avoid. The United States had saved the right for its citizens to enter the territory, had protested likewise that no act or omission on the part of the government or its citizens, or any act of commission or omission by the British government or her subjects during such Joint-Occupancy treaties, should affect in any way the United States' claim to the territory.

"The treaties of 1818 and 1827 have passed into history as conventions for joint occupancy. Practically they operated as grants of possession to Great Britain, or rather to her representative, the Hudson's Bay Company, who, after the merger with the Northwest Company, had become sole occupant of the territory. The situation may be briefly summed up: The United States claimed title to the territory. Great Britain, through its empire-trading company, occupied it—enjoyed all the wealth and resources derivable from it."

But while joint occupation was in reality non-occupation by any but the British, it must not be supposed that the case of the United States was allowed to go entirely by default during the regime of the so-called joint occupancy. In congress the advisability of occupying Oregon was frequently and vehemently discussed. Ignorance and misconception with regard to the real nature of Oregon, its climate, soil, products and healthfulness, were being dispelled. The representations of the Hudson's Bay Company that it was a "miasmatic wilderness, uninhabitable except by wild beasts and more savage men," were being found to be false. In 1821 Dr. John Floyd, a representative in congress from Virginia, and Senator Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, had interviews at Washington with Ramsey Crooks and Russell Farnham, who had belonged to Astor's party. From these gentlemen they learned something of the value of Oregon, its features of interest, and its commercial and strategic importance. This information Dr. Floyd made public in 1822, in a speech in support of a bill "to authorize the occupation of the Columbia river, and to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians therein." On December 29, 1823, a committee was appointed to inquire as to the wisdom of occupying the mouth of the Columbia, and the committee's report, submitted on April 15th of the following year, embodied a communication from General Thomas S. Jesup, which asserted that the military occupancy of the Columbia was a necessity for protecting trade and securing the frontier. It recommended the despatch of a force of two hundred men across the continent to establish a fort at the mouth of the Columbia river; that at the same time two vessels with arms, ordnance and supplies be sent thither by sea. He further proposed the establishment of a line of posts across the continent to afford protection to our traders; and on the expiration of the privilege granted to British subjects to trade on the waters of the Columbia, to enable us to remove them from our territory, and secure the whole to our citizens. Those posts would also assure the preservation of peace among the Indians in the event of a foreign war and command their neutrality or assistance as we might think advisable. The letter exposed Great Britain's reasons for her policy of masterly inactivity, and urged that some action be taken by the United States to balance or offset the accretion of British title and for preserving and protecting its own. "History," says Evans, "will generously award credit to the sagacious Jesup for indicating in 1823 the unerring way to preserve the American title to Oregon territory. Nor will it fail to commend the earnest devotion of that little Oregon party in congress for placing on record why the government should assert exclusive jurisdiction within its own territory." In the next congress the subject was again discussed with energy and ability. In 1831 formal negotiations with Great Britain were resumed.

All this discussion had a tendency to dispel the idea, promulgated as we have seen by the Hudson's Bay Company, that the territory was worthless and uninhabitable, also to excite interest in the mystic region beyond the mountains.

The United States claimed theoretically that it was the possessor of a vested right to absolute sovereignty over the entire Oregon territory, and in all the negotiations after the signing of the treaty of Florida, its ambassadors claimed that the title of their country was clearly established. The fact, however, that joint occupancy was agreed to at all after 1828 could hardly be construed in any other light than as a confession of weakness in our title, notwithstanding the unequivocal stipulations that neither party should attempt anything in derogation of the other's claims, and that the controversy should be determined upon its merits as they existed prior to 1818. If the United States came into possession of an absolute title in 1819, why should it afterward permit occupation by British subjects and the enforcement of British law in its domain?

The United States' title, as before stated, rested upon three foundation stones—its own discoveries and explorations, the discoveries and explorations of the Spaniards, and the purchase of Louisiana. While it was not contended that any of these conveyed exclusive right, the position of our country was that each supplemented the other; that, though while vested in different nations they were antagonistic, when held by the same nation, they, taken together, amounted to a complete title. The title was therefore cumulative in its nature and had in it the weakness which is inherent under such conditions. It was impossible to determine with definiteness how many partial titles, the value of each being a matter of uncertainty, would cumulatively amount to one complete title. And however clear the right of the United States might seem to its own statesmen, it is evident that the conviction must be produced in the minds of the British also if war was to be avoided.

These facts early came to be appreciated by a clear-visioned, well-informed and determined little band in congress. The debates in that body, as well as numerous publications sent out among the people, stimulated a few daring spirits to brave the dangers of Rocky mountain travel and to see for themselves the truth with regard to Oregon. Reports from these reacted upon congress, enabling it to reason and judge from premises more nearly in accordance with facts. Gradually interest in Oregon became intensified and the determination to hold it for the United States deepened. While the country never receded from its conviction of the existence of an absolute right of sovereignty in itself, the people resolved to establish a title which even the British could not question, to win Oregon from Great Britain even in accordance with the tenets of her own theory. They determined to settle and Americanize the territory. In 1834, and again in 1836, an element of civilization was introduced of a vastly higher nature than any which accompanied the inroads of the Hudson's Bay Company employes and of trappers and traders. We refer to the American missionaries spoken of in former chapters. The part which these had in stimulating this resolution of the American people have been and will be sufficiently treated elsewhere. The results of Whittman's midwinter ride and labors and of the numerous other forces at work among the people were crystallized into action in 1843, when a great, swelling tide of humanity, pulsating with the restless energy and native daring so characteristic of the American, pushed across the desert plains of the continent, through the fastnesses of the Rocky mountains, and into the heart of the disputed territory. Other immigrations followed, and there was introduced into the Oregon question a new feature, the vital force and import of which could not be denied by the adverse claimant. At the same time the American government was placed under an increased obligation to maintain its right to the valley of the Columbia.

But we must return now to the diplomatic history of the controversy, resuming the same with the negotiations of 1831. Martin Van Buren was then minister at London. He received instructions relative to the controversy from Edward Livingston, secretary of state, the tenor of which indicated that the United States was not averse to the presence of the British in the territory. While they asserted confidence in the American title to the entire Oregon territory, they said: "This subject, then, is open for discussion, and, until the rights of the parties can be settled by negotiations, ours can suffer nothing by delay." Under these rather lukewarm instructions, naturally nothing was accomplished.

In 1842 efforts to adjust the boundary west of the Rocky mountains were again resumed, this time on motion of Great Britain. That power requested on October 18th of the year mentioned that the United States minister at London should be furnished with instructions and authority to renew negotiations, giving assurance of its willingness to proceed to the consideration of the boundary subject "in a perfect spirit of fairness, and to adjust it on a basis of equitable compromise." On November 25th Daniel Webster, then secretary of state, replied "that the president concurred entirely in the expediency of making the question respecting the Oregon territory a subject of immediate attention and negotiation between the two governments. He had already formed the purpose of expressing this opinion in his message to congress, and, at no distant day, a communication will be made to the minister of the United States in London."

Negotiations were not, however, renewed until October, 1843, when Secretary Upshur sent instructions to Edward Everett, American minister to London, again offering the forty-ninth parallel, together with the right of navigating the Columbia river upon equitable terms. In February of the ensuing year, Hon. Richard Packenham, British plenipotentiary, came to the American capital with instructions to negotiate concerning the Oregon territory. No sooner had the discussion fairly begun than a melancholy event happened, Secretary Upshur being killed on the United States vessel Princeton by the explosion of a gun. A few months later his successor, John C. Calhoun, continued the negotiations. The arguments were in a large measure a repetition of those already advanced, but a greater aggressiveness on the part of the British and persistency in denying the claims of the United States were noticeable. As in former negotiations, the privilege accorded by the Nootka convention were greatly relied upon by Great Britain, as proving that no absolute title was retained by Spain after the signing of the treaty, hence none could be assigned. One striking statement in Lord Packenham's correspondence was to the effect that "he did not feel authorized to enter into discussion respecting the territory north of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, which was understood by the British government to form the basis of negotiations on the side of the United States, as the line of the Columbia formed that of Great Britain." He thus showed all too plainly the animus of his government to take advantage of the spirit of compromise which prompted the offer of that line and to construe such offer as an abandonment of the United States' claim to an absolute title to all the Oregon territory. It is hard to harmonize her action in this matter with the "perfect spirit of fairness" professed in the note of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Webster asking for a renewal of negotiations. No agreement was reached.

During the sessions of congress of 1843-4 memorials, resolutions and petitions from all parts of the union came in in a perfect flood. The people were thoroughly aroused. In the presidential election which occurred at that time the Oregon question was a leading issue. "Fifty-four, forty or fight" became the rallying cry of the Democratic party. The platform framed in the Democratic national convention declared: "Our title to the whole of Oregon is clear and unquestionable. No portion of the same ought to be ceded to England or any other power; and the reoccupation of Oregon at the earliest practical period is a great American measure." The position of the Whig party was milder and less arrogant, but equally emphatic in its assertion of belief in the validity of the United States' title. The fact that the Democrats carried in the election, despite the warlike tone of their platform and campaign, is conclusive evidence that the people were determined to hold their territory on the Pacific coast regardless of cost. "Never was a government more signally advised by the voice of a united people. The popular pulse had been felt, and it beat strongly in favor of prompt and decisive measures to secure the immediate reoccupation of Oregon. It equally proclaimed that 'no portion thereof ought to be ceded to Great Britain.' In January, 1845, Sir Richard Packenham, the British minister, proposed that the matter in dispute be left to arbitration, which proposal was respectfully declined. So the administration of President Tyler terminated without adjustment of the Oregon difficulty.

Notwithstanding the unequivocal voice of the people in demand of the whole of Oregon, James Buchanan, secretary of state under President Polk, in a communication to Sir Richard Packenham, dated July 12, 1845, again offered the forty-ninth parallel, explaining at the same time that he could not have consented to do so had he not found himself embarrassed, if not committed, by the acts of his predecessors. Packenham rejected the offer. Buchanan informed him that he was "instructed by the president to say that he owes it to his country, and a just appreciation of her title to the Oregon territory, to withdraw the proposition to the British government which has been made under his direction; and it is hereby accordingly withdrawn." This formal withdrawal of the previous offers of compromise on the forty-ninth parallel, justified as it was by Great Britain's repeated rejections, left the Polk administration free and untrammelled. Appearances indicated that it was now ready to give execution to the popular verdict of 1844. The message of the president recommended that the year's notice, required by the treaty of 1827, be immediately given, that measures be adopted for maintaining the rights of the United States to the whole of Oregon, and that such legislation be enacted as would afford security and protection to American settlers.

In harmony with these recommendations, a resolution was adopted April 27th, 1846, authorizing the president "at his discretion to give to the government of Great Britain the notice required by the second article of the said convention of the 6th of August, 1827, for the abrogation of the same."

Acting in accordance with the resolution, President Polk the next day sent notice of the determination of the United States "that, at the end of twelve months from and after the delivery of these presents by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to her Britannic Majesty, or to her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, the said convention shall be entirely annulled and abrogated."

On the 27th of December, 1845, Sir Richard Packenham had submitted another proposal to arbitrate the matter at issue between the two governments. The proposal was declined on the ground that to submit the proposition in the form stated would preclude the United States from making a claim to the whole of the territory. On January 17th of the following year, a modified proposal was made to refer "the question of title in either government to the whole territory to be decided; and if neither were found to possess a complete title to the whole, it was to be divided between them according to a just appreciation of the claims of each." The answer of Mr. Buchanan was clear and its language calculated to preclude any more arbitration proposals. He said: "If the government should consent to an arbitration upon such terms, this would be construed into an intimation, if not a direct invitation to the arbitrator to divide the territory between the two parties. Were it possible for this government, under any circumstances, to refer the question to arbitration, the title and the title alone, detached from every other consideration, ought to be the only question submitted. The title of the United States, which the president regards clear and unquestionable, can never be placed in jeopardy by referring it to the decision of any individual, whether sovereign, citizen or subject. Nor does he believe the territorial rights of this nation are a proper subject of arbitration."

But the British government seems now to have become determined that the question should be settled without further delay. The rejected arbitration proposal was followed on the 6th day of June, 1846, by a draft of a proposed treaty submitted by Sir Richard Packenham to Secretary of State Buchanan. The provisions of this were to the effect that the boundary should be continued along the forty-ninth parallel "to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver island; and thence southerly through the middle of said channel and of Fuca's strait to the Pacific ocean." It stipulated that the navigation of the Columbia river should remain free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company and to all British subjects trading with the same; that the possessory right of that company and of all British subjects south of the forty-ninth parallel should be respected, and that "the farms, lands and other properties of every description belonging to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company shall be confirmed to said company. In case, however, the situation of these farms and lands should be considered by the United States to be of public importance, and the United States government should signify a desire to obtain possession of the whole, or any part thereof, the property so required shall be transferred to the said government at a proper valuation, to be agreed upon between the parties."

Upon receipt of the important communication embodying this draft, the president asked in advance the advice of the senate, a very unusual, though not an unprecedented procedure. Though the request of the president was dated June 10th, and the consideration of the resolution to accept the British proposal was not begun until June 12th, on June 13th it was "resolved (two-thirds of the senators present consenting), that the president of the United States be, and is hereby, advised to accept the proposal of the British government, accompanying his message to the senate, dated June 10, 1846, for a convention to settle the boundaries, etc., between the United States and Great Britain, west of the Rocky or Stony mountains." The advice was, however, "given under the conviction that, by the true construction of the second article of the project, the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to navigate the Columbia would expire with the termination of their present license of trade with the Indians, etc., on the northwest coast of America, on the 30th day of May, 1859."

The wonderful alacrity with which this advice was given and with which five degrees, forty minutes of territory were surrendered to Great Britain, is accounted for by some historians (and no doubt they are correct) by supposing that the "cession" was made in the interests of slavery. The friends of that institution were unwilling to risk a war with Great Britain which would interfere with the war with Mexico and the annexation of Texas. Their plan was to acquire as much territory from which slave states could be formed as possible, and they were not overscrupulous about sacrificing territory which must ultimately develop into free states. But for unfortunate diplomacy, "it is quite probable that British Columbia would be to-day, what many would deem desirable in view of its growing importance, a part of the United States."

Notwithstanding the great sacrifice made by the United States for the sake of peace, it was not long until war clouds were again darkening our national skies. The determining of the line after it reached the Pacific ocean soon became a matter of dispute. Hardly had the ratifications been exchanged when Captain Prevost, for the British government, set up the claim that Rosario was the channel intended in the treaty. The claim was, of course, denied by Mr. Campbell, who was representing the United States in making the survey line. It was contended by him that the Canal de Haro was the channel mentioned in the treaty. Lord Russell, conscious no doubt of the weakness of his case, proposed as a compromise President's channel, between Rosario and De Haro straits. The generosity of this proposal is obvious when we remember that San Juan island, the principal bone of contention, would be on the British side of this line. Indeed, Lord Lyons, the British diplomatic representative in the United States, was expressly instructed that no line should be accepted which did not give San Juan to the British. The position of the United States was stated by Secretary of State Lewis Cass, with equal clearness and decisiveness. Efforts to settle the matter geographically proved unavailing and diplomacy again had to undergo a severe test.

For a number of years the matter remained in abeyance. Then the pioneer resolved to try the plan he had before resorted to in the settlement of the main question. He pushed into the country with wife and family. The Hudson's Bay Company's representatives were already there, and the danger of a clash of arms between the subjects of the queen and the citizens of the United States, resident in the disputed territory, soon became imminent. Such a collision would undoubtedly involve the two countries in war.

In the session of the Oregon territorial legislature of 1852-3, the archipelago to which San Juan island belongs was organized into a county. Taxes were in due time imposed on Hudson's Bay Company property, and when payment was refused, the sheriff promptly sold sheep enough to satisfy the levy. Recriminations followed as a matter of course and local excitement ran high. General Harney, commander of the department of the Pacific, inaugurated somewhat summary proceedings. He landed over four hundred and fifty troops on the island, and instructed Captain Pickett to protect American citizens there at all cost. English naval forces of considerable power gathered about the island. Their commander protested against military occupancy. Pickett replied that he could not, under his orders, permit any joint occupancy. General Harney, however, had acted without instructions from the seat of government, and the president did not approve his measures officially, though it was plainly evident that the administration was not averse to having the matter forced to an issue.

At this juncture, the noted General Scott was sent to the scene of the difficulty, under instructions to permit joint occupancy until the matter in dispute could be settled. Harney was withdrawn from command entirely. Finally, an agreement was reached between General Scott and the British governor at Vancouver that each party should police the territory with one hundred armed men.

Diplomacy was again tried. Great Britain proposed that the question at issue be submitted to arbitration, and she suggested as arbiter the president of the Swiss council or the king of Sweden and Norway or the king of the Netherlands. The proposition was declined by the United States. For ten years longer the dispute remained unsettled. Eventually, on May 8th, 1871, it was mutually agreed to submit the question, without appeal, to the arbitrament of Emperor William, of Germany. George Bancroft, the well-known historian, was chosen to present the case of the United States, and it is said that "his memorial of one hundred and twenty octavo pages is one of the most finished and unanswerable diplomatic arguments ever produced." The British also presented a memorial. These were interchanged and replies were prepared by each contestant. The emperor gave the matter careful and deliberate attention, calling to his assistance three eminent jurists. His award was as follows: "Most in accordance with the true interpretation of the treaty concluded on the 15th of June, 1846, between the governments of her Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, is the claim of the government of the United States, that the boundary line between the territories of her Britannic Majesty and the United States should be drawn through the Haro channel. Authenticated by our autograph signature and the impression of the Imperial Great Seal. Given at Berlin, October 21, 1872." This brief and unequivocal decree ended forever the vexatious controversy which for so many years had disturbed friendly feelings and endangered the peace of two great Anglo-Saxon peoples. No shot was fired; no blood was shed; diplomacy had triumphed.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CAYUSE WAR.

Long before the settlement of the Oregon question, signs of another struggle for ownership of the country had become distinctly visible. The Indian had begun to perceive what must have been fully apparent to the tutored mind of the more enlightened race, that when the sturdy American began following the course of empire to westward, that harsh, inexorable law of life, the survival of the fittest, would be brought home to the red man. He had begun to feel the approach of his own sad fate and was casting about for the means to avert the coming calamity or, if that could not be, to delay the evil hour as long as possible.

Although no large immigration had entered the Oregon country prior to 1843, that of the preceding year numbering only one hundred and eleven, the few settlers of Oregon had already become apprehensive for the safety of their brethren en route to the west, and Sub-Indian Agent White had sent a message to meet the immigrants of 1843 at Fort Hall, warning them to travel in companies of not less than fifty and to keep close watch upon their property. The reason for the latter injunction became apparent to the travelers in due time, for the Indians, especially those who had become accustomed to white people by reason of their residence near the mission, were not slow to help themselves to clothing, household goods, cattle or horses, when an opportunity was offered. However, the fact that none of the immigrants settled near the mission had a quieting effect upon the Indians of that neighborhood.

In 1844 an Indian named Cockstock, with a small following, made hostile demonstrations in Oregon City. Failing to provoke a quarrel with the white residents, he retired to an Indian village across the river and endeavored to incite its occupants to acts of hostility. In this he failed. It appears that formerly Cockstock had visited the home of Dr. White, purposing to kill him for a real or fancied wrong, but, his intended victim being absent, he had not been able to do greater damage than to break the windows of the sub-agent's house. An unsuccessful attempt had been made to arrest him for this offense, and he was now bent on calling the Americans to account for their audacity in pursuing him with such intent. With an interpreter he returned to the Oregon City side. He was met at the landing by a number of whites, who doubtless meant to arrest him. In the excitement firearms were discharged on both sides and George W. Le Breton, who had served as clerk of the first legislative committee of Oregon, was wounded. The other Indians withdrew to a position on the bluffs above town and began shooting at the whites, who returned their fire with such effectiveness as soon to dislodge them. In the latter part of the fight two more Americans were wounded, one of whom died, as did also Le Breton, from the effects of poison from the arrow points. The Indian loss was Cockstock killed and one warrior wounded. Aside from this, there was no serious trouble with Indians in the Willamette valley during the earlier years, though frequently the Indian agent was called upon to settle disputes caused by the appropriation by Indians of cattle belonging to white men.

Prior to 1842, a number of indignities had been offered to Dr. Whitman at his mission station at Waiilatpu, near where Walla Walla now is. These he had borne with Christian forbearance. During the winter of 1842 he went east. Some of the Indians supposed that he intended to bring enough of his people to punish them for these offenses. He did bring with him in the summer of 1843 nearly nine hundred people, none of whom, however, were equipped for Indian warfare or of a militant spirit. As no offense was offered the Indians and not an acre of their lands was appropriated by these whites, the quiet of the upper country was not disturbed. But the mission was thereafter practically a failure as far as its primary purpose was concerned, as was also that of Rev. H. H. Spalding in the Nez Perce country.

After the return of Whitman, an event happened which boded no good to the white people. About forty Indians, mostly of the Cayuse and Walla Walla tribes, having decided to embark extensively in the cattle business, formed a company to visit California for the purpose of securing stock by trading with the Spaniards. Peo-peo-mox-mox, head chief of the Walla Wallas, was the leader of the enterprise. The company reached California in safety, had good success for a while in accomplishing their ends, but eventually fell into difficulty through their unwillingness to be governed by the laws of the land. While on a hunting expedition, they met and conquered a band of robbers, recovering a number of head of horses, stolen from Americans and Spaniards. Some of them were claimed by their former owners, in accordance with the law that property of this kind belonged to the original possessors until sold and marked with a transfer mark. An incident of the dispute was the killing by an American (in cold blood if the Indian account be true) of Elijah, son of Peo-peo-mox-mox. This unfortunate event had its effect in deepening the hatred of the Indians for the American people. Peo-peo-mox-mox and his band were eventually expelled from California by the Spanish authorities, being pursued with such vigor that they had to leave their cattle behind. They returned home in the spring of 1845. Dr. Whitman was deeply disturbed by the incident, fearing that the Indians would take their revenge upon his mission, and sent a hasty message to the sub-Indian agent, so stating. White was visited about the same time by an Indian chief, Ellis, who wished advice as to what to do in the matter. White states that he was apprehensive of difficulty in adjusting it, "particularly as they lay much stress upon the restless, disaffected scamps late from Willamette to California, loading them with the vile epithets of 'dogs, thieves,' etc., from which they believed or affected to that the slanderous reports of our citizens caused all their loss and disasters, and therefore held us responsible."

"According to Ellis," writes Mrs. Victor, "the Walla Wallas, Cayuses, Nez Percés, Spokanes, Pend d'Oreilles and Snakes were on terms of amity and alliance; and a portion of them were for raising two thousand warriors and marching at once to California to take reprisals by capture and plunder, enriching themselves by the spoils of the enemy. Another part were more cautious, wishing first to take advice and to learn whether the white people in Oregon would remain neutral. A third party were for holding the Oregon colony responsible, because Elijah had been killed by an American.

"There was business, indeed, for an Indian agent with no government at his back, and no money to carry on either war or diplomacy. But Dr. White was equal to it. He arranged a cordial reception for the chief among the colonists; planned to have Dr. McLoughlin divert his mind by referring to the tragic death of his own son by treachery, which enabled him to sympathize with the father and relatives of Elijah; and on his own part took him to visit the schools and his own library, and in every way treated the chief as though he were the first gentleman in the land. Still further to establish social equality, he put on his farmer's garb and began working in his plantation, in which labor Ellis soon joined him, and the two discussed the benefits already enjoyed by the native population as the result of intelligent labor.

"Nothing, however, is so convincing to an Indian as a present, and here it would seem Dr. White must have failed, but not so. In the autumn of 1844, thinking to prevent trouble with the immigration by enabling the chiefs in the upper country to obtain cattle without violating the laws, he had given them some ten-dollar treasury drafts to be exchanged with the emigrants for young stock, which drafts the emigrants refused to accept, not knowing where they should get them cashed. To heal the wound caused by this disappointment, White now sent word by Ellis to these chiefs to come down in the autumn with Dr. Whitman and Mr. Spalding to hold a council over the California affair, and to bring with them their ten-dollar drafts to exchange with him for a cow and a calf each, out of his own herds. He also promised them that if they would postpone their visit to California until the spring of 1847, and each chief assist him to the amount of two beaver skins, he would establish a manual training and literary school for their children, besides using every means in his power to have the trouble with the Californians adjusted, and would give them from his private funds five hundred dollars with which to purchase young cows in California."

By this means White succeeded in averting an impending calamity, though he was unable to fulfill all his pledges. Peo-peo-mox-mox did, however, return to California in 1846 with forty warriors to demand satisfaction for the murder of his son. Not a little excitement resulted, and a company was sent by the California authorities to protect frontier settlements. The Indians, seeing that both Americans and Spaniards were prepared to defend themselves, made no hostile movement, but gave their attention to trading and other peaceful pursuits.

For a few years prior to the settlement of the Oregon question in 1846, there was another cause of alarm among the colonists, namely, the possibility of war with Great Britain and consequent hostilities between the settlers and the Hudson's Bay Company. It was very certain that in the event of war the Indians would side with the British company, and the condition of the colonists would become truly deplorable. Happily, this contingency was averted by the triumph of diplomacy.

But even after the question of sovereignty had been settled by the treaty of peace, war clouds still hung over the Northwest. In his message to the provisional legislature of Oregon, sent in December 8, 1847, Governor Abernethy referred to the Indian situation in this language:

"Our relations with the Indians become every year more embarrassing. They see the white man occupying their land, rapidly filling up the country, and they put in a claim for pay. They have been told that a chief would come out from the United States and treat with them for their land; they have been told this so often that they begin to doubt it; 'at all events,' they say, 'he will not come till we are all dead, and then what good will blankets do us? We want something now.' This leads to trouble between the settler and the Indians about him. Some plan should be devised by which a fund can be raised and presents made to the Indians to keep them quiet until an agent arrives from the United States. A number of robberies have been committed by the Indians in the upper country upon emigrants as they were passing through their territory. This should not be allowed to pass. An appropriation should be made by you sufficient to enable the superintendent of Indian affairs to take a small party in the spring and demand restitution of the property, or its equivalent in horses."

As heretofore stated, this message reached the legislature December 8, 1847. The same day another was sent with communications from William McBean and Sir James Douglas, of the Hudson's Bay Company, giving details of a horrible massacre in the upper country. The calamity so long expected had come at last. With savage whoops and fiendish yells, the Cayuse Indians had fallen upon the helpless inhabitants of the Waiilatpu mission, enacting the most awful tragedy which has stained the pages of northwest history, a history presenting many dark and dreadful chapters, written in the blood of the Argonauts who bore the stars and stripes o'er plain and mountain and through the trackless forest to a resting-place on the Pacific shore.

There were several causes in addition to the general ones heretofore recited which impelled the Indians to strike their first blow when and where they did. A short time before the fatal 29th of November, Bishop A. M. A. Blanchet, of the Catholic Society of Jesus, Rev. J. B. A. Brouillet, and other priests, made their appearance in the vicinity of the Whitman mission. Whitman met Blanchet at Fort Walla Walla and told him frankly that he was not pleased at his coming and would do nothing to help him establish his mission. The priests, however, eventually took up their abode in the house of an Indian named Tautowe, on the Umatilla river, having failed to secure a site near Whitman from Tiloukaikt. The later intercourse between Whitman and Blanchet seems to have been more friendly than their first interview, and there is no evidence of any bitter sectarian quarrel between them. But there is little doubt that the priests encouraged the Indians in the belief that the Americans would eventually take all their lands. Many of the earlier Protestant writers accused the priests, or the Hudson's Bay Company, or both, of having incited the Indian murderers to their devilish deeds, but most of the historians of later date refuse to accept any such theory.

Perhaps one of the boldest of the early sectarian writers was W. H. Gray, whose history of Oregon is so palpably and bitterly partisan and shows such a disposition to magnify "trifles light as air" that it fails to carry conviction to the mind of the unprejudiced reader.

The proximate cause of the massacre, assigned by the Indians themselves, was a belief that Dr. Whitman was administering poison instead of wholesome medicines to such of their number as were sick and required his professional services. The large immigration of 1847 had been the victim of a terrible pestilence, and by the time it reached the vicinity of Whitman's station was suffering from measles in a form so virulent as to cause the death of many. Of course, the disease was communicated to the Indians, who hung about the wagons parleying or pilfering. The condition of the diseased Indians became pitiful. "It was most distressing," said Spalding, "to go into a lodge of some ten or twenty fires, and count twenty or twenty-five, some in the midst of measles, others in the last stage of dysentery, in the midst of every kind of filth, of itself sufficient to cause sickness, with no suitable means to alleviate their inconceivable sufferings, with perhaps one well person to look after the wants of two sick ones. They were dying every day, one, two, and sometimes five in a day, with the dysentery which generally followed the measles. Everywhere the sick and dying were pointed to Jesus and the well were urged to prepare for death."

Six were sick with measles in the doctor's household, and furthermore, Mrs. Osborn was weakly from a recent confinement and her baby was in ill-health. Dr. Whitman had the care of all these, and besides was acting as physician to the entire white and Indian population of the surrounding country. He was unremitting in his attentions to those who needed him, but no skill could avail to stay the ravages of the dread scourge.

This terrible condition of things furnished an opportunity to Whitman's two principal enemies—Joe Lewis, a half-breed, of his own household, and Chief Tiloukaikt—both of whom had been many times the beneficiaries of his benevolence.

The cause of Lewis' spite is not known, but "with the iniquity which seemed inherent in his detestable nature," he began circulating the report that Whitman was poisoning the Indians, for the purpose of securing their lands and horses. He even went so far as to state that he (Lewis) had heard Dr. and Mrs. Whitman and Mr. Spalding discussing the matter among themselves.

"The mission buildings," says Gray, "occupied a triangular space of ground fronting the north in a straight line, about four hundred feet in length. The doctor's house, standing on the west end and fronting west, was eighteen by sixty-two feet, adobe walls; library and bedroom on south end; dining and sitting-room in the middle, eighteen by twenty-four; Indian room on north end, eighteen by twenty-six; kitchen on east side of the house, eighteen by twenty-six; fireplace in the middle and bedroom in the rear; school-room joining on the east of the kitchen, eighteen by thirty; blacksmith shop, one hundred and fifty feet east; the house called the mansion on the east end of the angle, thirty-two by forty feet, one and one-half stories; the mill made of wood, standing upon the old site, about four hundred feet from either house. The east and south space of ground was protected by the mill pond and Walla Walla creek—north front by a ditch that discharged the waste water from the mill, and served to irrigate the farm in front of the doctor's house, which overlooked the whole. To the north and east is a high knoll, less than one-fourth of a mile distant and directly to the north, three-fourths of a mile distant is Mill creek."

Referring to the disposition of different persons about these premises at the time of the outbreak, the same writer says:

"Joseph Stanfield had brought in an ox from the plains, and it had been shot by Francis Sager, Messrs. Kimball, Canfield and Hoffman were dressing it between the two houses; Mr. Sanders was in the school, which had just called in for the afternoon; Mr. Marsh was grinding at the mill; Mr. Gillan was on his tailor's bench in the large adobe house, a short distance from the doctor's; Mr. Hall was at work laying a floor to a room adjoining the doctor's house; Mr. Rogers was in the garden; Mr. Osborn and family were in the Indian room adjoining the doctor's sitting-room; young Mr. Sales was lying sick in the family of Mr. Canfield, who was living in the blacksmith shop; young Mr. Bewley was sick in the doctor's house; John Sager was sitting in the kitchen but partially recovered from the measles; the doctor and Mrs. Whitman, with three sick children, and Mrs. Osborn and her sick child were in the dining or sitting-room."

Dr. Whitman had attended an Indian funeral on the morning of the fatal 29th of November. After his return he remained about the house, and is said to have been reading in his Bible when some one called him to the kitchen, where John Sager was. His voice was heard in conversation with an Indian, and soon after the work of slaughter began. Whitman was tomahawked and shot. John Sager was overpowered, cut and gashed with knives; his throat cut and his body pierced with several balls from short Hudson's Bay muskets. Mrs. Whitman, who was in the dining-room, hearing the tumult, began wringing her hands in anguish and exclaiming, "O, the Indians! the Indians!" The Osborn family hid themselves under the floor of the Indian room. Having done their dreadful work in the kitchen, the Indians engaged in it joined others in the work of despatching such of the American men and boys as they could find on the outside. Mrs. Whitman ran to the assistance of her husband in the kitchen. Women from the mansion house came to her aid, as did also Mr. Rogers, who had been twice wounded, but the noble doctor, though still breathing, was past all human assistance. Mr. Kimball, with a broken arm, came into the house, and all engaged in fastening the doors and removing the sick children up-stairs.

Without all was din and turmoil and fury. Retreating women and children screaming in dreadful anguish, the groans of the dying, the roar of musketry, the unearthly yells of frenzied savages, maddened with a diabolical thirst for human blood, the furious riding of naked, dusky horsemen, insane with excitement, the cries of despair and the fierce, exultant shouts of infuriated fiends mingled together to create a scene which for terror and despair on the one side and devilish atrocity on the other has few parallels in human history. No pen has power to describe it adequately and no imagination is equal to its full reconstruction.

Having killed all the male representatives of the hated American race to be found without, the Indians turned again to the doctor's house. Mrs. Whitman, venturing too near a window, was shot through the breast. The doors were battered down and the window smashed. By the time the Indians had gained an entrance to the building, Mrs. Whitman, Mrs. Hays, Miss Bewley, Catherine Sager and Messrs. Kimball and Rogers and the three sick children had taken refuge in an up-stairs room, whence Mrs. Whitman and Mr. Rogers were soon summoned by the Indians. As they did not comply with the request to come down, Tamsucky placed up-stairs after them, but seeing a gun so placed (by Miss Bewley) as to command the stairway, he became frightened and advanced no further. He, however, urged Mrs. Whitman to come down, assuring her that she would not be hurt. On learning that she had been shot, he expressed great sorrow, and upon being assured that there were no Americans in the room waiting to kill him, Tamsucky at last went up-stairs and engaged in conversation with the people there, in the course of which he reiterated expressions of sorrow for what had happened and desired the white men and women to retire to the mansion house, as the building they then occupied might soon be destroyed by fire. Eventually, Mrs. Whitman started down, assisted by Mr. Rogers and Mrs. Hays. Her wound, or the sight of her mangled and dying husband, or both, caused a faintness to come over her, and she was laid on the settee. As this was borne out of the door, a volley was fired into it and those who bore it, killing or fatally wounding Mr. Rogers, Mrs. Whitman and Francis Sager, the last-named, according to Gray, being shot by Joe Lewis.

Not content with destroying the lives of their victims, the Indians gave vent to their savage spleen by heaping upon the dead and dying such indignities as they could. The noble face of the good doctor, a face that had expressed no sentiments but those of kindness toward the dusky savages, was hacked beyond recognition, while the doctor still breathed, by the tomahawk of Tiloukaikt; the matronly features of Mrs. Whitman were lashed unmercifully with whips, and her body was rolled contemptuously in the mud; John Sager was terribly gashed with knives, and the remains of other victims were treated with similar indignities.

Joe Lewis, the darkest demon of the tragedy, went to the school-room, sought out the innocent children, who, terrified, had hidden themselves in the loft above, and brought them down to the kitchen to be shot. For a time they stood huddled together, guns pointed at them from almost every direction, expecting the order to be given at any moment which should occasion their death. Eliza, daughter of Rev. H. H. Spalding, was among them. Being acquainted with the Indian language, she understood every word that was said regarding the fate of herself and the other children, and her feelings, as she heard the Indians beseeching their chief to give the order to shoot, may be imagined. That order was never given, thanks, it is claimed, to the interposition of Joseph Stanfield, and the children were led away by two friendly Walla Wallas to a place of seclusion and temporary safety.

When night closed down upon this scene of savage cruelty and destruction, the Indians withdrew to the lodge of Tiloukaikt to review the day's proceedings and consult as to future operations. The killed on this first day of the massacre were Dr. and Mrs. Whitman, Mr. Rogers, John and Francis Sager, Messrs. Gilliland (Gray calls him Gillan), Marsh, Sanders and Hoffman. Mr. Osborn and family had taken refuge under the floor of the Indian room at the first outbreak. There they remained until night, when they stole out and sought safety in the brush. Eventually, after enduring terrible hardships, they reached Fort Walla Walla, where McBean, yielding to their importunity, reluctantly furnished them a blanket or two and enough victuals to sustain life. Mr. Canfield, wounded, fled to the blacksmith shop, thence to the mansion house, where he secreted himself until the coming of darkness, when he stole away to Lapwai. Mr. Hall escaped by snatching a gun which had missed fire from an Indian and protecting himself with it till he reached the cover of the brush, whence he escaped to Fort Walla Walla. He was put across the Columbia river by Mr. McBean, and started for the Willamette valley, but was never afterward heard of. Mr. Kimball and the four sick children, who remained in the attic which Mrs. Whitman and Mr. Rogers were induced by the treachery of Tamsucky to leave, were forgotten by the Indians in their excitement and were left unharmed the first day. Crocket Bewley and Amos Sales, both sick, were spared for reasons unknown until Tuesday, December 7th, when they were cruelly butchered in their beds.

The morning of November 30th, Mr. Kimball, induced by the suffering of himself and the sick children to seek water, was discovered and shot. The same fate overtook James Young, who, ignorant of the massacre, had come from the saw-mill with a load of lumber. On this day, also, two sons of Donald Munson, of the Hudson's Bay Company, who were attending school at the station, also a Spanish half-breed boy, whom Dr. Whitman had raised, were sent to Fort Walla Walla, for the Indians had no quarrel with any but Americans.

Wednesday, December 1st, Rev. J. B. A. Brouillet, one of the Catholic priests before mentioned, arrived at the scene of desolation. He assisted Joseph Stanfield in the work of preparing the dead for burial. In his "Authentic Account of the Murder of Dr. Whitman," this priest makes this statement concerning his visit:

"After having finished baptizing the infants and dying adults of my mission, I left Tuesday, the 30th of November, late in the afternoon, for Tiloukaikt's camp, where I arrived between seven and eight o'clock in the evening. It is impossible to conceive my surprise and consternation when upon my arrival I learned that the Indians the day before had massacred the doctor and his wife, with the greater part of the Americans at the mission. I passed the night without scarcely closing my eyes. Early the next morning I baptized three sick children, two of whom died soon after, and then hastened to the scene of death to offer to the widows and orphans all the assistance in my power. I found five or six women and over thirty children in a condition deplorable beyond description. Some had just lost their husbands, and the others their fathers, whom they had seen massacred before their eyes, and were expecting every minute to share the same fate. The sight of these persons caused me to shed tears, which, however, I was obliged to conceal, for I was the greater part of the day in the presence of the murderers, and closely watched by them, and if I had shown too marked an interest in behalf of the sufferers, it would have endangered their lives and mine; these, therefore, entreated me to be on my guard. After the first few words that could be exchanged under those circumstances, I inquired after the victims, and was told that they were yet unburied. Joseph Stanfield, a Frenchman, who was in the service of Dr. Whitman, and had been spared by the Indians, was engaged in washing the corpses, but being alone, was unable to bury them. I resolved to go and assist him, so as to render to those unfortunate victims the last service in my power to offer them. What a sight did I then behold! Ten dead bodies lying here and there covered with blood and bearing the marks of the most atrocious cruelty, some pierced with balls, others more or less gashed by the hatchet."

It is a well-known fact that the lives of the women and children of the mission were more than once in jeopardy. How near they came to being sacrificed at one time appears from the following language of Brouillet, who was writing in defense of Joseph Stanfield:

It was on the morning of the day that followed the massacre. There were several Indians scattered in the neighborhood of the mission buildings, but especially a crowd of Indian women was standing near the door of the house in which all the white women and children were living. Stanfield, being then at a short distance from the house, Tiloukaikt, the chief of the place, came up and asked him if he had something in the house. "Yes," said Stanfield, "I have all my things there." "Take them away," said the Indian to him. "Why should I take them away? They are well there." "Take them off," he insisted, a second time. "But I have not only my things there; I have also my wife and children." "Yes," replied Tiloukaikt, who appeared a little surprised; "you, have a wife and children in the house! Will you take them off?" "No," replied Stanfield, "I will not take them away, and I will go and stay myself in the house. I see that you have bad designs; you intend to kill the women and children; well, you will kill me with them. Are you not ashamed? Are you not satisfied with what you have done? Do you want still to kill poor, innocent children that have never done you any harm?" "I am ashamed," replied Tiloukaikt, after a moment's hesitation. "It is true, those women and children do not deserve death; they did not harm us; they shall not die." And, turning to the Indian women who were standing near the door of the house waiting with a visible impatience for the order to enter and slaughter the people inside, he ordered them to go off. The Indian women then became enraged, and, showing the knives that they took from beneath their blankets, they insulted him in many different ways, calling him a coward, a woman who would consent to be governed by a Frenchman; and they retired, apparently in great anger for not having been allowed to imbrue their hands in the blood of new victims. The above circumstance was related at Fort Walla Walla to Mr. Ogden, by Stanfield himself, under great emotion, and in presence of the widows, none of whom contradicted him.

But though the lives of all the women of the mission except Mrs. Whitman were spared, some of these unfortunates were overtaken by a fate worse than death. The excitement of the massacre kept the minds of the Indians distracted from thoughts of other crimes until Saturday following the outbreak, when Tamsucky seized upon one of the girls and compelled her to be subject unto him. The fifteen-year-old daughter of Joseph Smith, from the saw-mill, was appropriated by the two sons of Tiloukaikt, her father, it is said, being so terrified by the danger he was in as to yield consent; and Susan Kimball was taken to the lodge of Tintinmitsi, or Frank Escaloom, the Indian who had killed her father. It is said that by claiming Mrs. Hays as his wife, Joseph Stanfield saved her from violation. The names of other possible victims of this reign of terror have never come to light, though it has been stated that even little girls were subjected to outrage. In order to involve Five Crows in their guilt and so secure his assistance in case of war, he was offered his choice of the American girls for a wife. He picked on Miss Bewley; sent a horse and an escort for her and had her brought to his home on the Umatilla. The bishop and his priests there have been severely criticized for refusing her protection from the embraces of Five Crows, and their failure to shield her has been made to argue their complicity in the massacre. It is likely, however, that fear for their lives overcame their better natures. The same charity which condoned in a measure at least the cowardice of Smith in consenting to the violation of his own daughter, and of other captives in assenting to the slanderous reports about Dr. Whitman's poisoning the Indians, should be extended to these priests also.

At the time of the massacre, Rev. H. H. Spalding was in the country of the Cayuses. He took supper with Brouillet on the evening of the fatal 29th. The next day was spent by him in concluding his visits to the sick of the neighborhood, and on Wednesday, December 1st, he set out on horseback for Whitman's station. When near Wailatpu, he met Brouillet returning after having assisted Stanfield in burying the dead; also his interpreter and Edward Tiloukaikt. Speaking of their interview, Brouillet says:

Fortunately, a few minutes after crossing the river (Walla Walla), the interpreter asked Tiloukaikt's son for a smoke. They proposed the calumet, but when the moment came for lighting it, there was nothing to make a fire. "You have a pistol," said the interpreter; "fire it and we will light." Accordingly, without stopping, he fired his pistol, reloaded it and fired again. He then commenced smoking with the interpreter without thinking of reloading his pistol. A few minutes after, while they were thus engaged in smoking, I saw Mr. Spalding come galloping towards me. In a moment he was at my side, taking me by the hand, and asking for news. "Have you been to the doctor's?" he inquired. "Yes," I replied. "What news?" "Sad news." "Is any person dead?" "Yes, sir." "Who is dead? Is it one of the doctor's children?" (He had left two of them very sick.) "No," I replied. "Who then is dead?" I hesitated to tell him. "Wait a moment," said I, "I cannot tell you now." While Mr. Spalding was asking me these different questions, I had spoken to my interpreter, telling him to entreat the Indians in my name not to kill Mr. Spalding, which I begged of him as a special favor, and hoped that he would not refuse me. I was waiting for his answer, and did not wish to relate the disaster to Mr. Spalding before getting it, for fear that he might, by his manner, discover to the Indian what I had told him, for the least motion like flight would have cost him his life, and probably exposed mine also. The son of Tlhoukaikt, after hesitating some moments, replied that he could not take it upon himself to save Mr. Spalding, but that he would go back and consult with the other Indians; and so he started back immediately to his camp. I then availed myself of his absence to satisfy the anxiety of Mr. Spalding.

The news completely paralyzed Mr. Spalding for a moment. "Is it possible? Is it possible?" he exclaimed. "They will certainly kill me." "I felt the world all go out at once," he told Mrs. Victor in referring to the incident eighteen years later, "and sat on my horse as rigid as a stone, not knowing or feeling anything." Brouillet urged him to arouse himself and decide quickly what to do. He determined to seek safety in flight, and receiving a little food from the priest, started post-haste for Lapwai. Traveling most of the way on foot, his horse having been lost, he reached the home of Colonel William Craig about a week later. There he found Mrs. Spalding, who, receiving from Mr. Canfield word of the massacre, of her daughter's captivity and of the probable death of her husband, had removed from the mission to Craig's home.

Spalding encouraged the Nez Perces to remain neutral, for Cayuse emissaries were already seeking their friendship and support. He wrote a letter to the priests informing them of his safe arrival, expressing a wish for peace and promising to endeavor to secure it. This was conveyed by two Nez Perces—Inimilip and Tipialanahkeit—to the Catholic mission, the Indian couriers encouraged the Cayuses to sue for peace, and the bishop advised a meeting of the chiefs to decide upon some course of action. Accordingly, on the 20th of December, Tlhoukaikt, Five Crows, Camaspele and a number of others met in council at the mission, Bishop Blanchet and Revs. Brouillet, Rosseau and Le Claire being also present.

The result of their deliberations was the following manifesto, dictated to the bishop:

The principal chiefs of the Cayuses in council assembled state: That a young Indian who understands English and who slept in Dr. Whitman's room, heard the doctor, his wife and Mr. Spalding express their desire of possessing the lands and animals of the Indians; that he stated also that Mr. Spalding said to the doctor: "Hurry giving medicines to the Indians that they may soon die," that the same Indian told the Cayuses: "If you do not kill the doctor soon, you will all be dead before spring;" that they buried six Cayuses on Sunday, November 25th, and three the next day; that the schoolmaster, Mr. Rogers, stated to them before he died that the doctor, his wife and Mr. Spalding poisoned the Indians; that for several years past they had to deplore the death of their children; and that according to these reports, they were led to believe that the whites had undertaken to kill them all; and that these were the motives which led them to kill the Americans. The same chiefs ask at present:

First, that the Americans may not go to war with the Cayuses.

Second, that they may forget the lately committed murders as the Cayuses will forget the murder of the son of the great chief of the Walla Wallas, committed in California.

Third, that two or three great men may come up to conclude peace.

Fourth, that as soon as these great men have arrived and concluded peace, they may take with them all the women and children.

Fifth, they give assurance that they will not harm the Americans before the arrival of these two or three great men.

Sixth, they ask that Americans may not travel any more through their country, as their young men might do them harm.

Place of Taitowe, Youmatilla, 20th December, 1837.

Signed:

TILOUKAIKT, CAMASPELO,
TAITOWE, ACHERAIA.

Meanwhile, forces were at work for the relief of the captive men, women and children. Peter Skeen Ogden, of the Hudson's Bay Company, had heard of the massacre and had set out from Fort Vancouver for the purpose of ransoming the helpless Americans. He arrived at Fort Walla Walla on the evening of the 19th of December, and by the 23d had arranged a council, which was attended by Chiefs Taitowe and Tlhoukaikt, with a number of the young Cayuses, also by Blanchet and Brouillet. Ogden's speech on this occasion is a marvel of mingled boldness and diplomacy. He said:

I regret to observe that all the chiefs whom I asked for are not present—two being absent. I expect the words I am about to address to you to be repeated to them and your young men on your return to your camps. It is now thirty years since we have been among you. During this long period we have never had any instance of blood being spilt, until the inhuman massacre, which has so recently taken place. We are traders and a different nation from the Americans. But recollect, we supply you with ammunition not to kill the Americans. They are of the same color as ourselves, speak the same language, are children of the same God, and humanity makes our hearts bleed when we behold you using them so cruelly. Besides this revolting butchery, have not the Indians pillaged, ill-treated the Americans, and insulted their women, when peacefully making their way to the Willamette? As chiefs, ought you to have connived at such conduct on the part of your young men? You tell me your young men committed the deeds without your knowledge. Why do we make you chiefs, if you have no control over your young men? You are a set of hermaphrodites, and unworthy of the appellation of men as chiefs. You young hot-headed men, I know that you pride yourselves upon your bravery, and think no one can match you. Do not deceive yourselves. If you get the Americans to commence once, you will repent it, and war will not end until every one of you is cut off from the face of the earth. I am aware that a good many of your friends and relatives have died through sickness. The Indians of other places have shared the same fate. It is not Dr. Whitman that poisoned them, but God has commanded that they should die. We are weak mortals and must submit, and I trust you will avail yourself of the opportunity to make some reparation. By so doing it may be advantageous to you, but at the same time remember that you alone will be responsible for the consequences. It is merely advice that I give you. We have nothing to do with it. I have not come here to make promises or hold out assistance. We have nothing to do with your quarrels; we remain neutral. On my return, if you wish it, I shall do all I can for you, but I do not promise you to prevent war.

If you deliver me up all the prisoners, I shall pay you for them on their being delivered, but let it not be said among you afterward that I deceived you. I and Mr. Douglas represent the company, but I tell you once more we promise you nothing. We sympathize with these poor people and wish to return them to their friends and relations by paying you for them. My request in behalf of the families concerns you; so decide for the best.

By this happily worded speech the Indians were placed in a trap. They must yield to Ogden's wishes or forfeit the regard of the Hudson's Bay Company, while at the same time Ogden made no promises which would embarrass the Americans in their future dealings with the tribe or the murderers.

To this speech the Indians made reply as follows:

Tautow: "I rise to thank you for your words. You white chiefs command obedience with those that have to do with you. It is not so with us. Our young men are strong-headed and foolish. Formerly we had experienced, good chiefs. These are laid in the dust. The descendants of my father were the only good chiefs. Though we made war with the other tribes, yet we always looked and ever will look upon the whites as our brothers. Our blood is mixed with yours. My heart bleeds for so many good chiefs I had known. For the demand made by you, the old chief, Tiloukaikt, is here. Speak to him. As regards myself, I am willing to give up the families."

Tiloukaikt: "I have listened to your words. Young men do not forget them. As for war, we have seen little of it. We know the whites to be our best friends, who have all along prevented us from killing each other. That is the reason why we avoid getting into war with them, and why we do not wish to be separated from them. Besides the tie of blood, the whites have shown us a convincing proof of their attachment to us by burying their dead 'longside with ours. Chief, your words are weighty. Your hairs are gray. We have known you a long time. You have had an unpleasant trip to this place. I can not, therefore, keep these families back. I make them over to you, which I would not do to another younger than yourself."

Peo-peo-mox-mox: "I have nothing to say. I know the Americans to be changeable; still I am of the opinion as the Young Chief. The whites are our friends, and we follow your advice. I consent to your taking the families."

Mr. Ogden then addressed two Nez Perce chiefs at length, in behalf of the Rev. H. H. Spalding and party, promising he would pay for their safe delivery to him. The result was that both chiefs, James and Itimimipelp, promised to bring them, provided they were willing to come, and immediately started to Clearwater with that purpose, bearing a letter from Chief Factor Ogden to Mr. Spalding. The result of that conference was the delivery, on the 29th of December, to Mr. Ogden (for which he paid the Cayuse Indians five blankets, fifty shirts, ten fathoms of tobacco, ten handkerchiefs, ten guns and one hundred rounds of ammunition) of the following captives:

Missionary children adopted by Dr. Whitman—Miss Mary A. Bridger; Catherine Sager, aged thirteen years; Elizabeth Sager, ten; Martha J. Sager, eight; Henrietta N. Sager, four; Hanna L. Sager, Helen M. Meek.

From Du Page county, Illinois—Joseph Smith, Mrs. Hannah Smith; Mary Smith, aged fifteen years; Edwin Smith, thirteen; Charles Smith, eleven; Nelson Smith, six; Mortimer Smith, four.

From Fulton county, Illinois—Mrs. Eliza Hall; Jane Hall, aged ten years; Mary C. Hall, eight; Ann E. Hall, six; Rebecca Hall, three; Rachel M. Hall, one.

From Osage county, Mississippi—Elan Young, Mrs. Irene Young; Daniel Young, aged twenty-one years; John Young, nineteen.

From La Porte county, Indiana—Mrs. Harriet Kimball; Susan M. Kimball, aged sixteen years; Nathan M. Kimball, thirteen; Byron M. Kimball, eight; Sarah S. Kimball, six; Mince A. Kimball, one.

From Iowa—Mrs. Mary Sanders; Helen M. Sanders, aged fourteen years; Phoebe L. Sanders, ten; Alfred W. Sanders, six; Nancy L. Sanders, four; Mary A. Sanders, two; Mrs. Sally A. Canfield; Ellen Canfield, sixteen; Oscar Canfield, nine; Clarissa Canfield, seven; Sylvia A. Canfield, five; Albert Canfield, three.

From Illinois—Mrs. Rebecca Hays; Henry C. Hays, aged four years. Eliza Spalding, Nancy E. Marsh and Lorrinda Bewley were also among the captives.

On New Year's day, 1848, Rev. H. H. Spalding, with ten others, being all the Americans from his mission, arrived at Walla Walla fort under escort of fifty Nez Perce Indians, to whom Mr. Ogden paid for their safe delivery twelve blankets, twelve shirts, twelve handkerchiefs, five fathoms of tobacco, two guns, two hundred rounds of ammunition and some knives.

Three days later Mr. Ogden started to Fort Vancouver with the captives in boats. Shortly after he had left the fort at Walla Walla, fifty Cayuse warriors dashed up to the place and demanded the surrender of Mr. Spalding, to be killed, as word had reached them of the arrival of American volunteers at The Dalles, to make war upon them, and they held him responsible for that fact.

The ransomed captives from Wailatpu and the missionaries from Lapwai reached the Willamette valley in safety. Concerning the experiences of the people of the Tchimakain mission, Professor W. D. Lyman says:

"Few things more thrilling ever came under the observation of the writer than the narration, by Fathers Eells and Walker, of the council of the Spokanes at Tchimakain, to decide whether or not to join the Cayuses. The lives of the missionaries hung on the decision. Imagine their emotions as they waited with bated breath in their mission house to know the result. After hours of excited discussion with the Cayuse emissaries, the Spokanes announced their decision: 'Go tell the Cayuses that the missionaries are our friends and we will defend them with our lives.'" This being the decision of the Indians, the Tchimakain missionaries, Revs. Eells and Walker, remained at their post of duty until the volunteers began active operations against the Cayuses, when they retired to Fort Colville. They were escorted thence, at the close of the war, by a detachment of Americans under command of Major Magone.

The massacre put the people of Oregon and their provisional government to a severe trial. That they both nobly stood the test speaks volumes for the patriotism of the one and the inherent strength of the other. Truly, every son of Oregon and the Northwest has cause for pride in the sterling qualities of the men and women who planted the seed of American civilization and American institutions in the soil of the north Pacific states.

"While the hearts of the legislators were bursting," says Mrs. Victor, "with pain and indignation for the crime they were called upon to mourn, and perhaps to avenge, there was something almost farcical in the situation. Funds! Funds to prosecute a possible war! There was in the treasury of Oregon the sum of forty-three dollars and seventy-two cents, with an outstanding indebtedness of four thousand and seventy-nine dollars and seventy-four cents. Money! Money, indeed! Where was money to come from in Oregon? The governor's first thought had been the Hudson's Bay Company. It was always the company the colonists thought of first when they were in trouble. But there might be some difficulty about a loan from that source. Had not the board of London managers warned the Oregon officers to 'stick to their beaver skins'? And had not Dr. McLoughlin resigned from his position as head of the company in Oregon because the London board reproved him for assisting immigrants, and thereby encouraging the American occupation of the country? And now there was an Indian war impending, with only these gentlemen who had been ordered to 'stick to their beaver skins' to turn to. There were the merchants of Oregon City, to be sure; a few hundred might be raised among them. And there was the Methodist mission—the governor had not mentioned that; but—well, they could try it!"

The colonial legislature does not seem to have wasted much time in bewailing its helpless condition. It acted. No sooner were read the brief message of the governor relative to the massacre and its accompanying documents, than a resolution was offered that the governor be instructed to raise, arm and equip a company of fifty riflemen to proceed forthwith to the mission station at The Dalles and hold the same. That day, December 8th, the company was enlisted. Next day it was officered, presented with a flag by the ladies of Oregon City and sent by boats to its destination.

December 10th a bill was passed authorizing and requiring the governor to raise a regiment of riflemen by volunteer enlistment, not to exceed five hundred men; this regiment was to "rendezvous at Oregon City on the 25th of December, A. D. 1847, and proceed thence with all possible despatch to the Walla Walla valley for the purpose of punishing the Indians, to what tribe or tribes soever they may belong, who may have aided or abetted the massacre of Dr. Whitman and his wife, and others at Waiilatpu." The bill also provided that "Jesse Applegate, A. L. Lovejoy and George L. Curry be and are hereby authorized and empowered to negotiate a loan not to exceed one hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; and that said commissioners be and are authorized to pledge the faith of the territory for the payment of such sum as may be negotiated for by the said commissioners, on the most practicable terms, payable within three years from date of said loan, unless sooner discharged by the government of the United States."

The governor and the loan commissioners set out, as soon as the bill became a law, for Vancouver, to negotiate, if possible, a loan from the Hudson's Bay Company. Formal application was made to Sir James Douglas, December 11th, the commissioners pledging the faith and means of the provisional government for the reimbursement of the company, and stating that they did not consider this pledge the only security their creditors would have. "Without claiming," said they, "any special authority from the government of the United States to contract a debt to be liquidated by that power, yet from all precedents of like character in the history of our country, the undersigned feel confident that the United States government will regard the murder of the late Dr. Whitman and his lady as a national wrong, and will fully justify the people of Oregon in taking active measures to obtain redress for that outrage and for their protection from further aggression."

As was expected, the chief factor declined to grant the loan, for the reason already outlined.

Governor Abernethy, Jesse Applegate and A. L. Lovejoy pledged their personal credit for the supplies needful to equip the company of riflemen already en route to The Dalles, and the immediate necessities of the government were thus relieved.

Returning to Oregon City, the committee addressed a circular to the merchants and citizens of Oregon, asking loans from all such as were able to contribute, either money or supplies. Its closing paragraphs are here quoted as showing the necessity for prompt action then existing or supposed to exist:

Though the Indians of the Columbia have committed a great outrage upon our fellow-citizens passing through their country, and residing among them, and their punishment for these murders may, and ought to be, a prime object with every citizen of Oregon, yet, as that duty more particularly devolves upon the government of the United States, and admits of delay, we do not make this the strongest ground upon which to found our earnest appeal to you for pecuniary assistance. It is a fact well known to every person acquainted with Indian character, that, by passing silently over their repeated thefts, robberies, and murders of our fellow-citizens, they have been emboldened to the commission of the appalling massacre at Waiilatpu. They call us "women," destitute of the hearts and courage of men, and if we allow this wholesale murder to pass by, as former aggressions, who can tell how long either life or property will be secure in any part of this country, or at what moment the Willamette will be the scene of blood and carnage?

The officers of our provisional government have nobly performed their duty. None can doubt the readiness of the patriotic sons of the west to offer their personal services in defense of a cause so righteous. So it rests with you, gentlemen, to say whether our rights and our firesides shall be defended or not. Hoping that none will be found to falter in so high and so sacred a duty, we beg leave, gentlemen, to subscribe ourselves your servants and fellow-citizens.

A specific letter to the Oregon mission was likewise prepared and sent. The result of the labors of the committee was such that on December 14th they were able to report, besides the loan of nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars, negotiated on the personal credit of two of the commissioners, with the governor, a loan of one thousand dollars subscribed at a citizens' meeting in Oregon City; sixteen hundred dollars from the merchants of Oregon City, and the probability that a loan of one thousand dollars would be secured from the mission.

The first committee then resigned, and on December 20th another was appointed consisting of A. L. Lovejoy, Hugh Burns and W. H. Willson. These gentlemen continued in office until the close of the war, engaged in the expensive and vexatious task of negotiating small loans of wheat, provisions, clothing, leather and all articles of use to the men in the field.

Of the regiment to be called into existence by the governor in accordance with legislative enactment, Cornelius Gilliam was elected colonel; James Waters, lieutenant-colonel; H. A. G. Lee, major, and Joel Palmer, commissary-general. The purpose of this military organization was to secure for punishment the Whitman murderers and all those who had taken an important part in the massacre. It was not intended that aggressive warfare should be waged against the Cayuse tribe as a whole, or, a fortiori, against any other tribe, as a matter of retribution, but it was intended that the murderers should be procured at all cost and that war should be waged against all who harbored them, until the desired end was achieved. Accordingly, a peace commission was sent along with the army, the personnel of which was Joel Palmer, Robert Newell and H. A. G. Lee, that the olive branch might be offered before resort to the sword should be had. Joseph L. Meek, who had been appointed to carry a memorial to congress, also purposed to accompany the army.

A base of supplies was established during the last days of December at the upper cascades of the Columbia. A few rude structures were erected and denominated Fort Gilliam, though they were more frequently referred to as "The Cabins."

"The history of this little post in the heart of the great Oregon Sierras became a most interesting one," says Mrs. Victor. "It was here that the hardest struggle of the war was carried on—not in fighting Indians, but in keeping the men in the field that had undertaken to do the fighting. In point of fact, the commissary department was charged with the principal burden of the war, and the title of 'General,' which Palmer acquired through being at the head of this department, might well have been bestowed upon him for his services in sustaining the organization of the army under conditions such as existed in Oregon in 1847-8. Without arms, without roads, without transportation other than small boats and pack horses, without comfortable winter clothing and with scanty food, the war was to be carried on at a distance of nearly three hundred miles from the settlements. And if the volunteer soldiers were called upon to endure these hardships, which General Palmer was doing his best to overcome, the commissioned officers were no less embarrassed by the want of the most ordinary appliances of their rank or position—even to the want of a proper field-glass."

Early in January, 1848, Colonel Gilliam started up the river from the rendezvous at Portland, arriving at Vancouver the first day. He did not do as he was said to have threatened, attempt to levy on the Hudson's Bay Company's goods to supply his troops. On the contrary, he purchased such supplies as he stood in urgent necessity of, pledging his own credit and that of Commissary-General Palmer, who accompanied him, for the payment. Having reached the cascades, he left there one company to construct a road from the lower to the upper portage, himself and the balance of his command proceeding to Fort Gilliam, where he received a dispatch from Major Lee, at The Dalles. By this he was informed that the major had had a fight with Indians, January 8th, brought on by an attempt of the latter to round up and drive away stock left at the mission by immigrants. The skirmish lasted two hours and resulted in a loss to the enemy of three killed and one injured, while the white loss was one man wounded. The Indians, however, secured three hundred head of beef cattle. The next day sixty horses belonging to the hostiles were captured.

The receipt of this information determined Gilliam to push on with all speed to The Dalles. As soon as the governor heard of the fight he directed the colonel to select some of his best men and scour the Des Chutes river country, being careful to distinguish between friendly and hostile Indians, but vigorous in his treatment of the latter.

About the last of January, Colonel Gilliam set out with one hundred and thirty men for the Des Chutes river. Arrived there, he sent Major Lee to the supposed position of the hostiles on the east side of the river. He struck the Indians in full retreat towards the mountains and killed one of their number, but while returning to camp was attacked in a ravine by a considerable force. His command were compelled to dismount and seek the shelter of rocks and bushes, where they remained, annoyed but uninjured by the enemy, until night. Next day the Indians were attacked with vigor and driven to their village, then out of it again, leaving it at the mercy of the whites. It was destroyed, as was also much cached property which could not be carried away.

Returning to Fort Lee at The Dalles, the officers held there a council on the 11th of February with the peace commissioners, who had arrived in the meantime, to formulate a plan of action. It was agreed that the commissioners should precede the army, and the date fixed for them to start was the 14th, but word having been received on the 13th that a combination of hostile tribes had been effected, Gilliam decided to march at once with three hundred men. The commissioners were displeased but had to acquiesce, so the forces of war and the bearers of the olive branch journeyed together toward the scene of the massacre.

On the 23d an understanding was effected with the Des Chutes Indians and the next day two messengers arrived from the Yakima country stating that the Yakimas had taken the advice of the peace commissioners and decided not to join the Cayuses in a war against the Americans. A letter brought by one of them read as follows:

CAMP OF CIAIES, February 16, 1848.

M. Commander:

The Yakima chiefs, Ciaies and Skloom, have just presented me a letter signed by Messrs. Joel Palmer, Robert Newell and H. A. G. Lee, which I have read, and a young Indian, son of one of the chiefs, translated it to them in Yakima language. The chiefs above mentioned charged me to say to you in their name, in those of Carnaireum and of Chananate, that they accept, with acknowledgments, the tobacco and the banner which you sent them. They have resolved to follow your counsel, and not unite themselves with the Cayuses, but to remain at rest upon their lands. On my arrival at the camp of Ciaies, that chief assured me that he would not join the Cayuses. I could but see, with the greatest of pleasure, dispositions which will prevent the spilling of blood and which will facilitate the means of instructing those Indians.

Your humble servant,

G. BLANCHET.

During the forenoon of the 24th the march was resumed, the peace commissioners in front with a white flag. Their friendly advances to the Indians were repelled and at noon a large number of hostiles were seen on the hill signaling for a fight. They collected quickly in the path of the advancing army and soon their desire for battle was gratified. The battle of Sand Hollows, as it is called, began on a plain where depressions in the sand formed natural rifle pits. The baggage train, protected by the company of Captain Laurence Hall, formed the center of the white forces. The left flank, consisting of the companies of Captain Philip F. Thompson and Captain H. J. G. Maxon, were on the north side of the road, and the companies of Levi N. English and Thomas McKay constituted the right of the command.

The principal leaders of the Indians were Five Crows and War Eagle, both Cayuses. They had assured their followers that they were both "big medicine" men, invulnerable to bullets; indeed, War Eagle went so far as to claim that he could swallow all the bullets the whites could shoot at him. They attempted to prove their prowess by riding up close to the white lines and acting in an insolent manner. The whites had been ordered to hold fire in order to give the peace commissioners a fair chance, but Captain McKay, angered by their insults, shot War Eagle, killing him instantly. Five Crows was seriously wounded by a shot from another soldier, so seriously that he had to resign his command of the Indian forces. Several severe attacks were made on the soldiers during the day, but the Indians were everywhere beaten and eventually fled, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. It is stated that the Indian loss was thirteen killed and wounded, and the American five men wounded.

The volunteers passed the ensuing night at a place where neither wood nor water could be obtained. Next day they were asked to meet some of the Cayuses in council, but refused to halt until they reached a place where their thirst could be slaked. The night of the 25th was passed on the banks of the Umatilla, which was crossed next day. After the army had encamped, Sticcas and other Cayuses made overtures for peace and were told to meet the commissioners at Wailatapu. The reluctance of the whites to treat arose out of the fact that they had not heard from William McBean, at Fort Walla Walla, as they expected. The truth was that their communications to him had been intercepted by Taitowé, who, however, delivered the letters, but destroyed McBean's reply. Were it not for this an arrangement might have been effected on the Umatilla by which the murderers would be delivered up and the war terminated, but the delay proved fatal to such a consummation.

February 28th the troops reached Walla Walla, where the foregoing facts were ascertained by them in personal conference with McBean. Moving to the site of the Whitman mission, the troops busied themselves on the 3d of March in reinterring the bodies of the dead, which had been exhumed and partly devoured by coyotes. The sight of the numerous evidences of savage malevolence aroused the military spirit of commander and men, and the commissioners saw that the ardor of both for fight might embarrass them in their efforts to conclude a peace. A fortification was commenced at once and its construction continued on the 4th and 5th, though the latter date fell on Sunday. On the 6th two hundred and fifty friendly Nez Percés and Cayuses came into camp and held a council with the volunteers, expressing themselves as disposed to maintain peaceful relations with their white brethren.

In this council, "Gilliam could not avoid acting his part; but as commander of the army he was ill at ease. He saw the Cayuses passing by unharmed, going to the Nez Percé country in the hope of inducing their relatives and former allies to join them against the Americans, while just enough of them lingered behind to pick up the news about camp and act as go-betweens. Still, the influence of the superintendent (Palmer) was such that on the 8th the Nez Percé chiefs were encouraged to go to the Cayuse camp, then twenty-five miles distant, to endeavor to persuade the nation to give up the murderers, the army to follow on the next day, two of the commissioners accompanying it."

The army did move in that direction on the 9th, but had scarcely started when Sticcas came, bringing in some property stolen from the mission and asking for a talk. Gilliam reluctantly called a halt. Sticcas announced the refusal of the Cayuses to surrender Taitowé or Tamsucky, and Gilliam made a most remarkable proposal to withdraw demands for five of the murderers if Joe Lewis should be surrendered, a proposition to which the other commissioners would not agree.

After this council, Palmer, Lee and Newell, with Captain McKay, who was in bad health, left for the Willamette, and Gilliam, with a hundred and fifty-eight men, proceeded toward Snake river. The first day out he was met by three Indians who reported that Sticcas had captured Joe Lewis, but that the prisoner had been rescued.

On the 13th he received a message from Taitowé asserting the friendship of that chief and stating that Tamsucky had gone to the camp of Red Wolf, on Snake river, while Tiloukaikt was proceeding down the Tucanon, bound for the Palouse country. Gilliam made a night march to the camp of Tiloukaikt and surprised it, but suffered himself to be outwitted by this wily Cayuse. The latter sent out an aged Indian, who assured the colonel that he was mistaken, that this was not Tiloukaikt's, but Peo-peo-mox-mox's camp, and that Tiloukaikt had gone, leaving his cattle on the hills beyond. Completely deluded, Gilliam refrained from attacking the camp, but crossed the river and climbed up the precipitous farther bank, arriving in time to see the last of the cattle swimming the Snake. The volunteers, who might have won a decisive victory, collected a large band of Indian horses and set out on the return to the Touchet. They were attacked in the rear by the Palouses, who annoyed them exceedingly that day and the next night, compelling them to turn loose the captured animals. The following morning, after two sleepless nights, they started on again and were again attacked. In the battle which followed, a sort of a running fight, the volunteers gained the victory, inflicting a loss on the Indians of four killed and fourteen wounded. "Their yells and battle cries were changed to wailing; the sharp war rattle and crack and ping of musketry were followed by the nerve-thrilling death song."

Arriving at Fort Waters (Wailatpu) on the 16th, a council of officers was held there two days later, at which it was decided that half the force should proceed to The Dalles to escort a supply train, Gilliam himself accompanying. They started on this mission the 20th. That night, while in camp beyond the Umatilla, a melancholy accident occurred. While Colonel Gilliam was drawing a rope from the wagon with which to tether his horse, a gun in the vehicle was discharged, causing his immediate death. "Thus," says Evans, "by an ignoble accident, was sacrificed the life of the idol of the Oregon troops, a zealous, impetuous soldier, a natural born leader, a brave and thorough patriot, a generous friend, a good citizen." There was, however, evidence that the volunteers were divided in their allegiance to the colonel.

Captain Maxon took command and proceeded to The Dalles, where he found a reinforcement of one company under Joseph M. Garrison awaiting him. His report to the adjutant-general gave a melancholy picture of conditions at Wailatpu, stating that Fort Waters was nothing but an adobe enclosure, that it was defended by only one hundred and fifty men, and that these were almost destitute of clothing and ammunition and wholly without bread. Fortunately, the men discovered caches of wheat and peas a little later, but their good fortune was not then known to Maxon.

The publication of these accounts of destitution and of stirring appeals for help did not go unheeded. A "Christian commission" on a small scale was organized at Oregon City to provide clothing and comforts for the soldiers. An address accompanying one shipment of goods is here reproduced as vividly reflecting the temper of the pioneer women of the Northwest:

OREGON CITY, April 12, 1848.

The volunteers of the first regiment of Oregon riflemen will please accept from the ladies of Oregon City and vicinity the articles herewith forwarded to them. The intelligence which convinces us of your many hardships, excessive fatigues, and your chivalrous bearing also satisfies us of your urgent wants.

These articles are not tendered for acceptance as a compensation for your services rendered; we know that a soldier's heart would spurn with contempt any boon tendered by us with such an object; accept them as a brother does, and may, accept a sister's tribute of remembrance—as a token, an evidence, that our best wishes have gone to, and will remain with, you in your privations, your marches, your battles and your victories.

Your fathers and ours, as soldiers, have endured privations and sufferings, and poured out their blood as water, to establish undisturbed freedom east of the Rocky mountains; your and our mothers evinced the purity of their love of country, upon those occasions, by efforts to mitigate the horrors of war, in making and providing clothing for the soldiers. Accept this trifling present as an indorsement of an approval of the justice of the cause in which you have volunteered, and of your bearing in the service of our common country as manly, brave and patriotic.

The war which you have generously volunteered to wage was challenged by acts the most ungrateful, bloody, barbarous and brutal.

Perhaps the kindness which the natives have received at the hands of American citizens on their way hither, has, to some extent, induced belief on the part of the natives, that all the Americans are "women" and dare not resent an outrage, however shameful, bloody or wicked. Your unflinching bravery has struck this foolish error from the minds of your enemies, and impressed them with terror, and it is for you, and a brotherhood who will join you, to follow up the victories so gloriously commenced until a succession of victories shall compel an honorable peace, and insure respect for the American arms and name.

We have not forgotten that the soul-sickening massacres and the enormities at Wailatpu were committed in part upon our sex. We know that your hardships and privations are great; but may we not hope that through you these wrongs shall not only be amply avenged, but also that you will inscribe upon the hearts of our savage enemies a conviction never to be erased that the virtue and lives of American women will be protected, defended and avenged by American men.

The cause which you have espoused is a holy cause. We believe that the God of battles will so direct the destinies of this infant settlement, that she will come out of this contest clothed in honor, and her brave volunteers covered with glory.

The younger ladies of Oregon also showed their sympathy with the war and its objects by preparing the following:

"RESPONSE BY YOUNG LADIES TO THE CALL OF CAPTAIN MAXON FOR YOUNG MEN IN THE ARMY.

"We have read with much interest the late report from the army, and feel ourselves under obligation to reply to the appeal made to us in that report. We are asked to evince our influence for our country's good by withholding our hand from any young man who refuses to turn out in defense of our honor and our country's right.

"In reply, we hereby, one and all, of our own free good-will, solemnly pledge ourselves to comply with that request, and to evince on all suitable occasions our detestation and contempt for any and all young men who can, but will not, take up arms and march at once to the seat of war, to punish the Indians who have not only murdered our friends, but have grossly insulted our sex. We never can, and never will, bestow our confidence upon a man who has neither patriotism nor courage enough to defend his country and the girls—such a one would never have sufficient sense of obligation to defend and protect a wife.

"Do not be uneasy about your claims and your rights in the valley; while you are defending the rights of your country, she is watching yours. You must not be discouraged. Fight on, be brave, obey your officers, and never quit your posts till the enemy is conquered; and when you return in triumph to the valley, you shall find us as ready to rejoice with you as we now are to sympathize with you in your sufferings and dangers."

(Signed by fifteen young ladies.)

The same report impelled the government to issue the following proclamation:

Recent accounts from the seat of war show that the Indians are in pretty strong force, and determined to fight. Many of the tribes have expressed a desire to remain peaceful, but there can be no question that the slightest defeat on our part will encourage portions of them to unite against us, and if they should unfortunately succeed in cutting off or crippling our army, it would be a signal for a general union among them; fear is the only thing that will restrain them. It is necessary at the present moment to keep a strong force in the field to keep those friendly that have manifested a desire for peace, and to keep the hostile Indians busy in their own country, for the war must now either be carried on there, or in our valley. The question is not now a matter of dollars and cents only; but whether exertions will be made on the part of citizens of the territory to reinforce and sustain the army in the upper country, and keep down the Indians (which our men are able and willing to do if supported) or disband the army and fight them in the valley. One of the two must be done. If the army is disbanded, before two months roll around we will hear of depredations on our frontiers, families will be cut off, and the murderers on their fleet horses out of our reach in some mountain pass before we hear of the massacre.

Many young men are willing to enlist and proceed to the seat of war, but are unable to furnish an outfit; let their neighbors assist them, fit them out well and send them on. As a people we must assist and carry on the war. I hope sincerely that the government of the United States will speedily extend its protecting care over us, but in the meantime we must protect ourselves, and now is the time. I therefore call on all citizens of this territory to furnish three hundred men in addition to the number now in the field. Three new companies will be organized and attached to the regiment commanded by Colonel H. A. G. Lee; each company to consist of eighty-five men, rank and file; the remainder will be distributed among the companies already organized; the enlistments to be for six months, unless sooner discharged by proclamation or relieved by the troops of the United States. Each man will furnish his own horse, arms, clothing and blankets. The companies will bring all the ammunition, percussion caps and camp equipments they can, for which they will receive a receipt from the commissary-general.

All citizens willing to enlist will form themselves into detachments in their several counties and be ready to march to Portland, so as to arrive there on the 18th day of April, on which day Colonel Lee will be there to organize the new companies; after which the line of march will be taken up for Waillatpu. If a sufficient number of men to form a foot company appear on the ground, they will be received as one of the above companies.

In witness whereof I have signed my name and affixed the seal of the territory.

Done at Oregon City this first day of April, 1848.

An appeal was also made in vigorous language by one of the officers, supposed to be Lee, designed to stimulate enlistment. The heart of old Oregon was not steeled against such appeals, and though she had drawn heavily upon her resources in raising, arming and equipping, without help from any power outside herself, the men already in the field, she now made still greater exertions that the campaign might be prosecuted with even greater vigor. Polk and Clackamas counties came forward with one company, Linn with one, Yamhill and Tualatin with one, and Clatsop with a few volunteers, numbering in all about two hundred and fifty men.

The amount of exertion this required can hardly be realized at this date. "Popular as was the war," writes Mrs. Victor, "it was a difficult matter putting another battalion in the field. The commissariat had at no time been maintained without great exertion on the part of its officers, and often great sacrifice on the part of the people. The commissary-general's sworn and bonded agents in every county had from the beginning strained every nerve to collect arms, ammunition and clothing, for which they paid in government bonds or loan commissioner's scrip. As there was very little cash in circulation, and as the common currency of Oregon had been wheat, it had come to pass that 'wheat notes' had been received in place of cash as contributions to the war fund. The wheat thus collected could be sold for cash or its equivalent at Vancouver, and thus, after passing through the circumlocution office, this awkward currency, which had to be gathered up, stored in warehouses, hauled to boat landings, set adrift upon the Willamette, hauled around the falls at Oregon City, and there reloaded for Vancouver, was there at length exchanged for real money or goods. The collection of provisions for the consumption of the army was another matter, and not less burdensome. The agents could refuse no lot of provisions because it was small or miscellaneous, nor reject any articles of use to soldiers because they were not of the best. Lead was purchased in any quantities from one to several pounds, and was hard to find, all that was in the country being that which was brought across the plains by the immigrants for use upon the road. Powder and percussion caps were obtained in the same way, or purchased with wheat notes at Vancouver."

H. A. G. Lee was appointed colonel, vice Cornelius Gilliam, deceased. His appointment was unsatisfactory to some, as Captain Waters was the man to whom, in the natural order of promotion, the honor belonged. Accordingly, there were some resignations of inferior officers, causing annoyance and delay to the new commander, who had also been entrusted with the duties of Indian superintendent, Joel Palmer having resigned. But these difficulties were in due time overcome, and on May 3d Lee set out for Fort Waters. He had learned from Maxon at The Dalles that the Yakimas were friendly. Some of the chiefs had visited the major and expressed themselves in this language:

"We do not want to fight the Americans nor the French; neither do the Spokanes, a neighboring tribe to us. Last fall the Cayuses told us they were about to kill the whites at Dr. Whitman's. We told them that was wrong, which made them mad at us, and when they killed them they came to us and wished us to fight the whites, which we refused. We love the whites; but they say, 'If you do not help us to fight the whites, when we have killed them we will come and kill you.' This made us cry, but we told them we would not fight, but if they desired to kill us they might. We should feel happy to know that we died innocently."

Upon arriving in the Cayuse country, Lee, in his capacity as superintendent, held a council of Nez Percés and others, on request of the Indians. Peo-peo-mox-mox, whose friendship had been alienated by the act of the legislature withholding ammunition from all Indians, again took a friendly attitude toward the whites, and it was evident that reinforcements from the Willamette and the expectation that a regiment of mounted riflemen would soon arrive from the United States were bringing the Indians to a humble and peaceable frame of mind. The red men in council were informed that the whites were determined to hold the country until the murderers were punished and the stolen property returned.

When Lee reached Waillatpu, about the 9th of May, he reviewed the situation and determined that it were best he should resign the colonelcy in favor of Lieutenant-Colonel Waters. "I have great confidence in him," he wrote, "and doubt not the troops will find him competent to the task before him. To prevent any discord or rupture in the regiment, at the request of the officers and men, I have consented to act as lieutenant-colonel during the approaching campaign." This act of self-abnegation and patriotism at a critical juncture restored harmony in the ranks and put the volunteers in condition for a vigorous campaign.

On the 17th of May more than four hundred men started for the Nez Perce country, whither, it was reported, the murderers had gone. At the Coppei river the forces divided, one hundred and twenty-one men under Lee going to Red Wolf's camp to prevent the fugitives escaping to the mountains; the remainder of the volunteers going to the mouth of the Palouse to cut off their retreat down the Columbia. Lee learned, on reaching Red Wolf's camp, that Tiloukaikt's band, two days before, had escaped from the country with everything they owned except some stock at Lapwai. There he went, arriving on the 21st and taking charge of the abandoned cattle. By aid of the friendly Nez Percés, he was enabled to drive back to Waters' camp one hundred and eighteen head of horses and forty head of cattle.

The main command, under Colonel Waters, had succeeded, after considerable delay, in crossing the Snake river, and had also pushed on toward Lapwai. On the 22d a letter was received from Rev. Cushing Eells stating that the Spokanes were divided in their sentiments toward the Americans and the war, though all condemned the massacre. The messengers who brought the letter volunteered to bring in a number of Tiloukaikt's cattle and succeeded in doing so, bringing in also two Nez Percés, who informed the colonel that the main band was near Snake river. They also stated that Tiloukaikt himself had fled to the mountains. Major Magone, with a hundred men, was sent to bring in the stock belonging to the hostiles and to capture any Indians suspected of acting with the fugitives. The stock was brought in, according to orders, but the only suspect encountered was run down and killed, contrary to orders.

It became evident that nothing could be accomplished by a regiment in the Nez Perce country, as the Cayuses had fled. Even the capture and confiscation of property was unsatisfactory, as it was sure to be claimed by some professedly friendly Indian, and the volunteers could hardly choose but return it. The governor and military officers, therefore, determined to close the campaign, notwithstanding the murderers had not been captured. A detachment of fifty-five men under Major Magone went to Fort Colville to give Missionaries Eells and Walker, who had sought protection there when the war broke out, safe conduct to The Dalles. The remainder of the command returned to Waiilatpu. There a council of war was held to determine whether to abandon or to hold Fort Waters. The majority favored abandonment, but Lee was determined that the advantages gained by the war should not be lost by a complete withdrawal from the country. By interesting some responsible men in a scheme of colonization, and promising to secure them as far as was in his power against treaty stipulations prejudicial to their interests, he succeeded in inducing fifty-five volunteers to remain in the fort with Captain William Martin until September, when, it was expected, Captain Thompson would return with a colony of intending settlers. The immigrant road was thus kept in a condition of comparative safety, so that the immigration of 1848, numbering about eight hundred souls, experienced no trouble with Indians.

The results of the war may be summed up briefly. While the murderers were not captured and hanged, they were severely punished by being despoiled of their property and made wanderers and vagabonds on the face of the earth. The power and prestige of the Cayuse tribe were broken forever. The other tribes of the interior, who had been led by the non-resistance and reluctance to fight displayed by immigrants passing through their country with families and herds to consider the Americans a race of cowards, were effectually taught their error, and while the race struggle was not ended, it was delayed until the whites were much better able to contest successfully against the savages arrayed in the pathway of progress.

Negotiations were kept up constantly with the tribes of the interior for the peaceful surrender of the murderers after the provisional government was eventually superseded by a territorial form. The Cayuses, though war was no longer waged against them, saw that their case was becoming more and more hopeless by reason of the fact that the United States government had at last extended protecting arms to Oregon and the American power in the west was rapidly increasing. At last, despairing of their ability to longer protect the murderers, they compelled or induced five of them to surrender for trial. These were Tiloukaikt, Tamahas, Klokamas, Isaiachalakis and Kiamasumpkin. They were given a fair trial, convicted, and on the 3d of June, 1850, executed, all of them, at Oregon City. Thus ignobly perished probably the last of those immediately concerned in the massacre, though the fate of Joe Lewis and others may not be certainly known.

CHAPTER VIII.

EARLY DAYS IN WASHINGTON.

The territory north of the Columbia river did not share in the benefits derived from the earliest immigrations into the Northwest. In the diplomatic contest for the country, it had been steadfastly claimed by Great Britain, whose proposal, several times reiterated, was that the Columbia should form the boundary. Perhaps on account of the industrious inculcation on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company of the belief that northern Oregon would be conceded to Great Britain, the benefits of the provisional government were not expressly extended to the territory now forming Washington state, and for several years after the Americanization of the Willamette valley began, the fur company held undisputed sway over the trans-Columbia region. In order to further strengthen the hands of the British government in its territorial claims that company had organized the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, through which considerable progress was made in farming and stock-raising, as is shown by the following description of the Cowlitz and Nisqually tracts, written in 1841 by the pen of Sir George Simpson:

"Between the Cowlitz river and Puget sound, a distance of about sixty miles, the country, which is watered by many streams and lakes, consists of an alternation of plains and belts of wood. It is well adapted both for tillage and pasturage, possessing a genial climate, good soil, excellent timber, water power, natural clearings and a seaport, and that, too, within reach of more than one advantageous market. When this tract was explored, a few years ago, the Hudson's Bay Company established two farms upon it, which were subsequently transferred to the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, formed under the company's auspices, with the view of producing wheat, wool, hides, and tallow for exportation. On the Cowlitz farm there were already about a thousand acres of land under the plow, besides a large dairy, and an extensive park for horses and stock; and the crop this season amounted to eight or nine thousand bushels of wheat, four thousand of oats, with a due proportion of barley, potatoes, etc. The other farm was on the shores of Puget sound (Nisqually plains), and, as its soil was found to be better fitted for pasturage than tillage, it had been appropriated almost exclusively to the flocks and herds. So that now, with only two hundred acres of cultivated land, it possessed six thousand sheep, twelve hundred cattle, besides horses, pigs, etc. In addition to these two farms, there was a Catholic mission, with about one hundred and sixty acres under the plow. There were also a few Canadian settlers, retired servants of the Hudson's Bay Company, and it was to the same neighborhood that the emigrants from Red river were wending their way."

To still further strengthen British claim to northern Oregon, as the country was then called, the Hudson's Bay Company undertook the task of settling the still unoccupied lands, or some of them, with British subjects from the Red river country of Canada. As an inducement to such to make the tedious journey over the many weary leagues which intervened between the Red River of the North and Puget sound, the company offered to each head of a family, upon arrival, the use and increase of fifteen cows, fifteen ewes, all needful work oxen or horses and the use of house and barns. In answer to this call, an emigration left the vicinity of Fort Garry on the 15th of June, 1841. They were overtaken by the party of Sir George Simpson, who described them as consisting of agriculturists and others, principally natives of Red river settlement. "There were twenty-three families," says he, "the heads being young and active, though a few of them were advanced in life, more particularly one poor woman, upwards of seventy-five years of age, who was following after her son to his new home. As a contrast to this superannuated daughter of the Saskatchewan, the band contained several young travelers, who had, in fact, made their appearance in this world since the commencement of the journey. Beyond the inevitable detention, which seldom exceeded a few hours, these interesting events had never interfered with the progress of the brigade; and both mother and child used to jog on, as if jogging on were the condition of human existence. Each family had two or three carts, together with bands of horses, cattle and dogs. The men and lads traveled in the saddle, while the vehicles, which were covered with awnings against the sun and rain, carried the women and young children. As they marched in single file, their cavalcade extended above a mile in length; and we increased the length of the column by marching in company. The emigrants were all healthy and happy, living in the greatest abundance and enjoying the journey with the highest relish. Before coming up to these people, we had seen evidence of the comfortable state of their commissariat in the shape of two or three still warm buffaloes, from which only the tongue and a few other choice bits had been taken."

The company crossed the Rocky mountains early in August, reached Fort Walla Walla on the 4th of October, assisted in removing valuables from that fort, which burned that night or the next morning, and finally arrived, after the loss of two or three members who changed their destination while en route, in the Sound country. Some of the families remained at the Cowlitz farm over winter and some at Fort Nisqually. It was claimed by them that the company acted in bad faith in the matter of fulfilling its pledges. Whether or not this be true, not many of the families located permanently in the country, and the colonization scheme may be considered a failure.

The honor of having made the initial attempt to colonize northern Oregon in American interests is universally conceded to one Michael T. Simmons, the "Daniel Boone of Washington." Simmons is described as a stalwart Kentuckian, endowed with the splendid physique and indomitable courage for which the sons of that state are famous. Arriving at Vancouver in 1844, he spent most of the winter there, and doubtless learned from the chance expressions of Hudson's Bay men something of the value of the country to the northward. At any rate, he gave up his former intentions of going to southern Oregon, as the company wished him to do, and determined to explore the forests of the north, as the company very much opposed his doing. He is credited with having patriotic as well as personal motives for undertaking this spying-out of the land. He started on his exploring expedition with five companions during the winter of 1844-5, purposing to find or make a pathway to Puget sound. But the inclemencies of the season necessitated his temporary abandonment of the enterprise, and having ascended the Cowlitz river about fifty miles, he returned to Vancouver. In July he set out again with eight companions. Reaching the sound in due season, he made some explorations of its shores in canoes and informed himself of its resources and value. He chose as a site for his colony a picturesque spot near the falls of the Des Chutes river, made a return trip to Vancouver, and soon was back on the sound with James McAllister, Gabriel Jones, David Kindred and George W. Bush and their families, also S. B. Crockett and Jesse Ferguson. Such is the personnel of the first American colony in Washington.

"Not one entering the region at the present time," wrote the late H. K. Hines, "can form any idea of the difficulty attending the enterprise of these people. The forests of the country were almost impenetrable, and they covered nearly all its space. To open a trail from the Cowlitz river northward was the hard work of weeks, and then to make such an inroad upon the forest as to give any hope of future support for their families was a task that only brave and manly men would dare to undertake. But empire and destiny were in these men's hands and hearts, and they were equal to the work they had undertaken. But as we now think of it, after fifty years, we wonder how these seven men, isolated one hundred and fifty miles from any who could aid them, and surrounded by the savages of Puget sound, who were watching with evil eye the inroads of the whites, succeeded in establishing themselves and their families in this then most inhospitable region. That they did marks them as heroes."

The next year, 1846, added a very few more to the American population of Washington, among them Edward Sylvester, upon whose land claim Olympia was afterward built, and the well-known men, A. B. Robbeson and S. S. Ford. A small number settled in 1847, but these few "were of the same sterling stuff as those who had preceded them and added much to the moral and intellectual fiber of the infant settlement."

"This year was also signalized," says Hines, "by the erection of a saw-mill at the falls of the Des Chutes, since called Tumwater, on the land claim of M. T. Simmons. A small flouring mill had before been erected at the same place, with buhrs hewn out of some granite rock found on the beach of Budd's inlet, which afforded some unbolted flour as a change from boiled wheat for bread."

A somewhat larger settlement was effected during 1848, many of the new-comers taking claims along the Cowlitz river. One man, Thomas W. Glasgow, attempted settlement on Whidby's island. A few others started to establish homes in his vicinity during the summer, but all were compelled to withdraw, the Indians at a council called by Patkanin, chief of the Snoqualmies, having decided not to allow them to remain on the island. The next two years were years of apparent retrogression rather than progress, for the adult male population was induced away by the discovery of gold in California, leaving none but women and boys to sow and reap, or plan and execute new enterprises. Later, however, the spray from the tidal wave of population attracted to the Golden State by the discovery of the precious metal, spread over Puget sound, bringing activity and progress.

Mr. Simmons, the advance agent of American occupancy, gained further distinction in 1850 by giving inception to American commerce on the sound. A brig had reached these waters during the year, having been purchased by several of the sound residents from certain gold seekers from Maine. Simmons bought her, loaded her with piles, and taking these to San Francisco, exchanged them for general merchandise. The goods were exposed for sale in a small building in Smithfield, the town which later became known as Olympia.

"This initial stake of business having been thus successfully set at Olympia," says Hines, "the lines of settlement began to extend from it in every direction. Steilacoom, occupying a point on the sound below Olympia and abreast of the Nisqually plains, was settled and a large business house erected there. Port Townsend was settled by H. C. Wilson. I. N. Ebey, late in the fall of 1850, occupied the claim on Whidby's island, from which Glasgow had been driven by the hostilities of Patkanim, and R. H. Lansdale took a claim at the head of Penn's cove. These were among the first, if not the first, who established themselves above the lower portions of the sound, but they were soon followed by Pettygrove and Hastings. A town was laid out on the west side of Port Townsend bay, called after the bay itself, Port Townsend, and so the year 1850 closed, having registered a somewhat substantial advancement in the country of Puget sound. Still, the settlements were only a frayed and fretted fringe of white on the edge of the dark forests, and darker humanity, of the vast region encompassing the waters of the great inland sea. But the time had come for a more appreciable advance."

The year 1851 brought not a few immigrants who wished to seek their fortunes on the shores of the sound. Of these, some were ambitious to build homes for themselves wherever the agricultural possibilities of the country were greatest and most easily developed; others to find a spot which must eventually become a trade center and become rich through "unearned increment" in the value of their holdings. Among the latter class were C. C. Terry, A. A. and D. T. Denny, W. N. Bell, C. T. Boren, John C. Holgate and John Low, who selected claims on Elliott bay and became prominent in the founding and building of Seattle. It is stated that in four years this town had a population of three hundred.

Contemporaneous with, or within a year or two after the settlement already adverted to, was the settlement of Whidby's island, New Dungeness, Bellingham bay, the north bank of the Columbia river from the Cascade mountains to its mouth, Baker's bay, Shoalwater bay, Gray's harbor and other places. The coal and timber resources of the country began attracting attention at this time, resulting in the building up of immense milling enterprises at different points on the sound.

The ambition of these pioneers to become the founders of a new commonwealth, to add a new star to the American constellation, had co-operated with the natural advantages of the country from the first to induce them into and hold them in the sound basin. That ambition began its struggle for accomplishment as early as the 4th of July, 1851, when J. B. Chapman addressed all those who met in Olympia to celebrate the nation's birthday, upon the subject, "The Future State of Columbia." So great were his enthusiasm and eloquence that they inspired the people to immediate activity. They held a meeting forthwith and decided that a convention should be held at Cowlitz landing, said convention to be composed of delegates from all the election districts north of the Columbia. Its purpose was "to take into careful consideration the peculiar position of the northern portion of the territory, its wants, the best methods of supplying those wants, and the propriety of an early appeal to congress for a division of the territory."

On the day appointed the convention met. It adopted a memorial to congress praying for the division of the territory; for a territorial road from Puget sound over the Cascades to Walla Walla; for a plank road from the mouth of the Cowlitz river to the sound, and that the provisions of the Oregon Land Law should be continued, provided the division prayed for should be granted.

No action was had by congress on the memorial, and enthusiasm for segregation for a time waned. However, it was not suffered to die out entirely, for a paper named the Columbian was established at Olympia with the keeping alive of the new territory project as its main purpose. The first issue of this pioneer publication appeared September 11, 1852.

This journal was successful in compassing the convention of another body of men on organization bent. They met at Monticello, near the mouth of the Cowlitz, and prepared a memorial to congress pleading most eloquently the cause of segregation from Oregon. The efforts of this convention were supplemented by the legislature of Oregon territory, a few members of which, however, favored a project to make the Cascade range the boundary between the territory of Oregon and the territory of Columbia. The scheme of these contemplated the bounding of Oregon, north, south and west, by the British line, the California line and the ocean respectively, and east by Columbia territory, the Cascade range being the boundary line.

But the majority of the representatives and the majority of the people both north and south of the Columbia, favored that river as the line of division. General Lee, Oregon's delegate, brought the matter before congress. That body could not turn a deaf ear to the almost unanimous voice of the people directly affected by the proposed legislation, and on March 2d, 1853, the territory was organized as prayed for, the name "Washington" being substituted for "Columbia," however. A full quota of officers was appointed for the new territory, namely: Governor, Isaac Ingall Stevens; secretary, C. H. Mason; chief justice, Edward Lander; associate justices, John R. Miller and Victor Monroe; district attorney, J. S. Clendenin; United States marshal, J. Patton Anderson. Miller refused the appointment and O. B. McFadden, of Oregon, became associate justice in his stead. While all of these officers were capable and efficient, the choice for governor was especially felicitous, Stevens being just the man to guide the newly-built ship of state through the stormy seas it was so soon to sail.

Governor Stevens began bestowing blessings upon the new territory long before he reached its borders, for ere he left Washington he obtained charge of the survey of the northern route for the proposed trans-continental railway—one of the first grand schemes of the American government for the subjugation and development of its vast territorial possessions. This circumstance gave to the northern route a zealous, able and well-informed advocate. There can be no doubt that the full and accurate reports of Governor Stevens and his zeal for the route which he believed the most expedient, did more than anything else to fix the general location of the Northern Pacific railroad, and to give to the young commonwealth over which Stevens presided that most potential factor in its subsequent development.

Having arrived at length in the young commonwealth of which he had been called to assume executive control, Governor Stevens at once addressed himself to the mastery of the difficult problems presenting themselves. He found a field of labor presenting a splendid opportunity for the exercise of his extraordinary abilities. Of the conditions as he found them, his son, Hazard, in his excellent life of Washington's first governor, thus writes:

"It was indeed a wild country, untouched by civilization, and a scanty white population, sparsely sprinkled over the immense area, that were awaiting the arrival of Governor Stevens to organize civil government, and shape the destinies of the future. A mere handful of settlers, three thousand nine hundred and sixty-five all told, were widely scattered over western Washington, between the lower Columbia and the straits of Fuca. A small hamlet clustered around the military post at Vancouver. A few settlers were spread widely apart along the Columbia, among whom were Columbia Lancaster, on Lewis river; Seth Catlin, Dr. Nathaniel Ostrander and the Huntingtons about the mouth of the Cowlitz; Alexander S. Abernethy at Oak Point and Judge William Strong at Cathlamet.

Some oystermen in Shoalwater bay were taking shellfish for the San Francisco market. At Cowlitz landing, thirty miles up that river, were extensive prairies, where farms had been cultivated by the Hudson Bay Company, under the name of the Puget Sound Agricultural Company, for fifteen years; and here were a few Americans, a number of Scotch and Canadians, former employees of that company, and now looking forward to becoming American citizens and settling down upon their own claims under the Donation Act, which gave three hundred and twenty acres to every settler and as much more to his wife. A score of hardy pioneers had settled upon the scattered prairies between the Cowlitz farms and the sound; among them were John R. Jackson, typical English yeoman, on his prairie ten miles from the Cowlitz; S. S. Saunders, on Saunders bottom, where now stands the town of Chehalis; George Washington, a colored man, on the next prairie, the site of Centralia; Judge Sidney S. Ford, on his prairie on the Chehalis river below the mouth of Skookumchuck creek; W. B. Goodell, B. L. Henness and Stephen Hodgdon on Grand Mound prairie; A. B. Robbeson and W. W. Plumb, on Mound prairie. A number of settlers had taken up the prairies about Olympia, the principal of whom were W. O. Bush, Gabriel Jones, William Rutledge and David Kendrick on Bush prairie; J. N. Low, Andrew J. Chambers, Nathan Eaton, Stephen D. Ruddell and Urban E. Hicks on Chambers' prairie; David J. Chambers on the prairie of his name. James McAlister and William Packwood were on the Nisqually bottom, at the mouth of the river just north of which, on the verge of the Nisqually plains, was situated the Hudson Bay Company post, Fort Nisqually, a parallelogram of log buildings and stockade under charge of Dr. W. F. Tolmie, a warm-hearted and true Scot. Great herds of Spanish cattle, the property of the company, roamed over the Nisqually plains, little cared for and more than half wild, and, it is to be feared, occasionally fell prey to the rifles of hungry American emigrants. Two miles below Olympia, on the east side of the bay, was located a Catholic mission under Fathers Richard and Blanchet, where were a large building, an orchard and a garden. They had made a number of converts among the Indians.

"Towns, each as yet little more than a claim and a name, but each in the hope and firm belief of its founders destined to future greatness, were just started at Steilacoom, by Lafayette Balch; at Seattle, by Dr. E. S. Maynard, H. L. Yesler and the Denny's; at Port Townsend, by F. W. Pettygrove and L. B. Hastings, and at Bellingham bay, by Henry Roder and Edward Eldridge.

"Save the muddy track from the Cowlitz to the Olympia and thence to Steilacoom, and a few local trails, roads there were none. Communication was chiefly by water, almost wholly in canoes manned by Indians. The monthly steamer from San Francisco and a little river steambot plying daily between Vancouver and Portland alone vexed with their keels the mighty Columbia; while it was not until the next year that reckless, harum-scarum Captain Jack Scranton ran the Major Tompkins, a small black steamer, once a week around the sound, and had no rival. Here was this great wooded country without roads, the unrivaled waterways without steamers, the adventurous, vigorous, white population without laws, numerous tribes of Indians without treaties, and the Hudson's Bay Company's rights and possessions without settlement. To add to the difficulties and confusion of the situation, congress, by the Donation acts, held out a standing invitation to the American settlers to seize and settle upon any land, surveyed or unsurveyed, without waiting to extinguish the Indian title or define the lands guaranteed by solemn treaty to the foreign company, and already the Indians and the Hudson's Bay Company were growing more and more restless and indignant at the encroachments of the pushing settlers upon their choice spots. Truly, a situation fraught with difficulties and dangers, where everything was to be done and nothing yet begun.

"It is a great but common mistake to suppose that the early American settlers of Washington were a set of lawless, rough and ignorant borderers. In fact they compare favorably with the early settlers of any of the states. As a rule they were men of more than average force of character, vigorous, honest, intelligent, law-abiding and patriotic—men who had brought their families to carve out homes in the wilderness, and many of them men of education and of standing in their former abodes. Among them could be found the best blood of New England, the sturdy and kindly yeomanry of Virginia and Kentucky, and men from all the states of the middle west from Ohio to Arkansas. Most of them had slowly wended their way across the great plains, overcoming every obstacle and suffering untold privation; others had come by sea around Cape Horn, or across the isthmus. They were all true Americans, patriotic and brave, and filled with sanguine hope of, and firm faith in, the future growth and greatness of the new country which they had come to make blossom like the rose."

Governor Stevens, in the proclamation by which he gave inception to the work of organizing the territory, designated January 30, 1854, as the day for electing a delegate to congress and a local legislature. Columbia Lancaster was the choice of the people for the difficult task of representing the young commonwealth in Washington. The legislature chosen at the same time convened, pursuant to the governor's proclamation, on the 27th of February ensuing, and proceeded to transact such business and enact such laws as were necessary to put the territory on fairly sound footing. The message of the governor was an able and statesmanlike paper. It gave a glowing description of the undeveloped resources and commercial importance of the territory; referred to the unfortunate status of the public lands, arising out of the fact that Indian titles had not yet been extinguished, and advised the memorializing of congress concerning the construction of needed public highways, the surveying of lands, certain amendments to the land law, the early settlement of the San Juan dispute and the extinguishment of the Hudson's Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Companies' titles to certain lands claimed by them under the Treaty of Limits. The message also called the attention of the legislature to the necessity of providing a public school system and an efficient militia organization.

Soon after the adjournment of the legislature, which acted in harmony with the foregoing suggestions from the executive, Governor Stevens set out for Washington city that he might report in person on the survey of the northern route and press upon the attention of congress certain matters relating to Indian affairs, the northern boundary and the quieting of the government title to lands. He, with the help of Lancaster and Delegate Lane, of Oregon, secured "an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars for the construction of what was known as the Mullan road from the Great Falls of the Missouri via Coeur d'Alene lake to Walla Walla; of twenty-five thousand dollars for the construction of a military road from the dalles of the Columbia to Fort Vancouver; of thirty thousand dollars for a road from Fort Vancouver to Fort Steilacoom; and eighty-nine thousand dollars for lighthouses at various points on the coast. Liberal provision was made for the Indian service, in which was included the sum of one hundred thousand dollars to enable Governor Stevens to treat with the Blackfeet and other tribes in the north and east portions of the territory."

Governor Stevens lost no time after his return to Washington territory, in using the funds and authority bestowed on him for the purpose of accomplishing one of the main features of his Indian policy—the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands. Without pausing to narrate the story of his negotiations with the Sound tribes, let us follow him in his trips to the Walla Walla valley, undertaken for the purpose of inducing, if possible, the vigorous and independent tribes of the interior to treat. He had sent runners to these various bands, apprising them of the intended council and inviting all to be present. At the suggestion of Kamiakin, head chief of the Yakimas, a spot in the Walla Walla valley, which had been used by the Indians as a council ground from time immemorial, was chosen as the site of this conference also.

Early in May the governor set out for the appointed rendezvous. At The Dalles he found General Joel Palmer, who was to represent Oregon in the negotiations, awaiting him. The general was faithless of a successful issue of the undertaking. "So doubtful," wrote Governor Stevens, in his diary, "did General Palmer consider the whole matter of the council, that it was only the circumstance of a military force being despatched which determined him to send to the treaty ground presents to the Indians. He stated to me that he had concluded to send up no goods; but, the escort having been ordered, he would send up his goods. At this time the Oregon officers expected little from the council, and evidently believed that the whole thing was premature and ill-advised."

The escort referred to was sent by Major G. J. Rains, and consisted of a detachment of forty soldiers under Lieutenant Archibald Gracie. With the command was Lawrence Kip, whose diary presents an interesting account of the external and some of the internal happenings of this strange convention in the wilderness.

Stevens reached the council grounds May 21st. Two days later came Lieutenant Gracie with his soldiers. At that time no Indians were in sight, but the next day came the Nez Perces, rushing to the rendezvous with impetuous speed, decked out in gorgeous attire and riding ponies painted and caparisoned in accord with their savage notions of style. Upon their arrival and appearance, Kip thus comments in his diary:

Thursday, May 24th. This has been an exceedingly interesting day, as about twenty-five hundred of the Nez Perce tribe have arrived. It was our first specimen of this prairie chivalry, and it certainly realized all our conceptions of these wild warriors of the plains. Their coming was announced about ten o'clock, and going out on the plains to where a flagstaff had been erected, we saw them approaching on horseback in one long line. They were almost entirely naked, gaudily painted and decorated with their wild trappings. Their plumes fluttered about them, while below, skins and trinkets of all kinds of fantastic embellishments flaunted in the sunshine. Trained from early childhood, almost to live upon horseback, they sat upon their fine animals as if they were centaurs. Their horses, too, were arrayed in the most glaring finery. They were painted with such colors as formed the greatest contrast; the white being smeared with crimson in fantastic figures, and the dark colored streaked with white clay. Beads and fringes of gaudy colors were hanging from the bridles, while the plumes of eagle feathers interwoven with the mane and tail, fluttered as the breeze swept over them, and completed their wild and fantastic appearance.

When about a mile distant they halted, and half a dozen chiefs rode forward and were introduced to Governor Stevens and General Palmer, in order of their rank. Then on came the rest of the wild horsemen in single file, clashing their shields, singing and beating their drums as they marched past us. Then they formed a circle and dashed around us, while our little group stood there, the center of their wild evolutions. They would gallop up as if about to make a charge, then wheel round and round, sounding their loud whoops until they had apparently worked themselves up into an intense excitement. Then some score or two dismounted, and forming a ring, danced for about twenty minutes, while those surrounding them beat time on their drums. After these performances, more than twenty of the chiefs went over to the tent of Governor Stevens, where they sat for some time, smoking the pipe of peace, in token of good fellowship, and then returned to their camping ground.

Saturday, May 26th, came the Cayuses, about three hundred in number, according to Kip. "They came in whooping and singing in the Indian fashion, and after circling round the camp of the Nez Perces two or three times, they retired to form their own at some little distance." Next day being Sunday, a religious meeting was held by the Nez Perces, Timothy preaching. Stevens attended. "Timothy," observed he, "has a natural and graceful delivery, and his words were repeated by a prompter. The Nez Perces have evidently profited much from the labors of Mr. Spalding, who was with them ten years, and their whole deportment throughout the service was devout."

Monday, March 28th, the governor sent A. J. Bolon to meet the Yakimas, and from this emissary, who soon returned, he learned that Peo-peo-mox-mox was professedly friendly. That chief, together with Kamiakin and two sub-chiefs of the Yakimas, with a following of their men, soon came up and shook hands cordially with the commissioners, refusing, however, to receive tobacco from the whites.

At two o'clock on the following afternoon the council opened, but nothing was done further than to organize and swear in the interpreters. The council convened again on the 30th at one p. m. "It was a striking scene," wrote Kip. "Directly in front of Governor Stevens' tent, a small arbor had been erected, in which, at a table, sat several of his party taking notes of everything said. In front of the arbor on a bench sat Governor Stevens and General Palmer, and before them, in the open air, in concentric semi-circles were arranged the Indians, the chiefs in the front ranks in the order of their dignity, while the background was filled with women and children. The Indians sat on the ground (in their own words), 'reposing on the bosom of their great mother.' There were probably one thousand present at a time. After smoking for half an hour (a ceremony which with them precedes all business), the council was opened by a short address by General Palmer. Governor Stevens then rose and made a long speech, setting forth the object of the council and what was desired of them. As he finished each sentence, the interpreter repeated it to two of the Indians who announced it in a loud voice to the rest—one in the Nez Perce and the other in the Walla Walla language. This process necessarily caused business to move slowly."

In such tedious manner the patient and painstaking Stevens explained the treaties he wished the Indians to sign, clause by clause and item by item. At this stage of the negotiations the commissioners contemplated two reservations—one in the Nez Perce country for the Nez Percés, Walla Wallas, Cayuses, Umatillas and Spokanes; one on Yakima river for the Yakimas, Palouses, Klickitans and other bands. Two days were consumed by the long speeches of the commissioners upon the various provisions of the treaty and the price offered by the government. The third (Friday) was at the request of Young Chief, given up for a holiday, but the Indians who theretofore had indulged freely, every evening after adjournment of the council in sports of all kinds, remained quiet all that day, no doubt deliberating upon the proposals of the commissioners, and in the case of the Cayuses at least, planning mischief.

The next day they met as usual. After some further talk upon the treaties, the commissioners urged the Indians to speak their minds freely, and some short speeches were made in opposition to parting with the lands. The speech of Peop-mox-mox was especially noteworthy as a sarcastic arraignment of the whites, a delicate intimation of his distrust of the commissioners and an expression of reluctance to accept goods in payment for the earth.

That evening, Lawyer, head chief of the Nez Percés, came to Governor Stevens with information of a vile plot and a suggestion as to how it should be averted. Having become suspicious that mischief was brewing in the camp of the Cayuses, he sent a spy to discover their plot, and by this means found that for several nights the Cayuses had been considering the advisability of falling upon and massacring all the whites on the council ground. They had, on the day Young Chief had secured for a holiday, definitely determined to strike as soon as the consent of the Yakimas and Walla Wallas could be obtained. The massacre was to form the initial blow of a war of extermination against the white race, the second act of hostility planned being the surprise and capture of the post at The Dalles. "I will come with my family," said Lawyer, "and pitch my lodge in the midst of your camp, that those Cayuses may see that you and your party are under the protection of the head chief of the Nez Percés." By so doing, Lawyer averted the danger to Stevens, his party and guard, for the treacherous plotters were well aware that an attack on the whites could hardly be made without the killing of one or more of the Nez Perce defenders, and a consequent war with that numerous and powerful tribe. Having quietly caused the arms of the whites to be put in readiness against a possible attack, Governor Stevens proceeded with his council. Monday, June 30th, was consumed for the most part in Indian speech-making, but during the next two days the commissioners were again the principal orators. Steachus, the friendly Cayuse, in a short speech, declared his unwillingness to be removed wholly from his own country, and stated that his heart was in one of three places—the Grand Ronde, the Touchet and the Tucanon.

As affording a glimpse of the inner workings of the council, Kip's report of the proceedings of Thursday, June 7th, is here reproduced:

Thursday, June 7th. Mr. McKay took breakfast with us. He is the son of the old Indian hunter so often mentioned in Irving's "Astoria," and whose name is identified with pioneer life in this region. The council met to-day at twelve, and I went into the arbor, and taking my seat at the reporter's table, wrote some of the speeches delivered. There is, of course, in those of the Indians, too much repetition to give them fully, but a few extracts may show the manner in which those wearisome meetings were conducted day after day.

Governor Stevens.—"My brothers, we expect to have your hearts to-day. Let us have your hearts straight out."

Lawyer, the old Nez Perce chief.—"The first part of his speech was historical, relating to the discovery of this country by the Spaniards, which is a favorite topic with the Indian orators. In course of it he thus narrates the story of Columbus and the egg, which he had heard from some of the missionaries:

"One of the head of the court said, 'I knew there was such a country.' Columbus, who had discovered it, said, 'Can you make an egg stand on its end?' He tried to make the egg stand, but could not do it. He did not understand how. It fell over. Columbus then showed them all that he could make it stand. He sat it down and it stood. He knew how, and after they saw it done, they could do it."

He thus described the manner in which the tribes of the east receded at the approach of the whites:

"The red man traveled away farther, and from that time they kept traveling away further, as the white people came up with them. And this man's people (pointing to a Delaware Indian who was one of the interpreters) are from that people. They have come on from the Great Lake, where the sun rises, until they are near us now at the setting sun. And from that country, somewhere from the center, came Lewis and Clarke, and that is the way the white people traveled, and came on here to my forefathers. They passed through our country, they became acquainted with our country and all our streams, and our forefathers used them well, as well as they could, and from the time of Columbus, from the time of Lewis and Clarke, we have known you, my friends; we poor people have known you as brothers."

He concluded by expressing his approval of the treaty, only urging that the whites should act toward them in good faith.

Governor Stevens.—"We have now the hearts of the Nez Percés through their chief. Their hearts and our hearts are one. We want the hearts of the other tribes through their chiefs."

Young Chief, of the Cayuses.—(He was evidently opposed to the treaty, but grounded his objections on two arguments. The first was, they had no right to sell the ground which God had given for their support unless for some good reason.) "I wonder if the ground has anything to say. I wonder if the ground is listening to what is said. I wonder if the ground would come alive and what is on it. Though I hear what the ground says. The ground says, 'It is the Great Spirit that placed me here. The Great Spirit tells me to take care of the Indians, to feed them aright. The Great Spirit appointed the roots to feed the Indians on.' The water says the same thing. 'The Great Spirit directs me. Feed the Indians well.' The grass says the same thing. 'Feed the horses and cattle.' The ground, water and grass say. 'The Great Spirit has given us our names. We have these names and hold these names. Neither the Indians nor whites have a right to change these names.' The ground says, 'The Great Spirit has placed me here to produce all that grows on me, trees and fruit.' The same way the ground says, 'It was from me man was made.' The Great Spirit, in placing men on the earth, desired them to take good care of the ground and to do each other no harm. The Great Spirit said, 'You Indians who take care of certain portions of the country should not trade it off except you get a fair price.' "

The other argument was that he could not understand clearly what they were to receive.

"The Indians are blind. This is the reason we do not see the country well. Lawyer sees clear. This is the reason why I don't know anything about this country. I do not see the offer you have made to us yet. If I had the money in my hand I should see. I am, as it were, blind. I am blind and ignorant. I have a heart, but cannot say much. This is the reason why the chiefs do not understand each other right and stand apart. Although I see your offer before me, I do not understand it and I do not yet take it. I walk as it were in the dark, and cannot therefore take hold of what I do not see. Lawyer sees and he takes hold. When I come to understand your propositions I will take hold. I do not know when. This is all I have to say."

Five Crows, of the Walla Wallas.—"I will speak a few words. My heart is the same as Young Chief's."

General Palmer.—"We know no chief among the Walla Wallas but Peo-peo-mox-mox. If he has anything to say we will be pleased to hear it."

Peo-peo-mox-mox.—"I do not know what is straight. I do not see the offer you have made to the Indians. I never saw these things which are offered by my great father. My heart cried when you first spoke to me. I felt as if I was blown away like a feather. Let your heart be, to separate as we are and appoint some other time. We shall have no bad minds. Stop the whites from coming up here until we have this talk. Let them not bring their axes through our country, we will have nothing to say to them, provided they do not build houses on our lands. Now I wish to speak about Lawyer. I think he has given his lands. That is what I think from his words. I request another meeting. It is not in one meeting only that we can come to a decision. If you come again with a friendly message from our great father, I shall see you again at this place. To-morrow I shall see you again, and to-morrow evening I shall go home. This is all I have to say."

General Palmer.—"I want to say a few words to these people, but before I do, if Kamiakin wants to speak, I would be glad to hear him."

Kamiakin, Yakima chief.—"I have nothing to say."

General Palmer.—"I would inquire whether Peo-peo-mox-mox or Young Chief has spoken for the Umatillas. I wish to know further, whether the Umatillas are of the same heart."

Owhi, Umatilla chief.—"We are together and the Great Spirit hears all that we say to-day. The Great Spirit gave us the land and measured the land to us this is the reason I am afraid to say anything about the land. I am afraid of the laws of the Great Spirit. This is the reason of my heart being sad. This is the reason I cannot give you an answer. I am afraid of the Great Spirit. Shall I steal this land and sell it or what shall I do? This is the reason why my heart is sad. The Great Spirit made our friends, but the Great Spirit made our bodies from the earth, as if they were different from the whites. What shall I do? Shall I give the land which is a part of my body and leave myself poor and destitute? Shall I say I will give you my lands? I cannot say so. I am afraid of the Great Spirit. I love my life. The reason why I do not give my land away is, I am afraid I will be sent to hell. I love my friends. I love my life. This is the reason why I do not give my land away. I have one word more to say. My people are far away. They do not know your words. This is the reason I cannot give you an answer. I show you my heart. This is all I have to say."

Governor Stevens.—"How will Kamiakin of Schoom speak?"

Kamiakin.—"What have I to be talking about?"

General Palmer.—"We have listened and heard our chiefs speak. The hearts of the Nez Perces and ours are one. The Cayuses, the Walla Wallas and the other tribes say they do not understand us. We were in hopes we should have but one heart. Why should we have more than one heart? Young Chief says he does not know what we propose to him. Peo-peo-mox-mox says the same. Can we bring these saw-mills and these grist-mills on our backs to show these people? Can we bring these blacksmith shops, these wagons and tents on our backs to show them at this time? Can we cause fields of wheat and corn to spring up in a day that we may see them? Can we build these schoolhouses and these dwellings in a day? Can we bring all the money that these things will cost, that they may see it? It would be more than all the horses of any one of these tribes could carry. It takes time to do these things. We come first to see you and make a bargain. We brought but few goods with us. But whatever we promise to give you, you will get."

"How long will these people remain blind? We come to try to open their eyes. They refuse the light. I have a wife and children. My brother here has the same. I have a good house, fields of wheat, potatoes and peas. Why should I wish to leave them and come so far to see you? It was to try to do you good, but you throw it away. Why is it that you do so? We all sometimes do wrong. Sometimes because our hearts are bad, and sometimes because we have had counsel. Your people have sometimes done wrong. Our hearts have cried. Our hearts still cry. But if you will try to do right, we will try to forget it. How long will you listen to this bad counsel and refuse to receive the light? I, too, like the ground where I was born. I left it because it was for my good. I have come a long way. We ask you to go but a short distance. We do not come to steal your land. We pay you more than it is worth. There is the Umatilla valley, that affords a little good land between two streams and all around it is a parched up plain. What is it worth to you? What is it worth to us? Not half what we have offered you for it. Why do we offer so much? Because our great father told us to take care of this red people. We come to you with his message to try to do you good," etc., etc.

These extracts will give a specimen of the kind of "talk" which went on day after day. All but the Nez Perces were evidently disinclined to the treaty, and it was melancholy to see their reluctance to abandon the old hunting grounds of their fathers and their impotent struggle against the overpowering influences of the whites. The meeting closed to-day with an affecting speech by Governor Stevens, addressed to the chiefs who had argued against the treaty. I give it in part:

"I must say a few words. My brother and I have talked straight. Have all of you talked straight? Lawyer has and his people have, and their business will be finished to-morrow. Young Chief says he is blind and does not understand. What is it that he wants? Steachus says his heart is in one of these places—the Grand Ronde, the Touchet and the Tucanon. Where is the heart of Young Chief? Peo-peo-mox-mox cannot be wafed off like a feather. Does he prefer the Yakima to the Nez Perce reservation? We have asked him before. We ask him now. Where is his heart? Kamiakin, the great chief of the Yakimas, has not spoken at all; his people have no voice here to-day. He is not ashamed to speak? He is not afraid to speak? Then speak out. Owhi is afraid to, lest God be angry at his selling his land. Owhi, my brother, I do not think God will be angry with you if you do your best for yourself and your children. Ask yourself this question to-night: Will not God be angry with me if I neglect this opportunity to do them good? But Owhi says his people are not here. Why, then, did he tell us, come hear our talk? I do not want to be ashamed of him. Owhi has the heart of his people. We expect him to speak out. We expect to hear from Kamiakin and from Schoom. The treaty will have to be drawn up to-night. You can see it to-morrow. The Nez Perces must not be put off any longer. This business must be despatched. I hope that all the other hearts and our hearts will agree. They have asked us to speak straight. We have spoken straight. We have asked you to speak straight; but we have yet to hear from you."

The council then adjourned till six o'clock. In the evening I rode over as usual to the Nez Perces camp and found many of them playing cards in their lodges. They are the most inveterate gamblers, and a warrior will sometimes stake on successive games, his arms and horses and even his wives, so that in a single night he is reduced to a state of primitive poverty and obliged to trust to charity to be remounted for a hunt. In the other camps everything seemed to be in violent confusion. The Cayuse and other tribes were very much incensed against the Nez Perces for agreeing to the terms of the treaty, but fortunately for them, and probably for us, the Nez Perces are as numerous as the others united.

Perceiving that the only hope of overcoming the opposition of the recusant Indians lay in acting upon the suggestion of Steachus, the commissioners decided to offer a third reservation for the Cayuses, Umatillas and Walla Wallas in their own country. The offer was made in council Friday, June 8th, and explained in a lengthy speech by General Palmer. Some other concessions of less moment were also made to the Indians, and the result was quite satisfactory. All the chiefs gave their assent to the treaties as modified, except Kamiakin, who had maintained an attitude of sullen silence throughout the entire council and still obstinately refused to give the commissioners the slightest encouragement.

Just at the moment when the hopes of Stevens and Palmer were at their height and a successful termination of the business in hand seemed visible in the near prospect, a new element of difficulty was brought into the negotiations. A small party was seen approaching with much pomp and circumstance, painted, armed, singing a war song and flourishing at the end of a pole a horrible trophy of a recent combat. The leader was found to be none other than Looking Glass, war chief of the Nez Perces, who had long been absent in the buffalo country. He was not effusive in his greeting of the friends that gathered round him, and soon manifested his anger at their doings in a fierce little speech delivered from the saddle. "My people," said he, "what have you done? While I was gone you have sold my country. I have come home and there is not left for me a place on which to pitch my lodge. Go home to your lodges. I will talk with you."

Next day in council, the evil influence of this pettish old man was keenly felt. After Stevens had again explained the proposed treaties for his especial benefit, he made a violent speech against the sale of the lands. The Cayuses, ready to withdraw their assent, strongly supported him.

So emphatic were their and his assertions that he (Looking Glass) was head chief of the Nez Perces, that Lawyer, apparently angry, abruptly left the council and retired to his lodge.

After adjournment the Nez Perces convened in their camp and held a council among themselves. The Cayuses did likewise. An exciting debate was indulged in in the former camp, and their council waxed warm, but in its outcome Lawyer was confirmed as head chief and Looking Glass was declared to be second in authority. A paper was prepared and sent to General Stevens affirming that the faith of the Nez Perces had been pledged and the treaty must be signed.

Peo-peo-mox-mox and Kamiakin had signed their respective treaties at the close of the council session of June 9th. Stevens states that the latter was no doubt influenced by the former to do so, but subsequent events go to show that both signed the treaty as an act of treachery, their purpose being to create in the breasts of the whites a feeling of security, while they were perfecting their Indian confederacy for a fell swoop upon the hated race. Little remained to be done except to secure the signatures of the Cayuses and Nez Perces, and when council convened on Monday, June 11th, Governor Stevens said simply: "We meet for the last time. Your words are pledged to sign the treaty. The tribes have spoken through their head chiefs, Joseph, Red Wolf, the Eagle, Ipsemaleecon, all declaring Lawyer was the head chief. I call upon Lawyer to sign first." Lawyer did so, then Looking Glass, then Joseph and finally the signatures were obtained of all the subchiefs and principal men of both tribes, after which presents were made to the different bands.

"Thus ended in a most satisfactory manner," says Governor Stevens' journal, "this great council, prolonged through so many days—a council which, in the number of Indians assembled and the different tribes, old difficulties and troubles between them and the whites, a deep-seated dislike to and determination against giving up their lands and the great importance, nay, absolute necessity, of opening this land by treaty to occupation by the whites, that bloodshed and the enormous expense of Indian wars might be avoided, and in its general issuance and difficulty, has never been equalled by any council held with the Indian tribes of the United States.

"It was so considered by all present, and a final relief from the intense anxiety and vexation of the last month was especially grateful to all concerned."

The treaties negotiated as the result of the great Walla Walla council of 1855 provided for the surrender by the Yakimas of an area some twenty-nine thousand square miles in extent, being substantially that embraced in Chelan, Yakima, Kittitas, Franklin and Adams, with large portions of Douglas and Klickitat counties. From it, however, was to be excepted and reserved the princely domain known as the Yakima reservation. The Nez Perces relinquished the territory out of which were formed in large part the counties of Whitman, Garfield, Columbia and Asotin, in Washington; Union and Wallowa, in Oregon, and Washington, Nez Perces and Idaho, in Idaho, retaining therefrom a very large reservation. This included not only the Nez Perce reserve as it was prior to its opening a few years ago, but in addition large tracts between the Alpowa and Snake rivers and the Wallowa valley. That the Wallowa was originally included in the reservation was due to old Chief Joseph, and the surrender of it in 1863, against the wishes and advice of Chief Joseph, Jr., was one of the principal causes of the Nez Perce war in 1877. The Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Walla, by their treaty, gave up the territory embraced substantially in Walla Walla county, in Washington; Umatilla and Morrow counties, Oregon, also parts of Union and Gilliam counties in the latter state. Their original reservation was but little larger than that now known as the Umatilla reserve.

For the whole vast area ceded, the Indians were to receive about six hundred and fifty thousand dollars, of which two hundred thousand dollars were to be paid the Yakimas in the form of annuities, with salaries for the head chiefs of five hundred dollars per annum for twenty years, and some special concessions in the way of houses, implements, tools, etc. The compensation of the Nez Perces was the same. The Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Wallas were to receive one hundred thousand dollars; each of the head chiefs to have an annuity of five hundred dollars for twenty years, and special compensation in the form of houses, tools, etc. Peo-peo-mox-mox, who was wily enough to drive a hard bargain, was granted the privilege of drawing his salary at once without waiting for the treaties to be formally ratified, and was given special concessions in the form of a yearly salary of one hundred dollars with a house and five acres of land for his son; also three yoke of oxen, three yokes and chains, one wagon, two plows, twelve hoes, twelve axes, two shovels, a saddle and bridle, a set of wagon harness and a set of plow harness. Thus for a mere pittance, in comparison with its present value, was secured from the Indians their possessory right to a large portion of eastern Oregon and Washington and northern Idaho, a region rich in wealth already acquired and still richer in its possibilities.

CHAPTER IX.

THE YAKIMA WAR.

The Walla Walla council successfully terminated, Governor Stevens passed on to the north and east to continue the same kind of negotiations. He had not long departed before the great Yakima war burst suddenly over the Columbia plains; and to regions as far remote as Puget sound, Walla Walla and Rogue river, the horrors of war were simultaneously brought. The country was face to face with a widespread conspiracy to overthrow white occupancy and re-establish the uninterrupted reign of Indian barbarism over the entire Northwest.

This was the primary cause and purpose of that widespread and pervading outbreak. "While," says Evans, "many causes might be suggested as affecting the Indian mind and provoking hostility to American occupancy of the country; while it was precipitated by the perfidy of Indians who just before had joined in treaties to allure the white race into a belief in their security; while those very Indians went to that council to begin war there by the murder of the commissioners—yet that war, so far as the Indians were concerned, was made on their part, not because of any personal outrages committed by the whites, not because of any injustice sought to be inflicted by virtue of those treaties, not because the terms of the treaties were unsatisfactory, but solely because it was the Indian purpose to exterminate the white settlement, to force the white race to abandon the territory. That war on the part of the Indians is perhaps sanctioned by what may be called patriotism. If merit it had, then is that merit obliterated by the perfidious cruelty which marked its declaration and commencement by them. On the part of the people and authorities of the territory, the Oregon-Washington Indian war resulted from repeated and unprovoked outrages which were committed by savages upon unoffending and defenseless white men, women and children.

* * * * * In no respect were any citizens of those territories the aggressors. No act of their citizens nor of their officials provoked hostilities. There was no cause of complaint by the Indians, nor were they afforded a shadow of justification for that outbreak of perfidy and hate during the summer and fall of 1855. The only offense of the Oregon-Washington pioneers in the Indian estimation was that as American citizens they were in the country. That presence, lawful in itself, was to the Indians a standing menace that others of that race would follow them. The war was initiated by the native population to discourage immigration or American occupancy. Forced upon our people, it was prosecuted by them solely to hold the country for our race, to protect the settlements, and to effect a peace which would be lasting and enable the white population then in the country, and those who should come thereafter, to remain in safety. This conflict, so unexpected to the American settlers and for which they were so ill prepared, may have been hastened by the negotiating of the treaties and the events which so quickly followed—events which could not have been anticipated by any, either Indian or white, who participated in these negotiations. In no sense, however, were these treaties the cause of those hostile feelings which brought about the war."

The argumentative tone of the foregoing quotation was inspired by the persistent efforts of the United States army officials, with Major-General Wool, chief in command of the Department of the Pacific, at their head, to make Governor Stevens and the citizens of Oregon and Washington in some way responsible for the war. General Wool lost no opportunity to slander the people of the two territories and it has been stated that in the prosecution of the war, he proved himself a more bitter enemy of Oregon and Washington than any of the Indian savages in arms. The enmity between the general and Governor Stevens is unsurpassed for venom in the annals of the Northwest.

Just prior to the outbreak of the war an event occurred which brought joy to many hearts. A discovery of gold was reported to have been made in the vicinity of the Hudson's Bay Company's Fort Colville and not a little excitement had been aroused in consequence. It was hoped that this would cause the long-looked-for large immigration of people into the territory and its more complete settlement and subjugation. Instead, it furnished the immediate occasion for the melancholy war, which did so much to retard development and delay settlement. The young commonwealth was fated to pass through a period of trials, dissimilar in many respects to that experienced by Oregon in the dark days of the Cayuse war, yet similar in that it stirred the hearts of the people to their most profound depths and tried their metal as with fire.

So great was the feeling of security engendered by the successful negotiation of the treaties at Walla Walla—treaties which incorporated as one of their provisions pledges of good will on the part of the Indians toward the white race—that persons traveling from Puget sound to the Colville gold fields hesitated not to pass through the Indian country singly or in small squads, ill equipped to repel attack. Soon rumors reached the settlements that many such had been murdered by Indians, and that the Yakimas had taken an attitude of hostility toward white men. The rumors in the cases of Mattice, Jamison, Walker, Eaton, Cummings, Huffman, Fanjoy and others being partially confirmed, Sub-agent Andrew J. Bolon, then en route to the Spokane country to meet Governor Stevens, turned aside into the Yakima country to ascertain from Kamiakin himself the truth or falsity of the statements. He never returned to tell the story of his adventures, and as no white man accompanied him, only Indian evidence could be obtained as to what transpired. According to this the chief received Bolon in a haughty and insolent manner, whereupon the sub-agent made some threats. Kamiakin must have been deeply angered, for it is said he directed that Bolon should be killed. At any rate the sub-agent was murdered in a perfidious and brutal manner, by a son of Owhi, half brother of Kamiakin. Bolon's horse was also killed and the bodies of both were burned.

When the news of this melancholy event became known to the whites, Acting-Governor Mason, of Washington territory, made a requisition upon the military for a force to protect the route of the returning Colville miners. Major Rains, in charge at Vancouver, ordered Brevet-Major G. O. Haller, with one hundred men and a howitzer, to proceed from The Dalles into the Yakima country, there to co-operate with fifty men under Lieutenant W. A. Slaughter, for the purpose of inquiring into the difficulties. The Indians were abundantly prepared to meet him, not in council but on the battle-field. Ever since the signing of the Walla Walla treaty, the Yakimas had thought of nothing but war. The organizers of the hostile confederacy had steadily pointed out to those inclined to be peaceable that for fifteen years the whites had been pouring through their country into the Willamette; that their purpose not only to hold the country but to keep open the routes of travel for more to follow was plainly manifest; that a settlement in the Colville country and an open road thereto was an entering wedge by which the whites would gain possession of the interior, and that if anything was to be done to prevent white supremacy and the total subjugation of the Indian race, it must be done quickly. In confirmation of their statements that the whites were determined to keep open the route by which should come uncounted hordes of their race, they pointed to the fact that but recently United States troops had passed through their country going to the Snake river with intent to protect the immigrant road from Fort Hall westward. A horrible massacre had taken place there during August, 1854, in which all the members of an immigrant train, except one boy, were murdered and outraged in the most brutal manner, one woman being compelled to witness the torturing of her children over a slow fire. To prevent the recurrence of such acts, Major Haller had gone in May, 1855, to the scene of the carnival of slaughter. This natural and praiseworthy act had furnished the Indian demagogues with an effective argument in their philippics against the white race. And indeed, though he succeeded in his expedition, capturing and hanging many of the perpetrators of this horrible crime, the Indian orators did not hesitate to publish assiduously a rumor to the effect that he had been cut off by the Snakes and his men all killed. By such false reports and appeals to their jealousy and prejudices, the Yakimas were wrought up to the fighting point and made ready to bear their part in the general outbreak. Similar arguments were used to inspire other Indians from California's northern boundary to the British line with similar passions, and a like eagerness to engage in acts of hostility.

Thus it came to pass that Haller with his handful of men met a determined foe, well equipped for battle. Leaving The Dalles on October 3, 1855, he fell in with the enemy three days later. The Indians were defeated in the first engagement, but on Sunday, the 7th, completely turned the tables upon the whites, who were surrounded by a large and constantly increasing force of Indians. These were kept off by bayonet charges until nightfall, when a retreat back to The Dalles was decided upon. A running fight was maintained during the next day, but that night the Indians suffered a repulse, after which the whites were permitted to complete their journey without further molestation. The fighting on the retreat was all done by the advance guard, the rear guard having taken another trail, by which it reached The Dalles in safety. The loss on the expedition was five killed and seventeen wounded, though much property had to be abandoned or destroyed. Lieutenant Slaughter, as soon as he became aware of the defeat of Haller, prudently recrossed the Cascades to the White river country.

Under date of October 12th, 1855, United States Indian Agent Olney wrote from Walla Walla to Governor Curry, of Oregon, as follows:

"I beg to draw your attention to the fact that all the Indians north and south of the Columbia, this side of the Nez Perces and Spokanes, have either commenced open hostilities upon the whites, or are concentrating their forces for that purpose. I just arrived at this place this morning from The Dalles, and find the most alarming state of affairs as to the friendly relations heretofore existing between the Americans and the Walla Wallas, Palouses, Umatillas and Cayuses. I am doing all in my power to check the gathering storm; but I fear nothing but a large military force will do any good towards keeping them in check. The regular force now in the country I do not consider sufficient for the protection of the settlers and the chastisement of the Indians. One thousand volunteers should be raised immediately and sent into this part of Oregon and Washington territories. Delay is ruinous. Decisive steps must be immediately taken. They must be humbled; and in all conscience send a force that can do it effectually and without delay. These Indians must be taught our power. The winter is the very time to do it."

It would seem that Major Rains took the same view of the emergency and of the inadequacy of the regular force to meet it as did Mr. Olney, for he called upon Acting-Governor Mason, of Washington territory, for two companies of volunteers, and upon Governor Curry, of Oregon, for four. Both the Washington companies, when organized, were mustered into the service of the United States, though it was understood that one of them should be sent upon the mission for which it was raised, namely, the relief of Governor Stevens. The Oregon governor refused to have the men who volunteered in response to his call mustered into the regular service, so the identity of the Oregon volunteers was maintained throughout the war, though their leaders at all times expressed a willingness to act in harmony with the United States troops for the vigorous prosecution of aggressive warfare.

October 30th Major Rains set out from The Dalles with a force of three hundred and fifty regulars. November 1st Colonel Nesmith followed with a force which a few days later was increased to five hundred and fifty-three men. The experiences of both regulars and volunteers up to November 12th, when both were in camp at the Ahtanum mission, were summarized thus in a despatch of that date from Major Rains to Governor Mason:

"Here we are without a battle, except a skirmish four days since with some forty Indians who defied us as we approached the Yakima river. We thought it was the prelude to the big battle with the whole of their force, and forded the stream to an island with our mounted troops, eighteen dragoons and eight prisoners. Here we commenced the action, firing on the enemy, and ordering up our artillery and infantry to ford the stream. Our troops made a rush into the water, but, being on foot, tried again and again to cross the river, but failed, the rapid current sweeping away two of our best men, who were thus drowned; whereupon I sent back to Colonel Nesmith for two companies of volunteers, who, with our dragoons, drove headlong into the foaming current, and reaching the opposite shore, charged the enemy, who fled away over the hills, one of their balls striking, but fortunately not wounding, Colonel Nesmith's horse.

"Late in the afternoon, after recalling all our forces to the south bank of the Yakima river, we heard, some distance on the plain, the reports of small arms (indication of a fight), and, taking two companies, we proceeded in that direction until some time after night, when, the firing having ceased, we returned to the edge of the timber and bivouacked for the night. Next day we found a number of Indians around us on swift horses, who were driven off by our mounted volunteer companies. As we approached the mountain gorge, we found the Indians, about three hundred in number, on the hilltops beating their drums and shouting defiance. These were soon driven from their position and scattered by discharges from our howitzers. We cut off some of them by a proper disposition of our troops; and two or more were killed. We continued our march to this place, sweeping the plains with our cavalry, dispersing, killing and wounding all the enemy we saw, and found the mission abandoned. Captain Maloney not having arrived in conjunction with Colonel Nesmith (who himself went in command), we despatched one hundred and sixty-eight volunteers and regulars, on our best horses, to proceed in the direction of the Naches pass, and ascertain his whereabouts. We are awaiting their report; for we cannot tell where the large body of the enemy is, unless they have gone that way to attack Captain Maloney's command."

The same incidents and those immediately following them are narrated in greater detail in an article in the Portland Daily Standard of the time:

In the engagement at the Yakima river (mentioned in Major Rains' despatch), Captain Bennett's company (Company F) and part of the Clackamas company (Company C) took part and were the first to cross the river and charge the enemy, who fled with great rapidity, so much so that the disabled state of the horses of the volunteers rendered pursuit unsuccessful. Captain Cornelius' company (Company D) having become separated from the main body of the volunteers in the engagement at the river, encountered a superior force of Indians and fought them nearly a half day. He kept them at bay and succeeded in taking some cattle and driving them into camp that night. Two of his men were severely wounded. The damage inflicted upon the Indians was not known. In the attack the next day at the mountain gorge spoken of by Major Rains, otherwise called the Two Buttes, the number of Indians was not less than five hundred. About one hundred, and fifty were counted upon the top of the hill, and the remainder were in the brush. By some misunderstanding of the orders given to surround them, a gap was left open; and those made their escape. Two only were killed. Pursuit was of no avail.

The regulars and volunteers encamped near the mission, which, having been abandoned, it was conjectured that the main force of the Indians had either gone to the Naches pass to attack Captain Maloney, or up the Columbia to Priests' rapids. Colonel Nesmith, with a command of two hundred and fifty men, proceeded toward the pass, and after an absence of three days returned without having seen the enemy. He found the snow so deep as to prevent the forage of his animals, and was compelled to return. He found caches of Indian provisions, which he destroyed, and several Indian mares and colts, which were killed, as they would be of no service to the volunteers. Some wild Indian cattle were also found and killed, which furnished subsistence for the troops. In and about the mission were found vegetables and a variety of useful articles.

On Colonel Nesmith's return, a council of officers was held, by which it was deemed inexpedient to proceed to Walla Walla, owing to the scarcity of forage, the weak condition of the animals, and the difficulty of crossing the Columbia with the sick and wounded. It was decided to return to The Dalles and recruit. After burning the mission and a house owned by Kamiakin, the whole force, regulars and volunteers, took up their line of march for The Dalles. On their way they met Captain Wilson's command (Company A) with the pack train of supplies, which train had suffered great loss of animals and supplies by reason of the snows in the mountains, which in some places were four or five feet in depth. The expedition reached the Klickitat river, about twenty-five miles distant from The Dalles, on the 17th, and there encamped. The most cordial co-operation had existed between the regular and volunteer officers. All seemed animated with a common interest in accomplishing the ends and objects of the campaign.

Mention should be made of the fact that while Major Rains was at the Ahtanum mission he received a letter from Kamiakin, head chief of the Yakimas, making overtures of peace and friendship on certain terms. The reply of Rains was certainly vigorous enough and gave the chief an unequivocal statement of his position and intentions. It read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS YAKIMA EXPEDITION,
ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSION, NOVEMBER 13, 1855.
KAMIAKIN, HYAS TYEE OF THE YAKIMA INDIANS:

Your talk by Padre Pandoy is just received. You know me and I know you. You came across the white people and to my house at The Dalles with Padre Pandoy and gave me a horse, which I did not take, as Panawok had given Lieutenant Wood another horse for him. You came in peace—we come in war. And why? Because your land has drunk the blood of the white man, and the Great Spirit requires it at your hand.

You make the sign of the cross, and pray to the God of truth for mercy, and yet you lie when you say you "were very quiet, the Americans were our friends; our hearts were not for war," until Governor Stevens changed your feelings; for long before the treaty, which you agreed to, you proposed to the Walla Walla chief, Peo-peo-mox-mox, to go to war, and kill off all the whites. He told us so. You have been preparing for this purpose a very long time; and your people agreed with the Cayuses, at the Walla Walla council, before the treaty was made, to murder all the whites there, which was only prevented by the Nez Percés disagreeing.

You know that you murdered white men going to the mines who had done you no injury, and you murdered all persons, though no white man had trespassed upon your lands. You sent me a delegation to stop Hamilton and Pierce from settling in your country. I wrote them a letter and they left. You murdered your agent Bolon for telling you the truth—that the troops would come upon you for these murders. Has his death prevented their coming? I sent a handful of soldiers into your country to inquire into the facts. It was not expected that they should fight you, and they did right to return back. Your foul deeds were seen by the eye of the Great Spirit, who saw Cain when he killed his brother, Abel, and cursed him for it. Fugitives and vagabonds shall you also be, all that remain of you, upon the face of the earth, as well as all who aid or assist you, until you are gone.

You say now, "If we will be quiet and make friendship, you will not war with us, but give a piece of land to all the tribes." We will not be quiet, but war forever, until not a Yakima breathes in the land he calls his own. The river only will we let retain this name to show to all people that here the Yakimas once lived.

You say that you will fight us with thousands, and if vanquished, those of you that remain will kill all your women and children, and then the country will be ours. The country is ours already, as you must see from our assembled army; for we intend to occupy it, and make it too hot to hold you. We are braves, and no brave makes war with women and children. You may kill them as you say, but we will not; yet we are thirsting for your blood, and want your warriors to meet us, and the warriors of all tribes wishing to help you, at once to come. The snow is on the ground, and the crows are hungry for food. Your men we have killed; your horses and your cattle do not afford them enough to eat. Your people shall not catch salmon hereafter for you, for I will send soldiers to occupy your fisheries, and fire upon you. Your cattle and your horses, which you got from the white man, we will hunt up, and kill and take them from you. The earth, which drank the blood of the white man, shed by your hands, shall grow no more wheat nor roots for you, for we will destroy it. When the cloth that makes your clothing, your guns and your powder are gone, the white man will make you no more. We will not you as our children and tried to do you good. We would not have cheated you. The treaty which you complain of, though signed by you, gave you too much for your lands, which are most all worthless to the white man; but we are not sorry, for we are able to give, and it would have benefited you. After you signed the treaty with Governor Stevens and General Palmer, had you told us that you did not wish to abide by it, it would have been listened to. We wanted to instruct you in all our learning; to make axes, plows and hoes to cultivate the ground; blankets to keep you from the cold; steamboats and steam wagons which fly along swifter than the birds fly, and to use the lightning which makes the thunder in heavens to carry talk and serve as a servant. William Chinook, at The Dalles; Lawyer, chief of the Nez Percés; Steachus, and Weattinatimime, hysa tye of the Cayuses, and many others of their people, can tell you what I say is true. You, a few people, we can see with our glasses a long way off, while the whites are as the stars in the heavens, or leaves of the trees in summer time. Our warriors in the field are many, as you must see; but if not enough, a thousand for every one more will be sent to hunt you, and to kill you; and my advice to you, as you will see, is to scatter yourselves among the Indian tribes more peaceable, and there forget you ever were Yakimas.

(Signed) G. J. RAINS.

Major U. S. A., Brigadier-General W. T., Commanding Troops in the Field.

While these events were transpiring in the Yakima country, a movement had been made by Major Mark A. Chinn, who, with Company B, Oregon volunteers, proceeded to the mouth of the Des Chutes, where Company H, under command of Captain Taylor, was encamped. Proceeding toward the Walla Walla country with both companies, he arrived at Wells Springs on the 17th of November. Here he was met by a messenger from Narcisse Raymond, a French settler in Walla Walla valley, with the following communication addressed to the commander in charge of the forces en route to Walla Walla:

November 14, 1855.

Sir: However urgent and important the news I have to communicate, I almost despaired to despatch any from want of hands who were willing to risk life at this critical time; but Mr. McBean came to my assistance and offered the services of his son, John, who, in company with another man, will be the bearer of this. The news is gloomy and very different from what I had reason to expect when I left The Dalles on my way hither. Serpent Jaune (Pee-peo-mox-mox) has shown his colors, and is a declared foe to the Americans. He has taken possession of the fort and pillaged it, government as well as Hudson's Bay Company's property; has placed himself on the south side of the Walla Walla river, on the hills, guarding the road with a force, it is said, of a thousand.

The young men on the Umatilla river are disposed for war, and John Whitford and Tolman instigate them to it. The chiefs of that place, at least the majority of them, are on the balance, and have not yet decided; but Stockalah and Walatlekt, with their people, have joined the Cayuses, and are doing all in their power to have them join against the Americans. The chiefs of this valley have remained firm and will not join the unfriendly Indians. Their conduct since Mr. Olney's departure has been praiseworthy, and they did all they could to prevent Mr. Brooks' house from being burned and pillaged, but in vain. The chief, Howlish Wampool, did it at the risk of his life.

Two Nez Percé chiefs now here, Joseph and Red Wolf, desire me to tell you that all their tribe is for peace; that they will suffer no hostile Indians to remain among them. In justice to Pierre (Walla Walla chief), I beg to say that he stuck to his charge until forced away by Serpent Jaune and his people, but not until they had robbed three different times out of the fort. He was alone, and, of course, could not prevent them. As affairs stand, it is my humble opinion that it might not be prudent to make your way hither with the force at your command of one hundred and fifty men. I have requested the bearers of this despatch to proceed to The Dalles with the letters to the respective addresses of Messrs. Olney and Noble; and placed as we are, a mere handful of men, destitute of ammunition, the sooner assistance is tendered to us the better, for Serpent Jaune daily threatens to burn our houses and to kill us, and he is not the only enemy we have to dread.

In haste, I remain, sir,

Respectfully, your obedient humble servant,

NARCISSE RAYMOND.

The Commander-in-charge coming to Fort Walla Walla.

Mr. Raymond and all the other settlers of the Walla Walla and Umatilla valleys had been directed by Indian Agent Nathan Olney to withdraw from the country as soon as a sufficient escort should arrive for them, and it was with intent to furnish this escort that Major Chinn was marching when he received the startling intelligence contained in the letter just quoted. This information determined him to delay his march until he had received reinforcements and artillery, so he moved next day to the Umatilla and established there a station which became known as Fort Henrietta. It was situated where plenty of water and timber could be obtained, as well as sufficient grass for horses, and it consisted of a tract one hundred feet square, picketed in with large, split timber, with bastions of round logs in two of the angles, also two corrals for horses and cattle. Major Chinn sent at once to Colonel Nesmith for the requisite reinforcements and artillery. On the 19th and 20th of November, the colonel sent forward three companies consisting of one hundred and seventy men. He endeavored to procure the howitzers from the regular army, but General Wool had just arrived on the scene and his advent brought to an abrupt termination all hope of further cooperation between regulars and volunteers. The howitzers were, of course, refused.

"The arrival of General Wool," says Evans, "defeated every project which looked to a winter campaign against the Indians. He even suggested that the combination of the commands of Rains and Nesmith, in the Yakima country, had been injurious to the service because the Indians were so overawed by such a force, seven hundred men, that they fled upon the approach of the troops. General Wool ordered the regulars from Fort Dalles to Fort Vancouver, except a small garrison. He censured Major Rains for calling for volunteers, and also for going into the Yakima country to make war against the hostiles. He accused the territorial authorities of sinister and dishonest motives. While not accusing the whites in Washington territory of murdering Indians, as he did charge the whites with in the Rogue river country, yet he maintained that the war should only be carried on upon the defensive. To any proposition of the territorial authorities to chastise the Indians for past misdeeds, he was opposed, and should use his efforts to defeat them. In fact, he was so bitterly prejudiced against the two territories, their official authorities, their volunteers and their people, that his sympathies were entirely with that savage race which it was his highest duty to keep in subjection. For the people who had the right to rely upon him for protection, he had no word of encouragement, no disposition to assist. At that time he was a greater marplot to the regaining of peace, and a more bitter foe to the Oregon and Washington people, than any hostile chief bearing arms against them."

However, such succor as was in the power of Nesmith was, as before stated, promptly despatched to Fort Henrietta. The three companies joined Major Chinn on the 29th of November, but the command was at once assumed by Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, who accompanied the reinforcements. December 2d, Kelly took the field with about three hundred and fifty men, designing to make a swift march to Fort Walla Walla and surprise the Indians who were supposed to be in possession of it. Kelly found "it had been pillaged by Indians, the buildings much defaced and the furniture destroyed." Of his subsequent movements Colonel Kelly thus writes in his official report:

On the morning of the 5th, I despatched Second Major Chinn, with one hundred and fifty men, to escort the baggage and pack trains to the mouth of the Touchet, there to await my return with the remainder of the forces under my command. On the same morning I marched with about two hundred men to a point on the Touchet river about twelve miles from its mouth, with the view of attacking the Walla Walla Indians, who were supposed to be encamped there. When I was near to and making towards the village, Peo-peo-mox-mox, the chief of the tribe, with five other Indians, made their appearance under a flag of truce. He stated that he did not wish to fight; that his people did not wish to fight; that on the following day he would come and have a talk and make a treaty of peace. On consultation with Hon. Nathan Olney, Indian Agent, we concluded that this was simply a ruse to gain time for removing his village and preparing for battle. I stated to him that we had come to chastise him for the wrongs he had done to our people, and that we would not defer making an attack on his people unless he and his five followers would consent to accompany and remain with us until all difficulties were settled. I told him that he might go away under his flag of truce if he chose; but, if he did so, we would forthwith attack his village. The alternative was distinctly made known to him; and, to save his people, he chose to remain with us as a hostage for the fulfillment of his promise, as did also those who accompanied him. He at the same time said that on the following day he would accompany us to his village; that he would then assemble his people and make them deliver up all their arms and ammunition, restore the property which had been taken from the white settlers, or pay the full value of that which could not be restored; and that he would furnish fresh horses to remount my command, and cattle to supply them with provisions, to enable us to wage war against other hostile tribes who were leagued with them. Having made these promises, we refrained from making the attack, thinking we had him in our power, and that on the next day his promises would be fulfilled. I also permitted him to send one of the men who accompanied him to his village to apprise the tribes of the terms of the expected treaty, so that they might be prepared to fulfill it.

On the 6th, we marched to the village and found it entirely deserted, but saw the Indians in considerable force on the distant hills, and watching our movements. I sent out a messenger to induce them to come in, but could not do so. And I will here observe that I have since learned, from a Nez Perce boy, who was taken at the same time with Peo-peo-mox-mox, that, instead of sending word to his people to make a treaty of peace, he sent an order for them to remove their women and children and prepare for battle. From all I have since learned, I am well persuaded that he was acting with duplicity, and that he expected to entrap situated, and make his escape from us. We remained at the deserted village until about one o'clock in the afternoon; and, seeing no hope of coming to any terms, we proceeded to the mouth of the Touchet with a view of going from thence to some spot near Whitman's station, where I had intended to form a permanent camp for the winter.

On the morning of the 7th, the command set out early for Whitman's station, Peo-peo-mox-mox and the other Indian hostages being still with the white men. Soon after a crossing of the Touchet had been effected, the battle began. There is difference of opinion as to who fired the first shot. Kelly's report states that the Indians did, but Gilbert quotes A. P. Woodward as asserting that to his knowledge one Joint, of Company B, committed the first hostile act. The question is of importance only as it bears upon the larger one of whether or not Peo-peo-mox-mox and his people were acting in good faith in negotiating for peace. At any rate the firing soon became general, and all the companies except A and F, which were ordered to remain with the baggage, began chasing the Indians eagerly. "A running fight was the consequence, the force of the Indians increasing every mile. Several of the enemy were killed in the chase before reaching the farm of LaRocque, which is about twelve miles from the mouth of the Touchet. At this point they made a stand, their left resting on the river covered with trees and underbrush, their center occupying the flat at this place, covered with clumps of sage brush and small sand knolls, their right on the high ridge of hills which skirt the river bottom."

The few white men who outran their companions and reached this vicinity first were compelled by the murderous fire from savage guns to fall back, but soon rallied and made a charge upon the Indians in the brush, in which charge Lieutenant Burrows, of Company H, was killed, and Captain Munson, Sergeant-Major Isaac Miller and Private G. W. Smith were wounded. Reinforcements of whites arriving, the Indians were compelled to fall back two miles to a farmhouse, in attempting to carry which Captain Bennett, of Company F, and Private Kelso, of Company A, were killed.

Continuing the narrative of the engagement, Colonel Kelly says in his report: "Howitzer found at Fort Walla Walla, under charge of Captain Wilson, by this time was brought to bear upon the enemy. Four rounds were fired when the piece burst, wounding Captain Wilson. The Indians then gave way at all points; and the house and fence were seized and held by the volunteers, and bodies of our men were recovered. These positions were held by us until nightfall, when the volunteers fell slowly back and returned unmolested to camp."

During the first day's engagement, at about the hottest part of the action, an event occurred which, though not mentioned in Kelly's official report, has been the theme of much discussion. Peo-peo-mox-mox and his companions in captivity were, with one exception, killed by the guards and volunteers surrounding them, and whether this action was justifiable from the fact that the prisoners attempted to escape, or was wholly unwarranted, will never be ascertained with certainty. The eye witnesses of the affair are not in accord as to the facts. Indeed, it is quite probable that no one of them is able to give an absolutely correct and detailed statement of all that transpired, such was the confusion and excitement prevailing at the time. Of this affair, Gilbert says:

"The following is an account of it as given to the writer by Lewis McMorris, who was present at the time and saw what he narrated. The hospital supplies were packed on mules in charge of McMorris, and had just reached the LaRocque cabin, where the first engagement had taken place. The surgeon in charge had decided to use it as a hospital in which to place those wounded in the battle and McMorris was unpacking the mules. Near it the unfortunate J. M. Burrows lay dead, and several wounded were being attended to. The combatants had passed on up the valley, and the distant detonations of their guns could be heard. The flag of truce prisoners were there under guard and every one seemed electrified with suppressed excitement. A wounded man came in with a shattered arm dangling at his side and reported Captain Bennett killed at the front. This added to the excitement, and the attention of all was more or less attracted to the wounded man, when some one said: 'Look out, or the Indians will get away!' At this seemingly everyone yelled, 'Shoot 'em! Shoot 'em!' and on the instant there was a rattle of musketry on all sides.

"What followed was so quick, and there were so many acting, that McMorris could not see it in detail, though all was transpiring within a few yards of and around him. It was over in a minute, and three of the five prisoners were dead, another was wounded, knocked senseless and supposed to be dead, who afterwards recovered consciousness, and was shot to put him out of misery, while the fifth was spared because he was a Nez Perce. McMorris remembers some of the events that marked the tragedy, however, such as an impression on his mind of an attempt by the prisoners to escape, that started the shooting; that everybody was firing because they were excited, and the target was an Indian; that he saw no evidence of an attempt to escape, except from being murdered; that they were killed while surrounded by and mingled among the whites; and that but one Indian offered to defend his life. The prisoner offering resistance was a powerful Willamette Indian called 'Jim' or 'Wolf Skin,' who, having a knife secreted upon his person, drew it and fought desperately. 'I could hear that knife whistling in the air,' said McMorris, 'as he brandished it, or struck at the soldier with whom he was struggling.' It lasted but a moment, when another soldier, approaching from behind, dealt him a blow on the head with a gun that broke his skull and stretched him apparently lifeless upon the ground. All were scalped in a few minutes, and later the body of Yellow Bird, the great Walla Walla chief, was mutilated in a way that should entitle those who did it to a prominent niche in the ghoulish temple erected to commemorate the infamous acts of soulless men."

Gilbert also states that McMorris' account was confirmed by G. W. Miller and William Nixon, both of whom were present.

A. P. Woodward, now living at Athena, and who was near by when the chief was killed, tells us that the facts, briefly stated, were these: When asked what should be done with the prisoners, Colonel Kelly had told the guard he "didn't care a damn." The prisoners were neither tied nor in any way confined, but were mingled with the volunteers. When the firing became warm, and several wounded had been brought back to where the guard and prisoners were, some of the troops became badly excited and called out, "Shoot the damned Indians and kill them!" Several shots were fired and two or three of the Indians fell, though they were not attempting to escape. Then Peo-peo-mox sprang off his horse, and walking towards those who were firing, said: "You don't need to kill me—I am not Jesus Christ!" and with these words he fell. The biting sarcasm of the dying words of Peo-peo-mox, if these were his words, can only be appreciated when we remember that they were uttered by a savage who could not be made to understand why the white men had, according to their own account, killed their own God. It should be stated, however, that in answer to a direct question as to whether any such language was used, Samuel Warfield, the slayer of Peo-peo-mox, stated that the only foundation for the story was something that occurred on the evening previous. Wolf Skin, he says, attempted to escape. He was immediately recaptured and while being tied to prevent a repetition of this attempt, said: "That is as much as could be expected of you. Christ died for his people, and I can die for mine," whereupon one of the volunteers rejoined, "Christ did not run," raising a general laugh.

It is but fair to add the account of the killing given by Mr. Warfield, the man who actually took the life of the Walla Walla chieftain. At the request of the writer, he furnished the following statement:

"Amos Underwood and I were guards over the six Indian prisoners, Peo-peo-mox-mox, Klickitat Jimmy, or Wolf Skin, Nez Perce Billy and three others. About four o'clock in the evening there were a number of soldiers around the guard and prisoners. Word was sent two or three times for those soldiers to come to the front; but they did not go. Finally, Colonel Kelly came and ordered them to the front. I said to the Colonel, 'I want to go to the front. What will we do with these prisoners?' He replied, 'Tie them and put them in the house, if they will submit to you; if not, put them in anyhow.' Major Miller was there present among the wounded, having been shot in the arm. Just at that time Wolf Skin pulled his knife from his legging and struck at Major Miller, cutting his arm as it was thrown up to ward off the blow. In an instant some one broke a musket over the Indian's head, killing him. Then the fight began. Five of the Indian prisoners were killed, either being shot or struck over the head with the guns, Peo-peo-mox-mox being the last one. I showed him how to cross his hands so that I could tie him and put him in the house as the colonel had told us, when he grabbed my gun and tried to wrench it around so as to shoot me. I jumped back and grabbed him by the collar and threw him down, still keeping hold of my gun. I also shot at him, but missed, he being too close. He caught me by the breeches leg and tried to regain his feet. I again jumped back from him as he tried to get up, struck him over the head with my gun, settling him for all time."

This account of Mr. Warfield is probably substantially correct as far as it goes, but it leaves open the question as to what incited Wolf Skin to draw his knife. One of the volunteers confessed that he became so excited by the fact that the whites at the front were being hard pressed and that some of them were killed and wounded that he completely lost his head and rushed back, shouting, "Shoot the Indians and kill them!" This and the attempted tying of their hands inspired the Indians with a belief that they would certainly be murdered, causing them to offer resistance, with the melancholy results heretofore given. If this surmise is correct, neither the Indians nor their guards could be very much blamed, the real cause of the tragedy being the hare-brained man whose wild shoutings alarmed the Indian prisoners. It is hard to understand how the officers could justify their conduct in retaining the Indians at all any longer than they wished to stay. They came under flag of truce, and if Colonel Kelly's report is true, remained voluntarily as hostages, and when they were no longer willing to stay they should have been set at liberty. Nathan Olney, the Indian agent, is quoted as having said: "If you let Peo-peo-mox-mox escape, our hides will not hold shucks." Whether this was true or not, the whites were not justified in retaining any advantage gained by disrespect of a flag of truce and the honors of war, and the officers cannot therefore escape censure as being ultimately responsible for the massacre of the Indians.

Next day the battle was renewed. No better narration of its subsequent events can be given than that furnished by Kelly's report, which is therefore reproduced in extenso.

Early on the morning of the 8th the Indians appeared with increased forces, amounting to fully six hundred warriors. They were posted as usual in the thick brush by the river—among the sage bushes and sand knolls and on the surrounding hills. This day Lieutenant Pillow, with Company A, and Lieutenant Hannon, with Company H, were ordered to take and hold the brush skirting the river and the sage bushes on the plain. Lieutenant Fellows, with Company F, was directed to take and keep possession of the point at the foot of the hill. Lieutenant Jeffries, with Company B, Lieutenant Hand, with Company I, and Captain Cornoyer, with Company K, were posted on three several points on the hills, with orders to maintain them and to assail the enemy on other points of the same hills. As usual, the Indians were driven from their position, although they fought with skill and bravery.

On the 6th they did not make their appearance until about ten o'clock in the morning, and then in somewhat diminished numbers. As I had sent to Fort Henrietta for Companies D and E and expected them on the 10th, I thought it best to act on the defensive and hold our positions, which were the same as on the 8th, until we could get an accession to our forces sufficient to enable us to assail their rear and cut off their retreat. An attack was made during the day on Companies A and H, in the brush-wood, and upon B on the hill, both of which were repulsed with great gallantry by those companies with considerable loss to the enemy. Companies F, I and K also did great honor to themselves in repelling all approaches to their positions, although in doing so one man in Company F and one in Company I were severely wounded. Darkness as usual closed the combat by the enemy withdrawing from the field. Owing to the inclemency of the night, the companies on the hill were withdrawn from their several positions, Company B abandoning its rifle pits which were made by the men of that company for its protection. At early dawn of the next day the Indians were observed from our camp to be in possession of all points held by us on the preceding day. Upon seeing them, Lieutenant McAniff, of Company B, gallantly observed that his company had dug those holes, and after breakfast they would have them again; and well was his declaration fulfilled, for in less than an hour the enemy was driven from the pits and fled to an adjoining hill which they had occupied the day before. This position was at once assailed, Captain Cornoyer, with Company K and a portion of Company I, being mounted, gallantly charged the enemy on his right flank, while Lieutenant McAniff, with Company B, dismounted, rushed up the hill in the face of a heavy fire and scattered them in all directions. They at once fled, to return to this battle-field no more, and thus ended our long contested fight.

The winter following the battle of the Walla Walla was an exceedingly severe one, and the suffering of the soldiers was sometimes extreme. The late W. C. Painter, of Walla Walla, was wont to describe his experience of trying to sleep with scant shelter and scantier covering and the thermometer at twenty below zero. Mrs. Victor quotes one of the volunteers, whose name she does not reveal, as having said:

"On the night of December 21st the snow fell from six to eight inches deep, and the mercury stood about twenty degrees below zero. Next morning it fell to my lot to go on guard. My raiment consisted of an old slouch hat, an old coat, a flannel shirt, a threadbare pair of pants, and an old pair of shoes without socks. I had run through my shoes during the battle, but found an old pair in a cache which answered the purpose. I donned my raiment, tied a string around my pants to keep them from slipping above my knees, and at six o'clock was ready for duty. My beat being one mile from camp, I trudged along through the snow until I reached my station, and then passed off the time as best I could. * * * When I examined my feet, strange to say, they were not very badly frozen, only the tops and sides were raised up in blisters. Several of the boys who had no shoes took rawhide and sewed it up in shape something like a moccasin. This beat bare feet to wade through the snow with. But the boys seemed to be content. Our tents were small and thin; our blankets were smaller and thinner. I had two of those long, narrow, thin blankets, one blue and one green, that were not long enough to reach from my nose down to my feet, and a saddle blanket; this constituted my bed."

But it is now time to return to Governor Stevens, who, as hitherto stated, had set out for the Blackfoot country upon completing his negotiations at the Walla Walla council. Having succeeded in inducing the dreaded Blackfeet to treat for the sale of their lands and started upon his return to Olympia, he had reached Hellgate in the present Montana, when a detachment of Nez Perces met him and gave him information of the war and his own isolated and imperiled position. It would require all the tact, ingenuity and daring of this eminent man to run the gauntlet of these multiplied dangers in safety, but the doughty governor was equal to the task. How he acted under these trying circumstances may best be told in his own language:

The result of our conference (with the Nez Perces) was most satisfactory. The whole party, numbering fourteen men, among whom were Spotted Eagle, Looking Glass and Three Feathers, principal chiefs among the Nez Perces, expressed their determination to accompany me and share any danger to be encountered. They expressed a desire that after crossing the mountains, I should go to their country, where a large force of their young men would accompany me to The Dalles and protect us with their lives against any enemy.

Having replenished my train with all the animals to be had, on November 14th we pushed forward, crossed the Bitter Root mountains the 20th, in snow two and a half to three feet deep, and reached the Coeur d'Alene mission the 25th, taking the Coeur d'Alenes entirely by surprise. They had not thought it possible that we could cross the mountains so late in the season.

With the Coeur d'Alenes I held a council, and found them much excited, on a balance for peace or war, and a chance word might turn them either way. Rumors of all kinds met us here: that the troops had fought a battle with the Yakimas and drove them across the Columbia towards the Spokanes, and that the Walla Wallas, Cayuses and Umatillas were in arms, and that they had been joined by a party of Nez Perces. The accounts were of so contradictory a nature that nothing certain could be ascertained from them, excepting that the several tribes below were in arms, blocking up our road, and had threatened to cut off my party in any event. However, I determined to push on to the Spokanes.

The Spokanes were even more surprised than the Coeur d'Alenes on seeing us. Three hours before my arrival they had heard that I was going to the settlements by way of New York. I immediately called a council; sent to Fort Colville for Mr. McDonald, in charge of that post of the Hudson's Bay Company; sent also for the Jesuit fathers at that point. They arrived. A council was held, at which the whole Spokane nation was represented. The Coeur d'Alenes and Colville Indians also were present.

The Spokanes and Colville Indians evinced extreme hostility of feeling; spoke of the war below; wanted it stopped; said the whites were wrong. The belief was current that Peo-pee-mox-mox would cut off my party as he had repeatedly threatened. They had not joined in the war, but yet would make no promise to remain neutral. If the Indians now at war were driven into their country, they would not answer for the consequences; probably many of the Spokanes would join them. After a stormy council of several days, the Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and Colvilles were entirely conciliated and promised they would reject all overtures of the hostile Indians and continue the firm friends of the whites.

Having added to my party and organized, etc., we thence made a forced march to the Nez Perce country. Mr. Craig had received letters which informed me that the whole Walla Walla valley was blocked up with hostile Indians, and the Nez Percés said it would be impossible to go through.

I called a council and proposed to them that one hundred and fifty of their young men should accompany me to The Dalles. Without hesitation, they agreed to go. Whilst in the council making arrangements for our movements, news came that a force of gallant Oregon volunteers, four hundred strong, had met the Indians in the Walla Walla valley, and after four days' hard fighting, having a number of officers and men killed and wounded, had completely routed the enemy, driving them across Snake river and toward the Nez Perce country. The next day I pushed forward, accompanied by sixty-nine Nez Percés, well armed, and reached Walla Walla without encountering any hostile Indians. They had all been driven across Snake river below us by the Oregon troops.

It is now proper to inquire what would have been the condition of my party had not the Oregon troops vigorously pushed into the field and gallantly defeated the enemy.

The country between the Blue mountains and the Columbia was overrun with Indians, numbering one thousand to twelve hundred warriors, including the force at Priests' rapids under Kamiakin, who had sworn to cut me off; it was completely blocked up. One effect of the campaign of the regulars and volunteers in the Yakima country under Brigadier-General Rains was to drive Kamiakin and his people on our side of the Columbia river, and thus endanger our movement from the Spokane to the Nez Perce country. Thus we had been hemmed in by a body of hostile Indians through whom we could have only forced our way with extreme difficulty and at great loss of life. We might all have been sacrificed in the attempt. For the opening of the way to my party I am solely indebted to the Oregon volunteers. Peo-peo-mox-mox, the celebrated chief of the Walla Wallas, entertained an extreme hostility toward myself and party, owing to imaginary wrongs he supposed to have been inflicted upon him in the treaty concluded with the Cayuses and Walla Wallas last June, and had been known repeatedly to threaten that I never should reach The Dalles. He was the first to commence hostilities by plundering Fort Walla Walla and destroying a large amount of property belonging to the United States Indian department.

At Walla Walla I found some twenty-five settlers—the remainder having fled to The Dalles for protection. With these were one hundred friendly Indians. Special Indian Agent B. F. Shaw, colonel in the Washington territory militia, was on the ground, and I at once organized the district, placed him in command and directed him, if necessary, to fortify, at all events to maintain his ground should the Oregon troops be disbanded before another force should take the field. The Nez Perce auxiliaries were disbanded and returned home.

Thus we had reached a place of safety unaided, excepting by the fortunate movements of the Oregon troops. Not a single man had been pushed forward to meet us, and though it was well known we should cross the mountains about a certain time, and arrive at Walla Walla about the time we did, why was this? Arrangements had been made with Major Rains by Acting-Governor Mason to push forward a force under Colonel Shaw to meet me at Spokane about the time of my arrival there. A company had been enlisted, organized and marched to Fort Vancouver to obtain equipments, rations and transportation, which Major Rains had promised both Governor Mason and Colonel Shaw should be promptly furnished them. Some little delay ensued, and in the meantime Major-

General Wool arrived, who immediately declined equipping the company, as promised by Major Rains, and stated that he could not in any manner recognize volunteers or furnish them equipments or transportation, and declined to supply their places with regular troops, of whom, at Vancouver alone, were some three hundred and fifty men.

The report then goes on to make grave accusations against General Wool. "All history," says Professor Lyman, "abounds in instances of intense personal feuds and disagreements, but our Pacific coast history seems to have been especially fruitful of them. That between General Wool, with some of the officers who echoed his opinions, the regulars, in short, on one side and Governor Stevens, supported by the volunteers and the nearly united people of the territory on the other, was particularly acrimonious." The following is an extract from Stevens' report showing the ground of his complaint against Wool:

"When remonstrated with by Captain William McKay, in command of the company to push forward to my assistance, when informed of the object for which the company was enlisted, and that if it was not pressed forward at once, or if some other force was not sent, Governor Stevens and his party would be in the most imminent danger, the general replied that in his opinion the danger was greatly exaggerated. That probably Governor Stevens would be able to protect himself, but if he could not, then Governor Stevens could obtain an escort from General Harney.

"What a reply was that! A moiety of the Indians now in arms had defeated a detachment of one hundred United States regulars; Major Rains had placed on record his opinion that an insufficient force would be defeated by these Indians, and my party was supposed to number no more than twenty-five men. Yet Major-General Wool very coolly says, 'Governor Stevens can take care of himself.' So, too, in the remark that I could obtain aid from General Harney. Did General Wool know that the distance from Fort Benton to the supposed position of General Harney was greater than the distance from Fort Benton to The Dalles, and that to obtain aid from him would require not less than six months, and that an express to reach him must pass through the entire breadth of the Sioux? Such ignorance shows great incapacity and is inexusable.

"Mr. Secretary, Major-General Wool, commanding the Pacific Division, neglected and refused to send a force to the relief of myself and party when known to be in imminent danger, and believed by those who were less capable of judging to be coming on to certain death, and this, when he had at his command an efficient force of regular troops. He refused to sanction the agreement made between Governor Mason and Major Rains for troops to be sent to my assistance and ordered them to disband. It was reserved for the Oregon troops to rescue us.

"The only demonstration made by Major Rains resulted in showing his utter incapacity to command in the field. As has heretofore been said, his expedition against the Yakimas effected nothing but driving the Indians into the very country through which I must pass to reach the settlements.

"I therefore prefer charges against General Wool. I accuse him of utter and signal incapacity, of criminal neglect of my safety. I ask for an investigation into the matter and for his removal from command."

In January, 1856, Governor Stevens reached his capital at Olympia and found that the storm of war was raging on the west as on the east side of the Cascade range. A full history of operations in the sound country need not here be attempted, but a brief outline is essential to the complete narration of the second great struggle for the possession of Washington territory. In October, 1855, the Indian situation became threatening, so much so that Acting-Governor Mason called for the organization of four additional companies, to be considered as a reserve force, their members a species of minute men, ready for immediate action in case of necessity. Blockhouses were erected by the settlers and other defensive measures adopted. The war was given inception in the manner usual to savages, namely, by the indiscriminate massacre of defenseless settlers. In a letter dated November 5th, Christopher C. Hewitt thus describes the dire results of the outbreak to the unoffending people of White river, upon whom the first blow fell.

"We started Monday morning (October 29th) for the scene of action. After two days' hard work we made the house of Mr. Cox, which we found robbed. We next went to Mr. Jones', whose house had been burnt to the ground; and Mr. Jones, being sick at the time, was burnt in it. The body of Mrs. Jones was found some thirty yards from the house, shot through the lower part of the lungs, her face and jaws horribly broken and mutilated, apparently with the head of an axe. The bones of Mr. Jones were found, the flesh having been roasted and eaten off by hogs. Mr. Cooper, who lived with Mr. Jones, was found about one hundred and fifty yards from the house, shot through the lungs. After burying the bodies, we proceeded to the house of W. H. Brown, a mile distant. Mrs. Brown and her infant, apparently ten months old, we found in the well, the mother stabbed in the back and head and also in the lower part of the left breast, the child not dressed but no marks of violence noticeable upon it. Mr. Brown was found in the house, literally cut to pieces. We next went to the house of Mr. King, or to the site of it, for it had been burnt to the ground. Mr. King and the two little children were burnt in the house, and the body of Mr. King, after being roasted, had been almost eaten up by hogs. Mrs. King was some thirty yards from the house. She had been shot through the heart and was horribly mutilated. Three children were saved, one the son of Mr. King and two of Mr. Jones."

On hearing of the outbreak, General Wool sent additional troops and the regulars and volunteers carried on such warfare with the wily Indians as the nature of the country would permit. But the winter season, which is very rainy on the sound, and the dense primeval forest that covered the land, rendered campaigning against an elusive enemy exceedingly difficult and unsatisfactory. In the desultory fighting which followed the outbreak, a number of regulars lost their lives, among them the gallant and manly Lieutenant William A. Slaughter, and, though losses were also inflicted upon the Indians, little was accomplished toward the winning of a permanent peace.

Upon his arrival, Governor Stevens, with his usual vigor and resourcefulness, set about the onerous task of placing the territory on a satisfactory war footing. He contended that the volunteers who had been mustered into the service of the United States had been treated badly, so that it was proper that volunteers thereafter enlisted should be under the direction of the territorial authorities alone. As the term of enlistment of those volunteers called out by Acting-Governor Mason was about to expire, he issued a proclamation calling for six companies, reciting as the occasion for his so doing that "during the past three months a band of hostile Indians had been spreading alarm amongst the settlers residing on Puget sound, murdering the families, destroying property, causing claims to be abandoned, and preventing the usual avocations of the farmer, whereby a large portion of the territory had become deserted; and positive want, if not starvation, stares us in the face during the coming year."

Three days after this proclamation was issued, an event happened which effectually proved that the call of the executive was not unwarranted. It had been impossible for the hostile Indians to secure the co-operation and support of all their race residing upon the sound, but many remained friendly to the whites. In order to win over to hostility these friendly and neutral tribes, a bold move was determined upon by the red men in arms, one "utterly inexplicable, considering their usual mode of warfare." At 8:30 o'clock in the morning an attack was made on the town of Seattle, notwithstanding the fact that an American armed vessel was lying at anchor in the harbor. All day long the firing continued. Two white men were killed and a number of Indians, just how many could not be ascertained, though a shell from the United States ship (the Decatur) is said to have killed five. The Indians were not successful in their attempt to seize the town. Had they been, "thereby would have been settled the question by the great number of Indians upon the reservations who yet doubted as to which party should have their allegiance."

The defeat on White river of the hostile chief, Leschi, by a force of friendly Indians under Patkanim on February 15th, brought the war practically to a close in the vicinity of Seattle and the White, Green and Snoqualmie rivers. Thereafter the scene of hostilities shifted to the Nisqually country, where Quiemuth and Stehi were in command of the Indian enemy. Colonel Casey, of the regulars, was opposed to them and Major G. Hays, with a battalion of volunteers, was ordered to the scene to co-operate with him. March 10th the volunteers had a battle with the red men on Connell's prairie, the details of which were reported by Hays as follows:

At about eight o'clock this morning, Captain White with his company was ordered to the White river to build a blockhouse and ferry, supported by Captain Swindal and ten privates. He had not proceeded more than half a mile from the camp when he was attacked by a large Indian force, supposed to be at least one hundred and fifty warriors and a large number of squaws. I immediately ordered Captain Hennes to his support with twenty men. Captain Hennes moved with great rapidity, a tremendous volley of guns announcing his arrival. I became satisfied that an additional force was necessary, and despatched Lieutenant Martin, of Company B, with fifteen additional men. The Indians by this time were seen extending their flank to the left with great rapidity. I then ordered Lieutenant Van Oele, Company E, with fifteen men to check their flank movement, but before he could gain a position they had so extended their line as to make it necessary to send another party of twelve men under command of Captain Rabbeson, who succeeded in checking them. The fight by this time extended the whole length of our line, and one continuous volley could be heard from the Indian guns on the hill and those of our men in the bottom. This firing continued some two hours. I saw the advantage which the Indians had in position, and determined to charge them. I ordered Captain Swindal to charge them from his position, which was central, and Captain Rabbeson to make a simultaneous move against their extreme left, while Captain Hennes and Captain White were ordered to hold the position which they occupied.

This order was promptly obeyed and the charge made in the most gallant style by Captain Swindal against their center, and Captain Rabbeson against their left, through a deep slough, driving the enemy from their position and pursuing them some distance in their flight. Captain Rabbeson returned to camp, while Captain Swindal occupied a high ridge in the rear of the main body of the Indians. I ordered Captain Rabbeson to join Captains Hennes and White, and directed Captain Hennes to charge the Indians if he deemed it advisable. The Indians in front of Captains White and Hennes were in strong position behind logs and trees and upon an elevation. It was deemed too dangerous to charge them in front. Captain Rabbeson was ordered to join Captain Swindal, make a flank movement to the right, and charge the enemy in their rear. This order was gallantly obeyed. Simultaneously with this movement, Captains Hennes and White charged them in front. The Indians were routed and were pursued for a mile or more along a trail covered with blood. It is believed that not less than twenty-five or thirty were killed and as many wounded. They had been seen carrying off their wounded and dead from the time the fight commenced until it terminated. Withes and ropes were found on the ground they occupied, which had been used in dragging off their dead into the brush. Hats, blankets and shirts were picked up with bullet holes in them stained with blood. They were forced to give up their drum, which they abandoned in their retreat. But two Indians were found dead on the field, one of whom was recognized as Chehalis John. The other was placed under a log, and has not yet been examined. The Indians had together their whole force. They picked their own ground. They brought on the attack without being seen by our troops. I regard the victory of this day as complete—a grand triumph. They exceeded us in numbers nearly if not quite two to one, and we whipped and drove them before us. We had four men wounded, all of whom will soon get well.

After this battle the Indians were never again brought to a general engagement, though there was some desultory fighting. On the 22d of May, Lieutenant-Colonel B. F. Shaw, who was then in command of the volunteers, called a council of his officers to consider the advisability of withdrawing from the sound, leaving the regulars to maintain peace, and making an expedition into the Inland Empire. The council unanimously decided in favor of the expedition, giving the following reasons for such decision:

"The mounted volunteers having crossed the mountains, the necessity of protecting the settlements west of the mountains devolved upon the United States infantry commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Casey. Should the volunteers remain west of the mountains, they assumed that Lieutenant-Colonel Casey would be obliged to go east of the mountains and to join Colonel Wright, and that, while infantry were best adapted to the service west of the Cascades, the mounted volunteers could operate in the regions east. The Yakimas were the leading element of the hostile party. Their main strength must be broken before pursuing individuals or small parties. They asserted that, if Colonel Wright did whip the hostiles with infantry, he could not follow them after a fight. If the volunteers remained west of the mountains, they were powerless to check an enemy over one hundred and fifty miles off. The volunteers must make a fight before going out of service. Sufficient troops would still remain west of the mountains to protect the settlements. It was necessary that depots of provisions should be established in the Yakima country before the winter. The Indians west of the mountains had been repeatedly defeated; whilst those east of the mountains had never been checked."

In conformity with this decision, Lieutenant-Colonel Shaw set out over the Cascades, via the Naches pass. But before tracing his operations on the east side it will be necessary to return to the Oregon volunteers whom we left in the Walla Walla country and review their further fortunes and movements, as also those of Colonel Wright and the regulars under his command. Details of the winter campaign of the Oregon volunteer regiment need not be given. Much effort was expended in discovering caches of provisions and otherwise foraging for supplies. The Indians in December withdrew across Snake river, whither the volunteers could not follow them for want of boats. But in February six were constructed of whip-sawed lumber and caulked with pine pitch, and in these, transported in wagons to the place where needed, the regiment crossed the Snake twenty-five miles below the mouth of the Palouse, dispersing a small band of hostiles that opposed their crossing, and capturing their horses. An extensive survey of the country between the Palouse and Columbia rivers was made, then a part of the command returned to Walla Walla, but the main body under Colonel Thomas R. Cornelius, who in December had succeeded Colonel Nesmith, resigned, moved to a point on the Columbia opposite the mouth of the Yakima river. Cornelius was delayed somewhat in his contemplated march into the Yakima country by lack of supplies, but on April 5th, with two hundred and forty-one efficient men, he started. Next day on Canyon creek the hostiles were met. No engagement took place that night. The following morning, however, Captain Hembree with a small detachment was attacked while reconnoitering, and Hembree was killed, after having despatched two Indians, the rest of the squad escaping back to camp and giving the alarm. Major Cornoyer pursued the enemy, came upon them toward evening in a fortified position, charged them and killed six of their number. Thus by a loss of eight did the red men atone for the killing and subsequent mutilation of Hembree.

On the 8th the command set out towards The Dalles. While encamped in the Klickitat valley they lost a number of their horses, but further than that experienced no reverses en route and inflicted no damage upon the Indians except the killing of two. In May the regiment was disbanded, but from it was formed companies, which, however, were also mustered out in August.

We turn now to the operations of the regular troops east of the mountains, during the year 1856. In instructions to Colonel George Wright, issued in January, General Wool directed that two movements should be inaugurated as soon as climatic conditions should permit. "Expeditions should be prepared," said he, "at the earliest possible moment; that is, as soon as grass can be obtained, for Walla Walla and the Selah fisheries. As the snow will not allow the expedition to the latter so early by three or four weeks, the one to the former will be taken as soon as the season will permit, with four or five companies and three howitzers. It is desirable that the expedition should be conducted with reference to selecting a proper position for a post, and to ascertain the feelings and dispositions of the several tribes in that section of the country. I do not believe they will continue the war a great while. The occupation of the country between the Walla Walla, Touchet and Snake rivers, and the opposite side of the Columbia, will very soon bring those tribes to terms. The occupation at the proper time of the Yakima country from the Ahtanum mission, and that on the river above and below the Selah fishery, will compel the Yakimas, I think, to sue for peace or abandon their country."

It was such instructions as these that occasioned the unfriendly criticism of the people of the Northwest. "Not a word," observed Evans, "as to chastising the perfidious murderers of our citizens, nor the enforcement of the treaties, nor for the punishment of hostile acts which had destroyed the business of the country and retarded its settlement—not a word as to checking raids and depredations on isolated settlers." It was such insulting instructions as that sent to Colonel Wright at a later date—"Should you find, on the arrival of the troops in the Cayuse country, that a company is necessary to give protection to the Cayuse Indians from the volunteers, you will leave a company there with a howitzer"—that incited the positive hostility of feeling of the people towards Wool.

March 11th Colonel Wright arrived at Fort Dalles. By the 26th, he was ready to, and on that date he did, start for the Walla Walla country. The folly of General Wool's orders became at once apparent. Had Wright made a vigorous movement against the ablest leader of the hostiles, Kamiakin, as he doubtless would have done if he had been instructed to reduce the belligerent Indians to submission, the Cascades tragedy would not have occurred. But the forces on the Columbia had been diminished by Wool's directions, two of the three companies at Fort Vancouver having been sent to Steilacoom about the middle of March, and on the 24th the company at the Cascades having been sent away. The movement of Wright up the Columbia to The Dalles had brought it about that a large amount of stores and supplies were temporarily at the Cascades, and for them there was no other protection than a detachment of eight men under Sergeant Matthew Kelly. The watchful Kamiakin was fully aware of the conditions, and had made preparations accordingly.

The settlements were on a narrow strip of bottom land on the north bank of the river. The south bank was precipitous, affording no opportunity for settlement. A saw-mill stood near the upper end of the portage; a little below were a number of houses and shops, among which was the store of Bradford & Company. Directly in front of this building's site is an island, and a bridge to connect it with the mainland was then in process of construction. The Bradford Brothers had been for some time building a tramway or species of wooden railroad between the upper and lower cascades. Upon this workmen were engaged building another bridge. There was considerable activity in the little village, whose importance the Indian war operations had greatly increased. Two steamers, the Mary and the Wasco, lay at anchor in the river on that eventful March morning, the quiet industry of which was to be so rudely disturbed.

The usual activities had just begun when the blood-curdling savage war whoop awoke the echoes. Then came the sharp reports of many rifles all along the line of the settlements. Fortunately an extended account of the attack on and defense of the Bradford store by one who was present and saw what he narrated has been preserved for later generations. It was embodied in a letter by Lawrence W. Coe, a partner of the Bradford Brothers in their store, to Putnam T. Bradford, who was east at the time:

On Wednesday, March 26th, at about 8:30 A. M., after the men had gone to their work on the two bridges of the new railway, most of them on the bridge near Bush's house, the Yakimas came down on us. There was a line about us from Mill creek to the big point at the head of the falls, firing simultaneously at the men; and the first notice we had of them was the firing and crack of their guns. At the first fire, one of our men was killed and several were wounded. Our men, on seeing the Indians, all ran to our store through a shower of bullets, except three, who started down the stream for the middle blockhouse, distant one and a half miles. Bush and his family ran to our store, leaving his own house vacant. The Watkins family came into our store, after a Dutch boy (brother of Mrs. Watkins) had been shot in the house. Watkins, Finlay and Bailey were at work on the new warehouse on the island, around which the water was now high enough to run about three feet deep under the bridges. There was grand confusion in the store at first; and Sinclair, of Walla Walla, going to the door to look out, was shot in the head and instantly killed. Some of us commenced getting guns and rifles, which were ready loaded, from behind the counter. Fortunately, about an hour before, there had been left with us for shipment below nine government muskets, with cartridge boxes and ammunition. These saved us. As the upper story of the house was abandoned, Smith, the cook, having come below, and as the stairway was outside, where we dare not go, the stovepipe was hauled down, the hole enlarged with axes, and a party of men crawled up; and the upper part of the house was secured.

Our men soon got shots at the Indians on the bank above us. I saw Bush shoot an Indian, the first one killed, who was drawing a bead on Mrs. Watkins, as she was running for our store. He dropped instantly. Alexander and others mounted into the gable under our roof; and from there was done the most of our firing, as it was the best place for observation. In the meantime, we were barricading the store, making loopholes and firing when opportunity presented itself. I took charge of the store, Dan Bradford of the second floor, and Alexander of the garret and roof.

The steamer Mary was lying in Mill creek; the wind was blowing hard down stream. Then we saw Indians running towards her and heard shots. I will give you an account of the attack on her hereafter. The Indians now returned in force to us; and we gave everyone a shot who showed himself. They were nearly naked, painted red and had guns and bows and arrows. After a while, Finlay came creeping around the lower point of the island towards our house. We halloed to him to lie down behind a rock; and he did so. He called that he could not get to the store, as the bank above us was covered with Indians. He saw Watkins' house burn while there. The Indians first took out everything they wanted,—blankets, clothes, guns, etc. By this time the Indians had crossed in canoes to the island; and we saw them coming, as we supposed, after Finlay. We then saw Watkins and Bailey running around the river side towards the place where Finlay was, and the Indians in full chase after them. As our men came around the point in full view, Bailey was shot through the arm and leg. He continued on and plunging into the river swam to the front of our store and came in safely, except for his wounds. Finlay also swam across and got in unharmed, which was wonderful, as there was a shower of bullets around him.

Watkins came next, running around the point; and we called to him to lie down behind the rocks; but before he could do so he was shot through the wrist, the ball going up the arm and out above the elbow. He dropped behind a rock just as the pursuing Indians came around the point; but we gave them so hot a reception from our house that they backed out and left poor Watkins with the bay. We called to him to lie still, and we would get him off; but we were not able to do so until the arrival of the troops—two days and nights afterwards. During this time he fainted several times from cold and exposure, the weather being very cold; and he was stripped down to the underclothes for swimming. When he fainted he would roll down the steep bank into the river; and, the ice-cold water reviving him, he would crawl back under fire to his retreat behind the rock. Meantime his wife and children were in the store in full view, and moaning piteously at his situation. He died from exhaustion two days after he was rescued.

The Indians were now pitching into us "right smart." They tried to burn us out—threw rocks and fire brands, hot irons, pitch wood—everything onto the roof that would burn. But as the bank for a short distance back of the store inclined towards us, we could see and shoot the Indians who appeared there. So they had to throw for such a distance that the largest rocks and bundles of fire did not quite reach us; and what did generally rolled off the roof. Sometimes the roof caught on fire; and we cut it out, or with cups of brine drawn from pork barrels put it out, or with long sticks shoved off the fire-brill. The kitchen roof troubled us the most. How they did pepper us with rocks! Some of the biggest ones would shake the house all over.

There were now forty men, women and children in the house—four women and eighteen men who could fight, and eighteen children and wounded men. The steamer Wasco was on the Oregon side of the river. We saw her steam up and leave for The Dalles. Shortly after the steamer Mary also left. She had to take Atwell's fence rails for wood. So passed the day, during which the Indians had burned Inman's two houses, Bradford's saw-mill and houses, and the lumber yards at the mouth of Mill creek. At daylight they set fire to Bradford's new warehouse on the island, making it as light as day around us. They did not attack us at night, but on the second morning commenced again lively as ever. We had no water, but did have about two dozen of ale and a few bottles of whiskey. These gave out during the day. During the night, a Spokane Indian, who was traveling with Sinclair and was in the store with us, volunteered to get a pail of water from the river. I consented, and he stripped himself naked, jumped out and down the bank, and was back in no time. We weathered it out during the day, every man keeping his post, and never relaxing his vigilance. Every moving object, bush, shadow or suspicious thing on the hillside received a shot. Night came again, and we saw Sheppard's house burn. Bush's house was also fired, and kept us in light until four A. M., when, darkness returning, I sent the Spokane Indian for water from the river; he filled four barrels. He went to and fro like lightning. He also slipped poor James Sinclair's body down the slide outside, as the corpse was quite offensive.

The two steamers having exceeded the length of time which we gave them to return from The Dalles, we made up our minds for a long siege, until relief came from below. The third morning dawned; and lo! the Mary and the Wasco, blue with soldiers, and towing a flatboat loaded with dragoon horses, hove in sight. Such a halloo as we gave! As the steamers landed, the Indians fired twenty or thirty shots into them; but we could not ascertain with what effect. The soldiers as they got ashore could not be restrained, and plunged into the woods in every direction; while the howitzers sent grape after the retreating redskins. The soldiers were soon at our doors; and we experienced quite a feeling of relief in opening them.

Now as to the attack on the steamer Mary on the first day of the fight. She lay in Mill creek, and no fires, and wind blowing hard ashore. Jim Thompson, John Woodard and Jim Herman were just going up to her from our store when they were fired upon. Herman asked if they had any guns. No. He went on up to Inman's house, the rest stayed to help get the steamer out. Captain Dan Baughman and Thompson were on shore, hauling on lines in the upper side of the creek, when the firing of the Indians became so hot that they ran for the woods past Inman's house. The fireman, James Lindsay, was shot through the shoulder. Engineer Buckminster shot an Indian with his revolver on the gang plank, and little Johnny Chance went climbing up on the hurricane deck, and killed his Indian with an old dragoon pistol; but he was shot through the leg in doing so. Dick Turpin, half crazy, probably, taking the only gun on the steamer, jumped into a flatboat alongside, was shot, and jumped overboard and was drowned. Fires were soon started under the boiler and steam was rising. About this time, Jesse Kempton, shot while driving an ox team from the mill, got on board; also a halfbreed named Bourbon, who was shot through the body. After sufficient steam to move was raised, Hardin Chenoweth ran up into the pilot house, and, lying on the floor, turned the wheel as he was directed from the lower deck. It is almost needless to say that the pilot house was a target for the Indians. The steamer picked up Herman on the bank above. Inman's family, Sheppard and Vanderpool all got across the river in skiffs, and boarding the Mary were taken to The Dalles.

In the same letter Mr. Coe thus narrates the incidents of the attack which was made on the Lower Cascades simultaneously with that on the store:

George Johnson was about to get a boat's crew of Indians, when Indian Jack came running to him, saying that the Yakimas had attacked the blockhouse. He did not believe it, although he heard the cannon. He went up to the Indian village on the sandbar to get his crew, and saw some of the Cascade Indians, who said they thought the Yakimas had come; and George, now hearing the muskets, ran for home. E. W. Baughman was with him. Bill Murphy had left the blockhouse early for the Indian camp, and had nearly returned before he saw the Indians or was shot at. He returned, two others with him, and ran for George Johnson's, with about thirty Indians in chase. After reaching Johnson's, Murphy continued on and gave Hamilton and all below warning; and the families embarked in small boats for Vancouver. The men would have barricaded in the warehouse, but for want of ammunition. There was considerable government freight in the wharf boat. They stayed about the wharf boat and schooner nearly all day, and until the Indians commenced firing upon them from the zinc-house on the bank. They then shoved out. Tommy Pierce was shot through the leg in getting the boats into the stream. Floating down, they met the steamer Belle with Sheridan and forty men, sent up on report of an express carried down by Indian Simpson in the morning. George and those with him went on board the steamer and volunteered to serve under Sheridan, who landed at George's place and found everything burned.

The timely warning by Indian Jack enabled all the people to escape with their lives, though the houses were burned and much government property destroyed.

But how fared the middle blockhouse, commonly known as Fort Rains? As heretofore stated there were at this place eight soldiers under Sergeant Kelly. The commander of this squad had been warned the day previous that Indians in the vicinity were acting suspiciously but gave the matter no serious attention. When the attack came, the members of the detachment were quite widely scattered and one of the number, Frederick Bernaur, had gone to the Upper Cascades for a canteen of whiskey. This man, on attempting to return, was shot through both legs, but managed to keep himself concealed, supporting his failing strength with the whiskey until night, when he stole into the blockhouse. The others, as soon as the truth became known, rushed for the protection of the fortification, and all reached it except Lawrence Rooney, who was captured by the Indians. The few families in the vicinity of the blockhouse also sought its protection, but were not so fortunate, several of their number being severely wounded in crossing the line of Indian fire. "We had," said Sergeant Robert Williams in his narrative of the attack, "seven wounded and three killed. Among the latter was Mr. Griswold, who might have escaped his death but for his overconfidence in the friendliness of the Indians toward him. The German boy, Kyle, mentioned in Mr. Coe's narrative, was killed while riding on horseback down the road on the hill in front of us. The Indian that shot him stood by the side of a tree close to the road, his gun almost reaching to the poor boy, who fell instantly upon being shot.

"Tom McDowell and Jehu Switzler and another man to me before unknown, were on their way from the Upper to the Lower Cascades, but before they had proceeded far they discovered hostile Indians. Being themselves unarmed, they made a desperate effort to reach the blockhouse, which they did in safety. They proved to our small force a valuable acquisition. The three gallantly aided us during the defense. After they had got in, the door was made secure by a bolt, and then a strong chain was drawn tight across. That being completed, we gave our savage enemy a treat of canister shot, fourteen rounds in all, from our six-pounder gun, after which they precipitately retired. But we still, while in reach, presented them with a few shells. They retired back of the hills, out of range of our guns, to torture and put to a horrible death our unfortunate comrade (Lawrence Rooney), whom they had captured. We could not see them at it, but we heard his piercing screams. After they had accomplished this last inhuman and diabolical cruelty, the main portion left and went to the lower landing."

The second day the Indians returned to the siege. The men in the blockhouse were thus prevented from getting water, of which the wounded especially were in dire need. Their necessities were relieved by the gallantry of Sergeant Williams and William Houser, who made their way to a saloon near by and succeeded in procuring some potables, but no water, also a small box of crackers. Next morning, the third day after the attack, relief came.

The movements by which the horrible siege at the Cascades was raised must now receive brief treatment. The beleaguered people managed to send an express to Colonel Wright, who had proceeded a few miles on his way to the Walla Walla country, apprising him of what was transpiring in the rear. He forthwith turned back. Word also reached Vancouver, conveyed by fugitives from the Lower Cascades, and soon Lieutenant Philip Sheridan, who later immortalized his name in the Civil war, was sent to the rescue with forty men. He descended the river in the steamer Belle, reached the Lower Cascades early in the morning of the 27th, disembarked the men at a convenient place and sent the steamer back for volunteer assistance. It is worthy of mention that two volunteer companies were equipped in Portland and Vancouver and came to the scene, but were unable to engage actively in any conflict. Sheridan's position, after landing, was such that he could not advance upon the Indians in his front without crossing over a narrow neck of ground. He soon learned that the foe was on this narrow strip also.

"After getting well in hand everything connected with my little command," says Sheridan, "I advanced with five or six men to the edge of a growth of underbrush to make a reconnaissance. We stole along under cover of this underbrush until we reached the open ground leading over the causeway or narrow neck before mentioned, when the enemy opened fire and killed a soldier near my side by a shot which just grazed the bridge of my nose, struck him in the neck, opening an artery and breaking the spinal cord. He died instantly. The Indians at once made a rush for the body, but my men in the rear, coming quickly to the rescue, drove them back; and Captain Dall's gun (a cannon borrowed from an ocean steamer) being now brought into play, many solid shot were thrown into the jungle where they lay concealed, with the effect of considerably moderating their impetuosity. Further skirmishing at long range took place at intervals during the day, but with little gain or loss, however, to either side, for both parties held positions which could not be assailed in flank, and only the extreme of rashness in either could prompt a front attack. My left was protected by the backwater driven into the slough by the high stage of the river, and my right rested securely on the main stream. Between us was the narrow neck of land, to cross which would be certain death. The position of the Indians was almost the counterpart of ours."

Both belligerents remained in their respective positions all day and all night, but Sheridan had in the meantime conceived the plan of crossing the command in a bateau, which he had brought with him, to the south side of the Columbia, make his way up the mountain's base to a point opposite the middle blockhouse, cross there to the north bank and endeavor to get to the rear of the Indian position. How this hazardous plan was executed is best told in Sheridan's own language:

"On the morning of the 28th the savages were still in my front, and, after giving them some solid shot from Captain Dall's gun, we slipped down to the river bank and the detachment crossed by means of the Hudson's Bay boat, making a landing on the opposite shore at a point where the south channel of the river, after flowing around Bradford's island, joins the main stream. It was then about nine o'clock and everything thus far proceeded favorably. But an examination of the channel showed that it would be impossible to get the boat up the rapids along the mainland, and that success could only be assured by crossing the south channel just below the rapids to the island, along the shore of which there was every probability we could pull the boat through the rocks and swift water until the head of the rapids was reached, from which point to the blockhouse there was swift water.

"Telling the men of the embarrassment in which I found myself, and that, if I could get enough of them to man the boat and pull it up the stream by a rope to the shore, we would cross to the island and make the attempt, all volunteered to go, but as ten men seemed sufficient, I selected that number to accompany me. Before starting, however, I deemed it prudent to find out if possible what was engaging the attention of the Indians, who had not yet discovered that we had left their front. I therefore climbed up the abrupt mountain side which skirted the water's edge, until I could see across the island. From this point I observed the Indians running horse-races and otherwise enjoying themselves behind the line they had held against me the day before. The squaws decked out in gay colors, and the men gaudily dressed in war bonnets, made the scene very attractive, but, as everything looked propitious for the dangerous enterprise in hand, I spent but little time in watching them and quickly returning to the boat, I crossed to the island with my ten men, threw ashore the rope attached to the bow and commenced the difficult task of pulling her up the rapids. We got along slowly at first, but soon striking a camp of old squaws, who had been left on the island for safety and had not gone over to the mainland to see the races, we utilized them to our advantage. With unmistakable threats and signs, we made them not only keep quiet, but also give us much needed assistance in pulling vigorously on the tow-rope of our boat.

"I was laboring under a dreadful strain of mental anxiety during all this time, for had the Indians discovered what we were about, they could easily have come over to the island in their canoes, and, by forcing us to take up our arms to repel their attack, doubtless would have obliged the abandonment of the boat, and that essential adjunct to the final success of my plan would have gone down the rapids. Indeed, under such circumstances, it would have been impossible for ten men to hold out against the two or three hundred Indians; but the island forming an excellent screen to our movements, we were not discovered, and when we reached the smooth water at the upper end of the rapids, we quickly crossed over and joined the rest of the men who in the meantime had worked their way along the south bank of the river parallel with us. I felt very grateful to our old squaws for the assistance they rendered. They worked well under compulsion and manifested no disposition to strike for higher wages. Indeed, I was so much relieved when we had crossed over from the island and joined the rest of the party, that I mentally thanked the squaws, one and all. I had much difficulty in keeping the men on the main shore from cheering at our success, but hurriedly taking into the bateau all of them it would carry, I sent the balance along the south bank, where the railroad is now built, until both detachments arrived at a point opposite the blockhouse, when, crossing to the north bank, I landed below the blockhouse some little distance and returned the boat for the balance of the men, who joined me in a few minutes."

Hardly had Sheridan landed and effected communication with the beleaguered blockhouse, when the advance of Wright's returning command under Lieutenant-Colonel Edward J. Steptoe arrived. A conference between Sheridan and Steptoe resulted in the former's being sent with a reinforcement to the island he had just left to capture the Cascade Indians, who, it was thought, would flee to the island, while the Yakimas would retreat into the interior of their own country. As expected, the Yakimas and Klickitats fled precipitately on the approach of Steptoe's command, and the Cascades, deserted by their quondam allies, fell into the power of Sheridan. Some of them were tried by military commission. Being under treaty, they were adjudged guilty of treason in fighting and nine were summarily hanged. The remainder of the Cascades were kept on the island under military surveillance.

April 28th Colonel Wright with five companies started into the Yakima country, and camping on the Naches river on the 18th of May, he remained there about a month. He was visited at intervals by chiefs professing a desire for peace, but the Indian plan was to affect to have two parties, one wishing hostilities to cease, the other advocating the continuance of the war. Their strategy consisted in the use of dilatory tactics, playing one party in their own ranks against another and making representations, true or false, which would stay the hand of their opponent until they could collect supplies. In this they succeeded admirably.

"The history of Wright's operations, as given in his reports," writes Mrs. Victor, "shows a summer spent in trailing Indians from place to place, from fishery to fishery, and over mountains before thought impassable for troops, dragging after them their season's supplies and accomplishing nothing but to collect the noncombatants of the disaffected tribes upon a reservation in Oregon, where they were secure from the turmoil of war and at liberty to spy on either side."

As before stated, Lieutenant-Colonel Shaw, of the Washington volunteers, started for the Walla Walla country early in June. Arriving at the Yakima country while Wright was there, he offered to co-operate with the regulars, which offer was declined. He therefore continued his march to the Columbia at a point opposite the mouth of the Umatilla river. Seventy-five men of his command, under Captain Goff, had been sent to co-operate with Major Layton, of the Oregon volunteers, in raiding the John Day country. By capturing horses and supplies, these forces compelled many Indians, some of whom were supposed to be hostile and some who might at any time be induced to become so, to seek the protection of the Warm Springs reservation.

Acting upon Governor Stevens' instructions to "spare no exertion to reduce to unconditional submission any hostiles within reach," Colonel Shaw determined to attack a force of the enemy whom he ascertained to be encamped in the Grand Ronde valley. Pushing rapidly over the mountains, he encountered the hostiles July 17th, and in a decisive battle drove them as fugitives in every direction. The story of this fight is vividly told by the Colonel himself in the following language:

We arrived in the Grande Ronde valley on the evening of the 16th and camped on a branch of the Grande Ronde river in the timber, sending spies in advance, who returned and reported no fresh signs. On the morning of the 17th, leaving Major Blankenship, of the central, and Captain Miller, of the southern battalion, assisted by Captain DeLaCay, to take up the line of march for the main valley, I proceeded ahead to reconnoiter, accompanied by Major Maxon, Michael Marchman, Captain John and Doctor Burns. After proceeding about five miles we ascended a knoll in the valley, from which we discovered dust rising along the timber of the river. I immediately sent Major Maxon and Captain John forward to reconnoiter and returned to hurry up the command, which was not far distant. The command was instantly formed in order; Captain Miller's company in advance, supported by Maxon's, Henness' and Powell's companies, leaving the pack train in charge of the guard under Lieutenant Goodman, with a detachment of Goff's company, under Lieutenant Wait, and Lieutenant Williams' company in reserve with orders to follow on after the command.

The whole command moved on quietly in this order until within one-half mile of the Indian village, when we discovered that the pack train had moved to the left, down the Grande Ronde river. At this moment a large body of warriors came forward singing and whooping, and one of them waving a white man's scalp on a pole. One of them signified a desire to speak, whereupon I sent Captain John to meet him, and formed the command in line of battle. When Captain John came up to the Indians they cried out to one another to shoot him, whereupon he retreated to the command and I ordered the four companies to charge.

The design of the enemy evidently was to draw us into the brush along the river, where from our exposed position they would have the advantage, they no doubt having placed an ambush there. To avoid this I charged down the river toward the pack train. The warriors then split, part going across the river and part down toward the pack train. These were soon overtaken and engaged. The charge was vigorous and so well sustained that they were broken, dispersed and slain before us. After a short time I sent Captain Miller to the left and Major Maxon to the right; the latter to cross the stream and to cut them off from a point near which a large body of warriors had collected, apparently to fight, while I moved forward with the commands of Captain Henness and Lieutenant Powell to attack them in front. The major could not cross the river, and on our moving forward the enemy fled after firing a few guns, part taking to the left and part continuing forward.

Those who took to the left fell in with Captain Miller's company, who killed five on the spot, and the rest were not less successful in the pursuit, which was continued to the crossing of the river, where the enemy had taken a stand to defend the ford. Being here rejoined by Captain Miller and by Lieutenant Curtis, with part of Maxon's company, we fired a volley and I ordered a charge across the river, which was gallantly executed. In doing this Private Shirley, ensign of Henness' company, who was in front, was wounded in the face. Several of the enemy were killed at this point. We continued the pursuit until the enemy had reached the rocky canyons leading toward the Powder river, and commenced scattering in every direction, when, finding that I had but five men with me and the rest of the command scattered in the rear, most of the horses being completely exhausted, I called a halt and fell back, calculating to remount the men on the captured horses and continue the pursuit after night.

I found the pack train, guard and reserve encamped on a small creek not far from the crossing, as I had previously ordered, and learned that a body of the enemy had followed them up all day and annoyed them but had inflicted no damage beyond capturing many of the animals which we had taken in charge and left behind.

I learned also that Major Maxon had crossed the river with a small party and was engaged with the enemy and wanted assistance. I immediately despatched a detachment under Lieutenants Williams and Wait, sending the man who brought the information back with them as a guide. They returned after dark without finding the major, but brought in one of his men whom they found in the brush and who stated that one of the major's men was killed and that the last he saw of them they were fighting with the Indians. At daylight I sent out Captain Miller with seventy men, who scouted around the whole valley without finding him, but who unfortunately had one man killed and another wounded whilst pursuing some Indians. I resolved to remove camp the next day to the head of the valley, where the emigrant trail crosses it, and continue the search until we became certain of their fate. The same evening I took sixty men, under Captain Henness, and struck upon the mountains and crossed the heads of the canyons to see if I could not strike his trail. Finding no sign, I returned to the place where the major had last been seen, and there made search in different directions and finally found the body of one of his men (Tooley) and where the major had encamped in the brush. From other signs it became evident to me that the major had returned to this post by the same trail by which we first entered the valley.

Being nearly out of provisions, and unable to follow the Indians from this delay, I concluded to return to camp, recruit for another expedition in conjunction with Captain Goff, who had, I presumed, returned from his expedition to the John Day's river.

I should have mentioned previously that in the charge the command captured and afterward destroyed about one hundred and fifty horse loads of lacamas, dried beef, tents, some flour, coffee, sugar and about one hundred pounds of ammunition and a great quantity of tools and kitchen furniture. We took also about two hundred horses, most of which were shot, there being about one hundred serviceable animals.

There was present on the ground from what I saw, and from information received from two squaws taken prisoner, about three hundred warriors of the Cayuse, Walla Walla, Umatilla, Tyh, John Day and Des Chutes tribes, commanded by the following chiefs: Stock Whitley and Simmistastas, Des Chutes and Tyh; Chickiah, Piyon, Wiccoai, Watahstuarth, Wamiswo, Cayuses; Tahlan, Cayuse, the son of Peopemoxmox; Walla Walla and other chiefs of less note.

The whole command, officers and men, behaved well. The enemy was run on the gallop fifteen miles, and most of those who fell were shot with a revolver. It is impossible to state how many of the enemy were killed. Twenty-seven bodies were counted by one individual, and many others were known to have fallen and been left, but were so scattered about that it was impossible to get count of them. When to these we add those killed by Major Maxon's command on the other side of the river we may safely conclude that at least forty of the enemy were slain and many went off wounded. When we left the valley there was not an Indian in it and all signs went to show that they had gone a great distance from it.

On the 21st instant we left the valley by the emigrant road and commenced our return to camp. During the night Lieutenant Hunter, of the Washington territory volunteers, came into camp with an express from Captain Goff. I learned to my surprise that the captain and Major Layton had seen Indians on John Day's river, had followed them over to Burnt river and had a fight with them, in which Lieutenant Eustus and one private were killed, and some seven Indians. They were shaping their course for the Grande Ronde valley, and had sent for provisions and fresh horses. I immediately sent Lieutenant Williams back with all my spare provisions and horses and continued my march. On Wild Horse creek I came across Mr. Fites, a pack master who had been left in camp, who informed me, to my extreme satisfaction, that Major Maxon and his command had arrived safe in camp and were then near us with provisions and ammunition. These I sent on immediately to Captain Goff. I learned that Major Maxon had been attacked in the valley by a large force of Indians on the day of the fight; had gained the brush and killed many of them; that at night he tried to find our camp, and hearing a noise like a child crying, probably one of the captured squaws, had concluded that my command had gone on to Powder river and that the Indians had returned to the valley by another canyon. He moved his position that night and the next day saw the scout looking for him, but in the distance thought that it was a band of Indians hunting his trail. Conceiving himself cut off from the command, he thought it best to return to this camp, thinking that we would be on our way back to Grande Ronde with provisions and ammunition.

Meanwhile Governor Stevens was making every effort to sustain the friendly faction of the Nez Perces under Lawyer, and in this he was receiving the hearty co-operation of William Craig, a white man who had been adopted into the tribe. In Governor Stevens' opinion an important incident in preserving the friendship of the Nez Perces was the holding of the Walla Walla valley. He seems to have determined to follow up the moral advantage gained by Shaw's victory by holding a council with all the Indians, friendly, neutral and hostile, whom he could induce to meet him in the Walla Walla country. Wishing to present a solid front against the Indians he endeavored strenuously to secure the hearty co-operation of the regulars. He accordingly held a conference with Wright at Vancouver, at which he learned that the colonel could not be present in person at the council but would send Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe with four companies to reach the scene in time. Everything seemed propitious for a friendly co-operation. The regular officers were, however, acting with duplicity, for they had received orders from General Wool such as would prevent any real co-operation with Stevens.

At the close of his pow-wow campaign in the Yakima country, Wright, having failed to find any enemy to oppose, had reported to General Wool that the war was at an end. The latter had, on the 2d of August, issued an order to Wright in which he said:

"The general congratulates you on your successful termination of the war with the Yakimas and Klickitats. * * * With the least possible delay you will conduct an expedition into the Walla Walla country. No emigrants or other whites, except the Hudson's Bay Company, or persons having ceded rights from the Indians, will be permitted to settle or remain in the Indian country, or on land not ceded by treaty, confirmed by the senate and approved by the president of the United States, excepting the miners at the Colville mines. Those will be notified, however, that, if they interfere with the Indians, or their squaws, they will be punished and sent out of the country. It appears that Colonel Shaw, from Puget sound, with his volunteers, has gone to the Walla Walla country. Colonel Wright will order them out of the country by way of Fort Dalles. If they do not go immediately, they will be arrested, disarmed and sent out."

Had Stevens known of this order, he would not have relied on the regulars for assistance. But being ignorant of it, he proceeded into the heart of the Indian country without hesitation. Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe left The Dalles with four companies August 20th, and on the 5th of the following month he established a camp five miles below the council ground. Stevens had made arrangements for "sending home the volunteers, to be mustered out of the service on the arrival in the valley of the regular troops," and thus unconsciously saved Steptoe one task enjoined upon him by Wool's order.

On the evening of September 10th, Governor Stevens, now ready for the council, requested two of Steptoe's companies of troops and some mountain howitzers. Steptoe refused on the ground that he could not do so in consistency with the directions of his superior, and Stevens retained Captain Goff's company of volunteers as guards. The council opened on the 11th. It was decidedly stormy from the beginning, and by the 13th conditions became so alarming that Governor Stevens again addressed Steptoe, advising him that half the Nez Perces were hostile, as were practically all the other tribes, and stating that he deemed a company of regulars essential to his safety. Steptoe again refused and advised the governor to adjourn council to his (Steptoe's) camp. This under the circumstances Stevens could not help but do. While en route he met Kamiakin, who, he thought, would surely have attacked him had he known in time of his intended march. "Kamiakin," wrote he to the secretary of war, "had unquestionably an understanding, as subsequent events showed, with all the Indians except the friendly Nez Perces (about one-half the nation) and a small number of friendly Indians of other tribes, to make an attack that day or evening upon my camp. He found me on the road, to his great surprise, and had no time to perfect his arrangements. I had learned in the night that Kamiakin had camped on the Touchet the night before, and that he would be in this day. The council opened on the 10th. All the Indians were camped near. Kamiakin and his band were only separated from the council grounds by a narrow skirt of woods in the bottom of Mill creek."

For several days more Governor Stevens labored in vain to get the Indians to accept his terms of peace, namely, that they must throw aside their guns and submit to the justice and mercy of the government, surrendering all murderers for trial. The Indians would conclude no peace on other terms than that they should be left in possession of their territory as before the treaties. On the 19th Governor Stevens directed his march westward. His battle with the Indians on that date and the incidents of his return were thus summarized in his official report:

"So satisfied was I that the Indians would carry into effect their determination, avowed in the councils in their own camps for several nights previously, to attack me, that, in starting, I formed my whole party and moved in order of battle. I moved on under fire one mile to water, when, forming a corral of the wagons and holding the adjacent hills and the brush on the stream by pickets, I made my arrangements to defend my position and fight the Indians. Our position in a low open basin five or six hundred yards across [he was attacked on what is known as Charles Russell's ranch] was good, and with the aid of our corral, we could defend ourselves against a vastly superior force of the enemy.

The fight continued till late in the night. Two charges were made to disperse the Indians the last led by Lieutenant-Colonel Shaw in person, with twenty-four men; but, whilst driving before him some hundred and fifty Indians, an equal number pushed into his rear, and he was compelled to cut his way through them towards the camp, when, drawing up his men, and aided by the teamsters and pickets who gallantly sprang forward, he drove the Indians back in full charge upon the corral. Just before the charge the friendly Nez Perces, fifty in number, who had been assigned to hold the ridge on the south side of the corral, were told by the enemy they came not to fight the Nez Perces but the whites. "Go to your camp," said they, "or we will wipe it out." Their camp, with the women and children, was on a stream about a mile distant, and I directed them to retire, as I did not require their assistance and was fearful that my men might not be able to distinguish them from hostiles, and thus friendly Indians be killed.

"Towards night I notified Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe that I was fighting the Indians, that I should move the next morning and expressed the opinion that a company of his troops would be of service. In his reply he stated that the Indians had burned up his grass and suggested that I should return to his camp and place at his disposal my wagons in order that he might move his whole command and his supplies to the Umatilla or some other point, where sustenance could be found for his animals. To this arrangement I assented and Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe sent to my camp Lieutenant Davidson, with detachments from the companies of dragoons and artillery with a mounted howitzer. They reached my camp about two o'clock in the morning, everything in good order and most of the men at the corral asleep. A picket had been driven in by the enemy an hour and a half before, that on the hill south of the corral, but the enemy was immediately dislodged, and ground pits being dug, all points were held. The howitzer having been fired on the way out, it was believed nothing would be gained by waiting until morning and the whole force immediately returned to Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe's camp.

"Soon after sunrise the enemy attacked the camp but was soon dislodged by the howitzer and a charge by a detachment from Steptoe's command. On my arrival at the camp, I urged Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe to build a blockhouse immediately, to leave one company to defend it with all his supplies, then to march below and return with an additional force and additional supplies, and by a vigorous winter campaign to whip the Indians into submission. I placed at his disposal for the building, my teams and Indian employes. The blockhouse and stockade were built in a little more than ten days. My Indian storeroom was rebuilt at one corner of the stockade.

"On the 23d day of September we started for The Dalles, which were reached on the 2d of October. Nothing of interest occurred on the road.

"In the action of the 19th my whole force consisted of Goff's company of sixty-nine, rank and file, the teamsters, herders, and Indian employes numbering about fifty men. Our train consisted of about five hundred animals, not one of which was captured by the enemy. We fought four hundred and fifty Indians and had one man mortally, one dangerously and two slightly wounded. We killed and wounded thirteen Indians. One-half of the Nez Perces, one hundred and twenty warriors; all of the Yakimas and Palouses, two hundred warriors; the great bulk of the Cayuses and Umatillas, and an unknown number of the Walla Wallas and Indians from other bands were in the fight. The principal war chiefs were the son of Owhi, Isle de Pere and Chief Quoitonee; the latter of whom had two horses shot under him, and showed me a letter from Colonel Wright acknowledging his valuable services in bringing about the peace of the Yakimas.

"I have failed, therefore, in making the desired arrangements with the Indians in the Walla Walla, and the failure, to be attributed in part to the want of co-operation with me, as superintendent of Indian affairs, on the part of the regular troops, has its causes also in the whole plan of operations of the troops since Colonel Wright assumed command.

"The Nez Perces, entirely friendly last December and January, became first disaffected in consequence of the then chief of the Cayuses, Ume-howlish, and the friendly Cayuses going into the Nez Perce country contrary to my positive orders. I refused to allow them to go there in December last, saying to them, 'I have ordered the Nez Perces to keep hostiles out of the country. If you go there your friends in the war party will come; they can not be kept out. Through them disaffection will spread among a portion of the Nez Perces.' Ume-howlish, my prisoner, was sent into the Nez Perce country by Colonel Wright, and from the time of his arrival there all the efforts made by Agent Craig to prevent the spread of disaffection were aborted. What I apprehended and predicted had already come to pass. Looking Glass, the prominent man of the lower Nez Perces, endeavored to betray me on the Spokane as I was coming in from the Blackfoot council, and I was satisfied from that time that he was only awaiting a favorable moment to join bands with Kamiakin in a war upon the whites, and Colonel Wright's management of affairs in the Yakima furnished the opportunity.

"The war was commenced in the Yakima on our part in consequence of the attempt, first, to seize the murderers of the agent, Bolon, and miners who had passed through their country; and, second, to punish the tribe for making common cause with them and driving Major Haller out of the country. It is greatly to be deplored that Colonel Wright had not first severely chastised the Indians, and insisted not only upon the rendition of the murderers, but upon the absolute and unconditional submission of the whole tribe to the justice and mercy of the government. The long delays which occurred in the Yakima, the talking and not fighting, this attempt to pacify the Indians and not reducing them to submission, thus giving safe conduct to murderers and assassins, and not seizing them for summary and exemplary punishment, gave to Kamiakin the whole field of the interior, and by threats, lies and promises he has brought into the combination one-half of the Nez Perce nation and the least thing may cause the Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes, Colvilles and Okanogans to join them.

"I state boldly that the cause of the Nez Perces becoming disaffected and finally going into war, is the operations of Colonel Wright east of the Cascades—operations so feeble, so procrastinating, so entirely unequal to the emergency, that not only has a severe blow been struck at the credit of the government and the prosperity and character of this remote section of the country, but the impression has been made upon the Indians that the people and the soldiers were a different people. I repeat to you officially that when the Indians attacked me they expected Colonel Steptoe would not assist me, and when they awoke from their delusion Kamiakin said, 'I will now let these people know who Kamiakin is.' One of the good effects of the fight is that the Indians have learned that we are one people, a fact which had not been previously made apparent to them by the operations of the regular troops.

"Is, sir, the army sent here to protect our people and punish Indian tribes who, without cause and in cold blood and in spite of solemn treaties, murder our people, burn our houses and wipe out entire settlements? Is it the duty of General Wool and his officers to refuse to cooperate with me in my appropriate duties as superintendent of Indian affairs, and thus practically assume those duties themselves? Is it the duty of General Wool, in his schemes of pacifying the Indians, to trample down the laws of congress; to issue edicts prohibiting settlers returning to their claims and thus for at least one county, the Walla Walla, make himself dictator over the country?"

From the refusal of the Indians to treat with Stevens, and their attack upon the party returning from the council, it would naturally seem that the end of the war was still far in the future. Not so, however, Colonel Wright proved more successful, and yet not more successful, in the efforts he soon after inaugurated to pacify the Indians than had Stevens. The man who pursues the policy of conceding to the adverse party all he can ask can hardly fail to be successful in negotiations.

October 19th Wright was instructed by General Wool to proceed in person at the earliest possible date to the Walla Walla country and to attend to the establishing of a post there. In the order Wool used the following significant language:

"It is also of the highest importance that you, the senior officer (the chief man), should see and talk with all the tribes in that region in order to ascertain their wants, feelings and disposition towards the whites. Warned by what has occurred, the general trusts you will be on your guard against the whites and adopt the most prompt and vigorous measures to crush the enemy before they have time to combine for resistance, also check the war and prevent further trouble by keeping the whites out of the Indian country."

"As to the post above referred to, the site selected for it was a point on the bank of Mill creek, six miles above its junction with the Walla Walla river. The rest of the order was duly complied with. A council was called and forty Indians condescended to attend, practically all of whom denounced the treaty of 1855 and Chief Lawyer, of the Nez Perces, as the one by whom, mainly, the Indians were induced to sign it. Wright seemed more than willing to condone the perfidious wretches who signed the treaty as a deliberate act of treachery, and then when they had lulled the whites into a feeling of security, began assiduously the work of disseminating hostile feeling and of organizing a general war, for the purpose of exterminating or expelling the white race. His assurance to the Indians was: "The bloody cloth should be washed, and not a spot should be left upon it. The Great Spirit, who created both the whites and the red men, commanded us to love one another. All past differences must be thrown behind us. The hatchet must be buried and for the future perpetual friendship must exist between us. The good talk we have this day listened to should be planted and grow up in our hearts and drive away all bad feelings and preserve peace and friendship between us forever. Put what I say in your hearts and when you return to your homes, repeat it to all your friends." In his letter to General Wool reporting the proceedings of his council, Wright laid all the blame of the war upon the Walla Walla treaties. "Give them back those treaties," said he, "and no cause of war exists."

Such maudlin sentimentality, such shameful trucking with the enemies of those it was Wright's duty to defend, seemed akin to treason. Indignant and hurt, Governor Stevens wrote to the secretary of war: "It seems to me that we have in this territory fallen upon evil times. I hope and trust that some energetic action may be taken to stop this trifling with great public interests, and to make our flag respected by the Indians of the interior. They scorn our people and our flag. They feel that they can kill and plunder with impunity. They denigrate us a nation of old women. They did not do this when the volunteers were in the field. I now make the direct issue with Colonel Wright, that he has made a concession to the Indians which he had no authority to make; that by so doing he has done nothing but get a semblance of peace; and that by his acts, he has in a measure weakened the influence of the service having the authority to make treaties and having charge of the friendly Indians. He has, in my judgment, abandoned his own duty, which was to reduce the Indians to submission, and has trenced upon and usurped a portion of mine."

The citizens of the two territories, Oregon and Washington, were thrown into a furor of indignation by the conclusion of his shameful peace. The sacrifice of money and effort in equipping the volunteers, the sacrifices of the volunteers themselves, the traversing of dusty plains, the scaling of lofty and forbidding mountains, the sufferings of that dread winter campaign in the Walla Walla valley, the loss of life and limb, the brilliant and well-deserved victories of the volunteer arms—all these were for nothing. The regular officers step in and rob the country of all the fruits of victory, concede to the Indians everything they could ask, and then, to add insult to injury, General Wool says he hopes that Wright "warned by what has occurred, will be on his guard against the whites and prevent trouble by keeping the whites out of the Indian country," and that under the existing arrangements he doesn't "believe that the war can be renewed by the whites."

Elwood Evans, who was himself a citizen of Washington territory at the time and a participant in some of its public events, may be assumed to have correctly summarized the general opinion of the people in the following paragraphs from his history of the Northwest:

"That quasi peace was but the proclaimed continuance of the assurance by the United States army officers to the hostile Indians, 'we came not into your country to fight, but merely to establish posts.' It now officially announced the close of a war by General Wool, which he had never commenced to prosecute as war. It was but the unblushing publication of a policy inspired alone by him, and executed under his orders by officers whom he had handicapped in the enemy's country by instructions, the observance of which was but the triumph of Kamiakin. It was the official, humiliating concession to the hostiles of everything that they had demanded, or had inaugurated a war to accomplish, viz., the keeping of white settlers out of their country—save alone the isolated fact, that the Indians had made no resistance to or protest against the establishment of military posts within their territory. That failure to protest against the erection of posts was the only evidence of passive submission by the hostiles; yet with what avidity was the fact seized by General Wool to assure him that he was occupying the Indian territory by his troops, and that those troops were remaining there in peaceable possession! What a naked and barren victory, which proved too much; for it meant nothing except that armed troops within fortified posts were the only white men who could occupy such country. It too palpably demonstrated a suspension of hostilities patched up by appealing to the Indian: 'Let my troops stay here; and I will protect you and keep out the white settler.'

"General Wool, in the execution of this plan of campaign by his army of occupation, not for making war, had effectually accomplished the aim of Kamiakin in the instigation of the outbreak. The commanding general had avowed upon several occasions his policy of protecting the hostile Indians against the whites, and of expelling them from and keeping them out of the country. In fact, there appears to have been a common object actuating both Kamiakin and General Wool: Both were equally determined that the whites should not settle in nor occupy the country of Kamiakin or Peo-peo-mox-mox; both were equally hostile to the volunteers of the two territories, who sought to save the country for white settlement; both were averse to any hostile demonstrations against the Indians; both were willing that Governor Stevens should be cut off and his party sacrificed, when official duty compelled his presence in the Indian territory; both alike cordially hated the people of the two territories. Could Kamiakin have asked more than the performance of Wool's orders?—'Leave a company and a howitzer to protect the Cayuse Indians against the volunteers.' * * * 'Warn Colonel Shaw and his volunteers to leave the country; and should they fail to comply, arrest, disarm and send them out.' How it must have delighted old Kamiakin when he had interpreted to him that interdict against white settlement: 'No emigrant or other white person will be permitted to settle or remain in the Indian country.' Glorious duty for American troops to protect the blood-stained murderers of our people, to stand guard that the spirit of treaties shall be violated, that Americans may not occupy America and every part of its domain!"

The regulars soon discovered that they had been crying "peace, peace, when there was no peace," for it was not long until there began to be apprehensions of a renewed outbreak. These conditions obtained throughout the entire year 1857 and during the winter of that year the Catholic fathers reported that they feared an uprising in the spring. The Spokanes and Coeur d'Alenes, among whom the emissaries of Kamiakin had been spreading disaffection ever since the peace had been patched up in 1856, announced that the soldiers must not show themselves in their country. It was the scheme of the wily Kamiakin to first unite the tribes in opposition to the whites, then draw a detachment of soldiers into the country and treat them as he treated Haller in the Yakima valley.

The plan worked admirably. He cultivated the friendship of Tilcoax, a skilled Palouse horse-thief, and induced him to organize a pillaging expedition against the stock belonging to Fort Walla Walla, well knowing that sooner or later a counter expedition must be made by the soldiers to recover the lost animals. He also caused the murder of Colville miners, hoping that the whites there would ask for troops. They did call for troops. Their petition could not be disregarded, and in May, 1858, Colonel E. J. Steptoe set out to the Colville country, disregarding the warnings of the Indians that no whites would be allowed to travel through their lands. Steptoe, or more strictly speaking, his subordinates, committed a most egregious and incomprehensible blunder in starting from Walla Walla. On account of the great weight of provisions and baggage, a brilliant quartermaster conceived the idea of leaving behind the greater part of the ammunition, by way of lightening the load. As Joseph McEvoy expresses it, the force was beaten before it left Walla Walla.

The expedition was made in May. The wild torrent of Snake river was running bank full from the floods of summer as the command crossed. Timothy, a chief of the Nez Perces, with a few followers, was living then at the mouth of the Alpowa, and by his efficient aid the soldiers crossed the stream in good order and good time, and continued on their way, the brave old chief accompanying them.

On May 16th the force reached a place which George F. Canis, on the authority of Thomas B. Beall, chief government packer of the expedition, describes as low and marshy, with big swales and thickets of quaking asp abounding, and surrounded by hills without timber. Mr. Beall locates the place as near the present town of Spangle. There is, however, much difference of opinion among the survivors as to where all this happened. But wherever it was, there the Indians gathered with hostile intention.

Steptoe, realizing the dangerous odds, decided to return.

The next day, as the soldiers were descending a canyon to Pine creek, not far from where Rosalia is now located, Salteese, sub-chief of the Coeur d'Alenes, came up with an interpreter for a conference with Steptoe. The chief was making great professions of friendship, when one of the friendly Nez Perces struck him over the head with a whip, nearly knocking him from his horse. "What do you mean by speaking with a forked tongue to the white chief?" demanded the Nez Perce brave. Salteese, very angry, rode away in defiant mood. No sooner were the retreating forces well in the canyon than the attack was made. Second-Lieutenant William Gaston's forces were the first to draw the fire of the enemy. Steptoe ordered Gaston to hold fire. When again asked for orders he gave the same command, but Gaston disobeyed and soon the firing became general. Gaston and Captain O. H. P. Taylor were in command of the rear guard, and, with amazing courage and devotion, kept the line intact, foiling all efforts of the Indians to rush through. They sent word to Steptoe to halt and give them a chance to secure more ammunition. But Steptoe deemed it safer to make no pause, and soon after those gallant heroes fell. A fierce fight raged for possession of their bodies. The Indians secured that of Gaston, but a small band of heroes, fighting like demons, got the body of the noble Taylor. One notable figure in this death grapple was De May, a Frenchman, who had been trained in the Crimea and in Algeria, and who made havoc among the Indians with his gun-barrel used as a saber, but at last he, too, went down before numbers, crying, "Oh, my God, for a saber!"

At nightfall they had reached a point as to the exact location of which there is much difference of opinion. Here the disorganized and suffering force made camp, threw out a picket line for defense, and buried such dead as they had not been forced to leave. In order to divert the Indians they determined, having buried their howitzers, to leave the balance of their stores. They hoped that if the Indians made an attack in the night they might succeed in stealing away. The Indians, however, feeling sure that they had the soldiers at their mercy, made no effort at a night attack. But it is stated that Kamiakin, head chief of the Yakimas, urged them to do so. Had he carried his point, the night of May 17, 1858, would have been one of melancholy memory. Another massacre would have been added to the series of frontier outrages which have darkened our earlier annals.

There was but one chance of salvation, and this was by means of a difficult trail which the Indians had left unguarded, as the Nez Perce chief, Timothy, discovered by reconnoitering, the savages rightly supposing it to be entirely unknown to the whites. But by the good favor of fortune or Providence, Timothy knew this pass. But for him the next day would doubtless have witnessed a grim and ghastly massacre. During the dark and cloudy night, the soldiers, mounted and in silence, followed Timothy over the wretched trail. Michael Kinney, a well-known resident of Walla Walla, was in charge of the rear guard, and is our chief authority for some portions of this narrative.

The horrors of that night retreat were probably never surpassed in the history of Indian warfare in the Northwest. Several of the wounded were lashed to pack animals, and were thus led away on that dreadful ride. Their sufferings were intense, and two of them, McCrossen and Williams, suffered so unendurably that they writhed themselves loose from their lashings and fell to the ground, begging their comrades to leave some weapons with which they might kill themselves. But the poor wretches were left lying there in the darkness. During the night the troops followed, generally at a gallop, the faithful Timothy, on whose keen eyes and mind their lives depended. The wounded and a few whose horses gave out were scattered at intervals along the trail. Some of these finally reappeared, but most were lost. After twenty-four hours the troops found that they had reached Snake river. Here the unwearied Timothy threw out his own people as guards against the pursuing enemy and set the women of his tribe to ferry the force across the turbulent river. This was safely accomplished, and thus the greater portion of the command reached Walla Walla in safety from that ill-starred expedition.

A dramatic incident which occurred on the evening of May 20th merits a brief narration. While the horses were being picketed and preparations were in progress for the night, the guards noticed a cloud of dust in the distance. In a short time a band of mounted Indians, approaching at full gallop, came into view, and the clattering of the hoofs of their horses and the thick dust enveloping them gave the impression that the little band of soldiers, which had had such trying experiences and now seemed within reach of safety, was to be literally wiped from the face of the earth. Excitement ran high. The soldiers became greatly agitated, and orders to prepare for battle were about to be issued when the standard bearer of the oncoming horde, noting the confusion and mistrusting its cause, flung the stars and stripes to the breeze in token of friendly intentions. When the Indians swarmed into camp it was found that the banner was borne by none other than the ever-faithful Chief Lawyer. In the party were some of the sub-chiefs from Kamiah and noted members of the Nez Perce tribe. Steptoe declined to return to the contest with the hostiles, much to the disappointment of Lawyer, who clearly pointed out how Indian allies could be secured and an easy victory won over the confident and exulting Indians of the Palouse country. The Nez Perces had, no doubt, learned of the defeat of Steptoe by means of the wonderful system of signaling in vogue among the aborigines.

The sequel of Steptoe's defeat furnished a more creditable chapter in the history of our Indian warfare. General Clarke at once ordered Colonel Wright to equip a force of six hundred men, proceed to the Spokane country and castigate the Indians with sufficient severity to settle the question of sovereignty forever. On August 15th Colonel Wright left Walla Walla on his northern campaign. In the battle of Four Lakes, fought on September 1st, and in the battle of Spokane Plains, September 5th, he broke forever the spirit and power of the northern Indians. Lieutenant Kip's description of the former fight is so picturesque that we cannot resist the temptation to reproduce it. He says:

"On the plain below us we saw the enemy. Every spot seemed alive with the wild warriors we had come so far to meet. They were in the pines at the edge of the lakes, in the ravines and gullies, on the opposite hillsides and swarming over the plains. They seemed to cover the country for two miles. Mounted on their fleet, hardy horses, the crowd swept back and forth, brandishing their weapons, shouting their war cries and keeping up a song of defiance. Most of them were armed with Hudson's Bay muskets, while others had bows and arrows and long lances. They were in all the bravery of their war array, gaudily painted and decorated with their wild trappings. Their plumes fluttered above them, while beneath skins and trinkets and all kinds of fantastic embellishments flaunted in the sunshine. Their horses, too, were arrayed in the most gorgeous finery. Some of them were even painted with colors to form the greatest contrast, the white being smeared with crimson in fantastic figures, and the dark-colored streaked with white clay. Beads and fringes of gaudy colors were hanging from their bridles, while the plumes of eagles' feathers, interwoven with the mane and tail, fluttered as the breeze floated over them, and completed their wild and fantastic appearance.

"By Heavens! it was a glorious sight to see The gay array of their wild chivalry."

"As ordered, the troops moved down the hill toward the plain. As the line of advance came within range of the Minie rifles, now for the first time used in Indian warfare, the firing began. The firing grew heavier as the line advanced, and, astonished at the range and effectiveness of the fire, the entire array of dusky warriors broke and fled toward the plain. The dragoons were now ordered to charge, and rode through the company at intervals to the front, and then dashed down upon the foe with headlong speed. Taylor's and Gaston's companies were there and soon they reaped a red revenge for their slain heroes. The flying warriors streamed out of the glens and ravines and over the open plains until they could find a refuge from the flashing sabers of the dragoons. When they had found the refuge of the wooded hills, the line of foot once more passed the dragoons and renewed the fire, driving the Indians over the hills for about two miles, where a halt was called, as the troops were nearly exhausted. The Indians had almost all disappeared, only a small group remaining, apparently to watch the whites. A shell sent from the howitzer, bursting over their heads, sent them also to the shelter of the ravines. Thus the battle ended."

In the battle four days later on Spokane Plains quite a number of the Indians were killed, and Kamiakin, the war chief of the Yakimas, was wounded. After resting a day the forces moved on up the river and encamped above the falls. While there they were visited by Chief Gearry, a fairly well educated, rather bright Indian, who professed to be against the war. There is reason to doubt the sincerity of these representations, however. Colonel Wright talked plainly to him, saying that if he and the other Indians wanted peace they could have it by complete and unconditional surrender. On the 8th the march was resumed. About ten miles east of Spokane, Indians were seen in the act of driving their horses to the mountains. The horses were captured and shot, with the exception of one hundred and thirty picked ones, which were kept for the use of the troops. Defeat in battle, the loss of their horses and the execution of a few Indians who had participated in murders completely humiliated the hostile tribes. Councils were held by Colonel Wright at the Coeur d'Alene mission and with the Spokanes, at which it was found that the Indians were prepared to enter a treaty of entire submission to the whites.

In closing his extensive report of this campaign, Colonel Wright summarized its results as follows:

"The war is closed. Peace is restored with the Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and Palouses. After a vigorous campaign, the Indians have been entirely subdued, and were most happy to accept such terms of peace as I might dictate. Results: (1) Two battles were fought by the troops under my command, against the combined forces of the Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and Palouses, in both of which the Indians were signally defeated, with a severe loss of chiefs and warriors, either killed or wounded. (2) One thousand horses and a large number of cattle were captured from the hostile Indians, all of which were either killed or appropriated to the service of the United States. (3) Many barns filled with wheat or oats, also several fields of grain, with numerous caches of vegetables, dried berries and camas, were destroyed, or used by the troops. (4) The Yakima chief, Owhi, is in irons, and the notorious war chief, Olchen, was hanged. The murderers of the miners, the cattle stealers, etc. (in all, eleven Indians), were hanged. (5) The Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and Palouses have been entirely subdued, and have sued most abjectly for peace on any terms. (6) Treaties have been made with the above-named nations. They have restored all property which was in their possession, belonging either to the United States or to individuals. They have promised that all white people can travel through their country unmolested, and that no hostile Indians shall be allowed to pass through or remain among them. (7) The Indians who commenced the battle with Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe contrary to the orders of their chief have been delivered to the officer in command of the United States troops. (8) One chief and four men, with their families, from each of the above-named tribes, have been delivered to the officer in command of the United States troops, to be taken to Fort Walla Walla and held as hostages for the future good conduct of their respective nations. (9) The two mounted howitzers, abandoned by the troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe, have been recovered."

Thus ended the Indian wars of the fifties in Oregon and Washington. The era of robberies, depredations, murders and warfare was by this campaign effectually brought to a close in the Yakima and Walla Walla countries, making the opening of both to settlement possible. General Newman S. Clarke, who had succeeded General Wool in the command of the Department of the Pacific, and who, in the earlier days of his administration, had shown a disposition to inaugurate a similar policy, had completely changed front, even going so far as to recommend the confirmation of Governor Stevens' Walla Walla treaties. These treaties were confirmed.

PART II.

HISTORY OF KLICKITAT COUNTY

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL—1859-1889.

Although the territory now known as Klickitat seems to have been equal in the favorableness of its situation to the Oregon country across the river, no permanent settlers came into it for a number of years after the first pioneers had taken possession of the south shore of the Columbia. The centers of settlement had been established during the days of the Hudson's Bay Company and the missionaries, and naturally the later comers gathered around them, seeking new fields to conquer only when the older ones had become partially subdued. The original settlement in what is now Washington state, aside from Hudson's Bay Company's posts, had been blotted out by the terrible Whitman massacre and the war growing out of it, and when the Walla Walla country began to recover from the shock of this dreadful tragedy, the war of 1855-56 came on, furnishing an excuse for General Wool's military order remanding to barbarism all of eastern Washington. The order remained in force until the fall of 1858, when Wool's successor, General Clarke, rescinded it.

In 1856 the government commenced the construction of a military road across the Simcoe range to Fort Simcoe, on the Yakima reservation, and during the summer of that year a small fortification was erected on Spring creek, seven miles northwest of Goldendale, and garrisoned with a troop of United States cavalry. This little fort, known as the blockhouse, was a log structure surrounded by an eight-foot stockade. The building still stands to mark the location but the stockade has long since been removed. The early settlers say that this building when first seen by them showed plainly the marks of bullets fired by the Indians in skirmishes with the soldiers. In 1860 the troops were removed.

The first immigrants began to arrive in the valley late in the fifties. It was a beautiful country then, covered everywhere with rich, luxuriant bunch grass, a cattleman's paradise. From the hills along the Columbia to the foot of the timber-covered Simcoe range stretched one immense undivided pasture field. Now a thousand fences separate that same area into numerous fine grain farms which furnish homes for many prosperous people. The pioneer's judgment in selecting Klickitat as a home has surely been justified by the subsequent development. It possesses all the advantages an agricultural country needs and few drawbacks.

The surrounding country was as yet unsettled and there was no demand for farm produce and no means of transporting the same to market. Anyway the pioneer settlers were stockmen. The country was by nature suited to this enterprise, as abundance of natural grass grew everywhere, furnishing feed sufficient for winter and summer alike, unless the winters proved unusually severe. As a general rule the winters were so mild that the cattle did well without any other feed than the native grass, which grew rich and abundant everywhere in the valley and on the hillsides. As large herds of cattle could be raised and fattened ready for slaughter at almost nominal expense, the rearing of stock was a decidedly profitable business. Another advantage in the enterprise was that stock could be transported readily overland to the market, while any other commodity required a conveyance, a thing which is difficult to furnish in a newly settled country.

Most of the early settlers came from the Willamette valley, to which they had come across the plains at an earlier date. Some had grown dissatisfied with the damp climate of western Oregon and had moved in search of a drier country, others came to seek more extensive pastures for their increasing herds. To these Klickitat offered both a dry, healthful climate and a most magnificent stretch of rich grazing land for stock, where each might extend his lines as widely as he pleased without fear of encroaching on his neighbor's right.

By nature and past experience these early settlers were suited to pioneer life. Hardihood was to them a birthright. Their fathers and grandfathers had also been pioneers and had spent their lives on the border of the wilderness. They, in their turn, were born and raised on the frontier and the hardships and inconveniences of that sort of life held no terrors for them. They were possessed of an experience indispensable to the successful pioneer. Next to our soldiers, who won our liberties and maintained by their courage and sacrifice our integrity as a nation, this country should honor her pioneers, that brave and hardy class of citizens who penetrated the wilderness and blazed the way for the civilization which was to follow. To them is due much of the credit for the national greatness of which we boast to-day. They had to forego all such comforts and pleasures of life as are possible only in thickly settled regions. The benefits of church and school were denied them. Neighbors were few and far apart. For all these advantages they must be content to wait patiently. Theirs were all the hardships, while it was left to those who followed after them to enjoy much of the fruits of their toil.

The faith of the common people in the western country was really remarkable, notwithstanding the fact that it has been justified by subsequent development. Whether the American pioneer in his settlement of the west has been guided by blind instinct or a foresight that has transcended the wisdom of sages, is difficult to determine. They held the Northwest for the United States when our greatest statesmen were troubled lest they could not get rid of it. That theirs was the real statesmanship has been abundantly proven by subsequent developments.

Any settlement in the county previous to 1859 is scarcely worthy of notice. Sometime previous to the Indian war, probably as early as 1852, Erastus S. Joslyn, just out from Massachusetts, crossed the Columbia river to a point opposite the mouth of the Hood river and settled on a place now owned by Judge Byrnett. This farm lies in the Columbia valley, about a mile and a half east of the town of White Salmon. Joslyn built a cabin, set out a small orchard, placed a tract of land in cultivation and acquired a considerable herd of stock. When the Indian war of 1855-56 broke out, friendly Indians warned Joslyn that he would be attacked. To avoid the danger, he hastily fled across the river with his family, where from a place of concealment he watched the Indians burn his dwelling, destroy his orchard and drive off his stock. The following day soldiers came to the rescue of the Joslyn family and saved them from falling into the hands of the savages. At the close of the war, Joslyn returned to his ranch and lived there until the fall of 1874.

The Joslyn place is thought to be the oldest ranch in the county with the possible exception of the Curtis farm near The Dalles. An army officer named Jordan fenced in several hundred acres of land on Rockland Flats, across from The Dalles, and at a very early date several others had settled for a time on the north side of the river, but most of them went back and forth, spending part of their time on the Klickitat side of the river and part at The Dalles. Several men with squaw wives located at different points along the Columbia during the ante-bellum days. Egbert French, who afterward kept a store above Goldendale, had a place at the mouth of the Klickitat, and J. H. Alexander, also in after years a settler of the Klickitat valley, lived at Rockland. Both French and Alexander had squaw wives.

Some time in the spring of 1859* Amos Stark came to the valley and built a log house. There was no settler then in all that country. Save for the soldiers at the blockhouse and a few roving Indians, the entire district to the north of the Columbia was unpopulated. Mr. Stark was obliged to build his cabin alone, as there was no one to whom he could apply for aid, but he managed to raise the logs by sliding them up inclined skids. First he would pull one end up a distance with a rope, then fasten it and work the other end up a little way. By this means he managed to raise the logs although the process was tediously slow. He finally by this method completed the walls without assistance, then covered the structure with a roof. He thereupon went back to

*The year 1859 is given by all the first settlers of Klickitat county, who now reside there, as the date of their settlement. L. L. Thorp, of North Yakima, is, however, positive that his father, F. Mortimer Thorp, and family, also a considerable party of others from western Oregon, came in during the summer of 1858. Charles Splawn also gives that year as the date of settlement. Mr. Thorp does not claim that his father's family were the first to settle in Klickitat county, but that they belonged to the first party of settlers, all of whom came together to The Dalles. The Thorps were delayed a few days at that point, owing to the fact that their cattle did not arrive promptly by boat, while others of the party went direct to the Klickitat valley, preceding them a few days. As the memories of men are fallible, especially as to the dates of events which occurred many years ago, all dates which like this one can not be fixed by contemporaneous documents are of necessity given tentatively.

California, where he met Stanton H. Jones, whose acquaintance he had previously made. They planned to return to Klickitat county together, but Mr. Jones was delayed for a few weeks in California by business affairs, so Stark came back alone, Jones following a little later.

During Stark's absence in California a number of settlers had arrived in the valley. Among the first of these were Willis Jenkins and family. Willis Jenkins was one of the earliest settlers in Oregon. He had brought his family across the plains as early as 1844 and had settled in Polk county, near the present town of Dallas. In 1849 he moved to California to the newly discovered gold fields. During the first winter there he washed out about seven thousand dollars in gold dust, most of which he invested in merchandise. The following spring he returned with his goods to Oregon, where he started a store. As most of his neighbors had likewise sought their fortunes in the new El Dorado, money was about the only thing that was plentiful and Mr. Jenkins disposed of his merchandise at a good profit. From Polk county he moved to Wilbur, a small settlement in southern Oregon named for Father Wilbur, and there he also kept a store and a wayside lodging house. He lived at Wilbur during the Rogue River war. Later the family moved to Forest Grove, in Washington county, and finally in the summer of 1859 they came to Klickitat. They settled near the blockhouse, where the garrison was stationed, and when, in 1860, the soldiers were removed Jenkins filed on the claim. They brought with them to Klickitat one hundred and fifty head of cattle and a few horses.

The Jenkins family were not yet settled in the valley when Lewis S. Parrott and his son-in-law, John J. Golden, came. With the Parrotts and Goldens came the Tarter family, also from the Willamette. Mr. Golden preceded the party into the valley, arriving with a large herd of cattle July 9th, 1859, to the best of his recollection. He says the others joined him in August following. They settled on the Swale, a few miles southwest of the site of Goldendale; John Golden afterward moved to Columbus and lived there for a time. The party brought with them herds of stock, as did most of the early settlers. While living at Columbus, Mr. Golden took a contract to deliver one thousand cords of wood to the boats and wood hauling soon after became one of the chief industries of the county.

A little later John W. Burgen and his brother Thomas came, also bringing a large herd of cattle and horses. In 1860 John Burgen settled on the Columbus road, near Swale creek, about four miles south of the site of Goldendale. His family have ever since occupied this place, to which forty-four years ago he purchased the prior right of a young man for a twenty-dollar greenback. Here, in the following year, his son Newton, to whom belongs the distinction of being the first white child born in Klickitat, was born. The first house built on the place, a substantial log one, is still standing, although it has long ago been replaced as a residence by a more comfortable dwelling. Thomas Burgen also settled in the valley for a time, but in 1864 moved to Chamberlain Flats, where his family still live.

Among the others who came into the valley during the first year was Mortimer Thorp, who settled on the site of Goldendale. His house stood just north of the lot on which the Methodist church now is. Alfred Henson settled just below Thorp, building a cabin, and Charles Splawn settled near what is known as the Alexander place. Just above him was Calvin Pell. John Nelson and Robert Carter lived farther down the Swale, Alfred Allen and A. H. Curtis lived at Rockland Flats across from The Dalles. Besides those mentioned there were also Jacob Halstead, James Clark, Nelson Whitney, William Murphy, Captain McFarland and his son Neil; Francis Venables, Marion Stafford, Jacob Gulliford, — Waters and sons, and Tim Chamberlain, who came to Chamberlain Flats some time during the year. In all about fifteen families passed the winter of 1859-60 in Klickitat county.

The Klickitat county was so thinly settled in 1859 that it was generally considered by the citizens of the new district that the necessity for county organization had not yet arisen. Few people are anxious to hasten the time when they will be required to pay taxes, especially when no apparent benefit is to be derived from their payment. The territorial government, however, insisted that the settlers must organize and pay taxes. As early as December 20, 1859, it passed an act setting off Klickitat as a separate county and naming officers for the new organization. As this act is of interest as being the first reference in the statutes to Klickitat county, it is given verbatim below:

AN ACT

To Create and Organize the County of Clicatav.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington:

Section 1. That all that portion of Washington Territory embraced within the following boundaries, to-wit: Commencing in the middle of the Columbia river, five miles below the mouth of the Clicatav river; thence north to the summit of the mountains, the divide between the waters of the Clicatav and Yakima rivers; thence east, along said divide, to a point north of the mouth of Rock creek; thence south to the middle of the Columbia river; thence along the channel of said river to the place of beginning. The same is hereby constituted into a separate county, to be known and called Clicatav county.

Section 2. The said territory shall compose a county for civil and military purposes, and shall be under the same laws, rules, regulations and restrictions, as all other counties in the Territory of Washington, and entitled to elect the same officers as other counties are entitled to elect.

Section 3. That the county seat of said county be, and the same is hereby, temporarily located on the land claim of Alfred Allen.

Section 4. That Alfred Allen, Robert Tartar and Jacob Halstead be, and the same are hereby, appointed a board of county commissioners; and that Willis Jenkins be, and he is hereby, appointed probate judge; that James Clark be, and he is hereby, appointed sheriff; that Nelson Whitney be, and he is hereby, appointed county auditor; that Edwin Grant be, and he is hereby, appointed assessor; that William Murphy be, and he is hereby, appointed treasurer; that John Nelson be, and he is hereby, appointed a justice of the peace.

Section 5. That the persons hereby constituted officers by the fourth section of this act, shall, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, qualify in the same manner, and with like restrictions, as those elected at an annual or general election.

Passed December 20, 1859.

By this act Klickitat county (it was spelled Klickitat previous to 1869) was organized and its boundaries outlined in a general way. But the early settlers gave little thought to the organization of the county. The government at Olympia could appoint county officers, but it could not compel them to qualify, and this the majority of the new officers refused or neglected to do. Without having qualified, they could not act in the capacity to which they were appointed, so no efficient county organization was effected, no assessment rolls were made, and no taxes were levied. The Klickitat country was, therefore, in much the same condition as before it had been organized.

The absorbing problems of the time were not governmental, but industrial, as they must needs be in a new and sparsely settled community. As early as 1860 the people of Klickitat began taking contracts for the delivery of wood to boats on the Columbia river. These boats ran only to Wallula at this time, but the discovery that winter of gold in the Clearwater country of Idaho caused an effort to navigate the Snake and Clearwater rivers. The first boat to attempt this got as far up the latter stream as the Big Eddy, but no later efforts were made to penetrate the country with steamboats beyond Lewiston. The subsequent discoveries in other parts of North Idaho, in the Boise and Powder river basins and elsewhere, gave a tremendous impetus to navigation on the Columbia, creating a great demand for fuel. A wood-yard was established at Columbus and placed in charge of a man named Hadley, and at Chamberlain Flats, about thirteen miles further up the river, another wood-yard was put in operation by Tim Chamberlain. At both these points large contracts were let by steamboat companies for the cutting and hauling of wood.

In this way remunerative employment was furnished for all the men who had not brought into the valley sufficient stock to require their whole attention. The first contract price was ten dollars a cord for wood delivered at the landing. After that the price was cut to eight dollars. At this rate the business was only moderately profitable, for all the wood had to be hauled across the Swale from the hills beyond where Goldendale now stands, a distance of twelve miles, as no timber grew in the valley or on the hills along the Columbia. The first settlers brought very few American horses with them to Klickitat, and what few they had were considered very valuable, so all the hauling was done with ox teams, which, because of their slowness, made two days necessary for the round trip. One day they would go to the woods and load; the next they would make the return trip to the river. With six yoke of cattle to each wagon it was possible to haul about five cords at a load. The cost of feeding the ox teams amounted to nothing, as they could be turned out at night, and the luxuriant bunch grass, which grew everywhere plentifully then, was sufficiently nutritious and rich to keep them in good working order.

The furnishing of employment through the wood contracts was only one of the advantages accruing to the people of the valley through the mines, which also furnished a uniformly good market for their stock. The demand for beef in the upper country kept cattle at a high price and made stock-raising a profitable business. Ponies, being in demand for pack animals, and saddle horses also sold readily at a good figure. These different industries made money plentiful in the valley during the first few years and greatly aided the rapid development of Klickitat county.

During the summer of 1860 the first road to Columbus was opened by private subscription. That year witnessed also the first efforts to test the value of the soil for agricultural purposes, a little grain having been sown for hay and a few feeble efforts having been made at gardening. The results of these early attempts were not so flattering as to inspire further efforts in the same direction, for the first settlers did not as yet understand the soil and climate sufficiently to enable them to get the best results. It was only after some years of experimenting that they learned the lands best suited to the different crops, and for the first years even the vegetables they used were brought to the valley on pack horses. Most of the clothing they wore was hand-spun and hand-woven.

The first county election was held in 1860. Conventions were held and the nominations were made on strictly party lines. Complete Democratic and Republican tickets were placed in the field, although the Republicans, being very much in the minority in those days, experienced some little difficulty in finding enough men for all the offices. The result of the election was a complete victory for the Democrats. The county was divided into three precincts, the polls being at Rockland, the site of Goldendale, and the blockhouse. All were Democratic. The most of the officers elected again failed to qualify. A general understanding existed among the settlers that the men elected were not to qualify and thus to set at naught the organization of the county. The government at Olympia was persistent, however, and passed an act, January 24, 1861, appointing the following officers to fill vacancies: John Nelson, probate judge; Willis Jenkins, treasurer; G. W. Phillips, auditor; William T. Waters, sheriff; James H. Herman, A. Waters, A. G. Davis, county commissioners; C. J. McFarland, S. Peasley and W. T. Murphy, justices of the peace.

Another act was passed by the territorial legislature on the 31st of January of the same year, extending the northern boundary line of Klickitat county as far north as the northeast corner of Skamania county, from which place it was to run due east to a point from which, by running due south, it would strike the northeast corner of the previous boundary of Klickitat. At that time the longest dimension of the county was from north to south, embracing a large body of territory that is now embraced in Yakima county. By the same act the northern boundary of Walla Walla county was extended north to British Columbia.

During the first two years of white settlement in Klickitat everything seemed to promise well for the stockmen. So far they had been favored by circumstances. The grass grew in luxuriant abundance. The weather was favorable, and so far as their experience went there was no reason to expect anything different. Not all the seasons, however, were to be like those of their experience. Not only was the winter of 1861-62 more severe than the two previous ones; it was the coldest and longest ever experienced by the white inhabitants of Klickitat. The summer of 1861 was unusual. Heavy frosts occurred in some parts of the valley every month throughout the entire season. Cold weather came early in the fall. Snow fell in the hills on the 10th of October and November 3d several inches fell in the valley. All through the month of November regular snows occurred, some days as much as ten inches falling, then the weather would turn warmer and all the snow would go. Cold, disagreeable fogs hung continually over the valley.

For the first four or five days of December it snowed and rained every day, and the exceptional precipitation caused the streams and rivers to rise higher than was ever known at that season of the year. Klickitat creek flooded all the flat below the site of the town of Goldendale, the water standing eighteen inches deep in a house in the hollow, while the Columbia river almost reached the high-water mark for June freshets.

By the 22d of December there was no snow lying on the ground, although it was estimated by men who kept track of the different falls, that at least six feet had fallen previous to that date. Already cattle were dying. They were suffering from cold and hunger and their lowing was something terrible to hear. Had the weather been dry, they would not have suffered so much, but cattle seem to perish more quickly in a damp, chilly atmosphere than in an extremely cold, dry one. Beginning with the night of December 22d, it continued to snow daily up to the new year, by which time fully thirty inches lay along the Columbia, while at the blockhouse the snow came within a couple of inches of the top of a four-foot fence and was so soft as to make travel extremely inconvenient. Coyotes were very numerous in the valley at that time as were also all kinds of game. The settlers from their snow-blocked cabins would see a couple of ears moving along above the snow, the remainder of the lank coyote being buried in the drifts that yielded beneath the weight of his body like eiderdown. Sometimes they would amuse themselves by pursuing on horseback these silent-footed thieves of the night, and killing them with clubs. It was easy to overtake them in the deep, soft snow, and the slinking creatures, when they found they could not escape their pursuers, would crouch down in their tracks and allow themselves to be clubbed to death.

The 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th of January it sleeted, the snow and rain being attended with lightning and heavy thunder. This is the only time on record when heavy thunder accompanied a winter storm in this locality. The sleet falling on the top of the soft snow packed it down hard and thoroughly saturated it with water. Such was the condition existing on the 4th of January, 1862. On the evening of the 4th the weather changed suddenly and the chinook wind began to blow. The change from a damp, penetrating cold to summer warmth was speedy, and soon the snow began to disappear very rapidly. The water dripped from the roofs of the houses as if they were under a water-spout. The cattlemen were wild with joy and hailed this change in the weather as their salvation, for they thought that if the warm wind prevailed for a few days their deliverance was at hand. Hope took the place of dejection, every one feeling sure that the ruin and disaster with which they were threatened had been averted. They went to bed that night expecting that the morning would show great improvement in conditions.

During the night, however, another change occurred. The wind had suddenly veered to the northeast and the thermometer had fallen to zero. On the top of the snow was one vast sheet of ice which would everywhere bear the weight of a man. On that morning the despair of the cattlemen was as complete as had been their elation the previous evening. The loss of the cattle was discouraging enough, but to witness the hunger and suffering of the poor, starving brutes without any means of relieving their distress, was most uncomfortable.

This condition remained without change for six weeks, the thermometer ranging all the time from fourteen to thirty degrees below zero. People could now travel anywhere on the top of the snow crust, but large animals would break through and the sharp crust would cut their limbs to the bone. Unable to move in search of fodder, they stood there in the snow until they fell from weakness and died. One cow near the Waldron place, four miles south of Goldendale, survived forty-three days without food or water except what she could obtain from licking the snow. She became so savage from hunger that no person dared to approach within her reach. She survived until the warm weather softened the snow crust and set her free, then went to the water and drank copiously. After that she lived only a short time.

If the cattle had been left in the valley it is doubtful if a single head would have survived this terrible winter, but down along the hills that flank the Columbia it was more sheltered and the snow was less deep upon the ground. Besides, it was not so difficult for the animals to dig away the snow on the hillsides. They would turn their heads up the hill, always pawing the snow downward. The great problem was how to get the cattle there without their being all lacerated by the cruel sharpness of the snow crust. The way the settlers accomplished this was to bind up their horses' legs with the tops of old boots or with rawhide and drive them ahead to break the way. This was very tiresome on the horses that led and they had to be changed frequently. Finally, after two days of this kind of work they reached the hills along the river, where the horses could dig away the snow and get at the grass, while the cattle could manage to live by following up the horses and eating what they left. Where the rye grass grew the stock could feed with less trouble, as it was very tall and protruded above the snow. The bunch grass, however, was entirely covered and it was only after much digging and pawing that the animals could reach it. After the cattle got down to the hills along the river most of them would have survived had it not been for the numerous holes into which they were continually falling as they wallowed about in the deep snow, and in their weak and helpless condition they were unable to get out once they fell in. The owners, when they found them in these holes, generally ended their misery with a rifle ball.

February 10th the snow started to go away and by March 1st cattle could feed. They had just started to gain strength again when, on March 15th, there came another snowfall a foot deep, remaining until April 1st. Many of the cattle that had survived the long, cold winter were still too weak from starvation and exposure to weather another storm and the result was that many of the remaining cattle died. Fully three-fourths of all the stock in the country perished that year. The largest cattle owners in the county at that time were Willis Jenkins, William Murphy, Ben E. Snipes, John and Thomas Burgen, Lewis Parrott, John Golden and Joseph Knott, of Portland.

Willis Jenkins had close to two hundred head of cattle out of which he saved about fifty, most of them steers. Ben E. Snipes lost practically all he had in Klickitat county. He had, however, about two hundred head in the Okanogan country and these wintered all right. The following summer he drove them with some others he bought to British Columbia, where he disposed of them at a very high price. Beef sold that summer at the Caribou mines as high as a dollar and fifty cents a pound. In the spring, because of his heavy losses, he had been generally considered a broken stockman, but by fall he had cleared over forty thousand dollars.

The losses of other stockmen were proportionately heavy. M. S. Short, on Chamberlain Flats, succeeded in saving ten head out of the sixty-five he brought to the county the previous year. These also would have perished if he had not driven them to the mouth of Ten-mile creek, where they were in a measure sheltered and could get sufficient grass to sustain life. The journey over a rough trail through the deep snow, Mr. Short informs us, was attended with trials and hardships never to be forgotten. At the same time he moved his family to The Dalles, where they spent the remainder of the winter. It was the 23d of January when he started with his wife and one small child to make this journey down the Columbia to The Dalles. The weather was cold, the coldest of that unusual winter. The trail was rough, as a train of pack mules had gone over it just before the heavy frosts had hardened the snow, leaving it very uneven and full of holes. This unevenness made walking extremely difficult, as the trail was narrow. The distance from Chamberlain Flats to The Dalles is in the neighborhood of thirty-five miles and two days were required to make the journey. Mr. Short was forced to camp one night with his family in an open cabin without blankets, and the discomforts of that night may be readily imagined, but the following day they arrived at The Dalles without accident.

By January 1st the water in the Columbia was very high and the snow and sleet falling in the river formed a slush ice, which increased in the cold weather to a thickness of about fifteen feet, as nearly as could be determined. At one point a crack formed in the ice, which, though almost closed at night, expanded during the day to nearly a yard in width. At this place it was possible to look down probably fifteen feet and no open water was to be seen. When the ice broke up in the spring and floated out of the river, the ice press was tremendous. The high water crowded huge blocks of ice well out on the sandbars, where they remained until April 1st.

Should a bridge be built across the lower Columbia, the ice is a mighty force that would have to be reckoned with. Some winters there is no floating ice in the river; others there is very little, but should such a condition as has just been described ever again occur, the structure must be strong and the foundations secure indeed that would withstand the heavy ice floe brought down upon it with the current when the ice should break up and float out of the channel.

Before the cold winter there were thousands of jack rabbits and prairie chickens in the valley, but the severe winter left hundreds of them dead on the plains. The prairie chickens, in accordance with their custom, allowed themselves to be covered in the snow, and when the crust formed on the top they were unable to get out, and perished in great numbers from starvation. After it got warm in the spring and a man's weight would break through the snow crust, it was not uncommon to see birds that had survived escape through the holes made by the feet of pedestrians. The rabbits were not able to get enough food to keep them alive and many starved to death.

The very unusual winter of 1861-62 was to say the least most discouraging to the cattlemen. In one year they had seen the herds, which had taken them years to accumulate, worse than decimated. A few were entirely disheartened and left the valley, but most of the settlers remained and went bravely to work to build anew their shattered fortunes. It speaks volumes for the fortitude of these early settlers that they were sufficiently courageous to take up the struggle again in the face of such disasters. Had such a winter as has been described occurred a little later in the history of the county, it is doubtful if the losses would have been so great, for with each succeeding year an increased amount of winter feed has been provided in the valley while improved transportation facilities early made it possible to secure assistance from outside sources in case of need.

There are few disasters so complete that they do not bring a certain measure of compensation, and in one respect the severe winter was a fortunate circumstance for the settlers of the valley. It is believed that the Indians had planned a general uprising for the summer of 1862 with the intention of ridding the whole country of white settlers. As the Indian population far outnumbered the whites at that time, they would probably have experienced little difficulty in executing their plan had it not been for their loss of ponies during the previous winter. But the Indians lost nearly all their horses, and as they will not make war on foot the white people were left unmolested.

The cattle losses also had a tendency indirectly to encourage agriculture. The importance of providing some winter feed for stock could no longer be denied and some of the settlers turned their attention to raising grain for fodder. It was with reluctance at first that the cattlemen countenanced any attempt at farming, for they watched with a jealous eye experiments that might, if successful, result in their being finally deprived of the valley for a stock range. It was a good cattle country and they, as cattlemen, did not wish to see it devoted to any other use. They were inclined to discourage all experiments in agriculture, maintaining that the valley was more valuable as a stock range than it would ever be for anything else, and there are still people in the district who maintain that when they plowed down the bunch grass they destroyed a better crop than can ever be raised in its place. But the time was nevertheless fast approaching when agriculture would supersede all other pursuits in the county.

As early as 1861 some grain was sown in the valley. This, because of the exceptional winter that followed, was valued very highly for horse feed. In 1862 a little more grain was grown. As there were no threshing machines or mills in the valley for a number of years afterward, it was used for fodder only, but these experiments were useful in that they showed what the country was capable of doing.

The people also began to branch out into other industrial pursuits. At first all lumber used in the county had been manufactured by the use of the whipsaw, a slow and unsatisfactory implement. There was no lack of first-class timber in the county to supply any number of mills, but no little difficulty attended the bringing of the necessary machinery to the valley over poor roads and with poor transportation facilities. A company of men was found, however, who were willing to undertake the difficult task, and during the year 1860 Jacob Halstead, David Kitson, Benjamin Alverson and his brother Isaac, built a mill on Mill creek and furnished it with the necessary equipment for sawing timber. This first little mill was of small capacity and made no pretense of furnishing anything but rough lumber, but it was the beginning of an important industry in Klickitat county. It is estimated that the county contains seven hundred and forty-three million feet of standing timber, and although much of this is not yet opened up, the lumbering business has since assumed important proportions and now furnishes labor to a small army of men throughout the county.

The furnishing of wood for the boats was still an important business. Columbus had become quite a center of activity. One man opened a shop where he furnished fresh meat to the boats, and A. G. Davis started a store there. A couple of years later, however, he sold the building to a man who utilized it as a saloon. As the man had no license to sell liquor, his business was illegal, but if he had proceeded quietly in the business and had not sold whiskey to the Indians, it is doubtful if anyone would have molested him. But he persisted in dispensing his bad whiskey to the red men and they became very noisy and troublesome; indeed, conditions soon became so bad that men's lives were scarcely safe. There was no satisfactory manner of proceeding against the man by law, as the county had no effective organization of its own. An appeal to the courts would have to be made at Vancouver and the people of the valley were in no way sure that any redress could be obtained from that source. Thomas Jenkins, who at that time was loading wood for the boats, lived with his family at Columbus. As he had a sick child, these night orgies were especially annoying to him, and he asked the owner of the saloon to desist from selling whiskey to the Indians, as it made the town an unsafe place to live in. This the saloonkeeper refused to do, saying that he would sell whiskey to the Indians as long as he pleased. Exasperated beyond further endurance, a number of the citizens of the valley eventually decided to put an end to the whole matter. It was agreed by a company of men, among whom were Thomas Jenkins, Nelson Whitney, Lewis Parrott, Stanton H. Jones and William Hicinbotham, that they would enter the saloon and empty out all the liquor. As the members of the party were respected citizens and no mob, they chose the daylight in which to execute their designs. It was known that the owner of the saloon kept a loaded gun always in readiness on the counter; also that he was a desperate man and liable to use it. He was a good customer at his own bar and very often rendered harmless by over-intoxication, but it was nevertheless thought a wise precaution to dispose of the shotgun before anything else was attempted. Jenkins walked into the saloon alone and taking the gun from the counter, discharged both barrels into the air. Then the others entered, each of whom took a keg or demijohn out to an old hole where once had stood an Indian hut, and emptied out its contents. They kept this up as long as there was any liquor left in the building. When the saloonkeeper, who had been in a drunken stupor while the operation was going on, came to his senses and found his shop empty, he made all manner of dire threats of what he would do, but in the end he did nothing. The saloon has never since been reopened nor was there ever another established at Columbus.

Although some of the settlers became discouraged because of the hard winter and heavy loss of stock and left the valley, others came in to take their places and the county slowly increased in population. The country was still very attractive to the stockmen and during the summer of 1862 a number of extensive stock-raisers moved their herds to Klickitat. William

Connell and William Hicinbotham settled at Rockland and went into partnership in the cattle business. Thomas Johnson, a nephew of Connell, also came to the county that year and was also associated with his uncle and Mr. Hicinbotham in the business. They bought stock from the settlers and drove them overland to British Columbia, where they disposed of them at the mining camps. Watson Helm also brought a band of cattle to the county from Willamette valley during the year and sold them to Ben E. Snipes at thirty dollars a head. These Snipes afterward took to British Columbia with a herd of his own and sold at a high figure.

By January, 1863, there were two ferries connecting different points in the country with the Oregon shore, one running between Rockland and The Dalles and the other connecting the Rock creek wagon road with the road on the Oregon side. These were operated under restrictions and limits prescribed by law. The following rates were established by an act of the legislature: Wagon and span, three dollars; each additional span, one dollar; man and horse or horse with pack, one dollar; loose animals, fifty cents each; sheep and hogs, fifteen cents each. The ferry connecting Rockland and The Dalles was established by James Herman in 1859, and when it made its first trip, July 9th of that year, John J. Goldeu, who was then on his way to Klickitat, was aboard. A second ferry was put in operation at Umatilla in 1863, and in 1868 William Hicinbotham established a third at Columbus.

As if to lend credit to the view of the stockmen that Klickitat was not for the agriculturists, a new enemy of the farm products appeared in the valley at an early date. This was a tiny black cricket. When the first settlers came to the valley, and no one can tell how long before, there were crickets along the south side of the mountain that flanks the Columbia, but it was not until 1864 that they crossed into the valley. It is claimed by some that the significance of the word Klickitat is cricket, but there is a difference of opinion on this matter, and as few Indians can any longer talk the language of the Klickitats, it is difficult to determine what is the correct English translation of the word. These insects were small in size and in color about like a housefly. During the summer season they traveled in bands and after depositing their millions of tiny eggs, they died off. One peculiar habit of these insects was that they always traveled in straight lines. When the young were hatched in the spring they were as apt to start out in one direction as another, but whatever direction they took in the first place, they never varied from it afterwards. They would hop right into a stream of water or a ditch nor would they ever make any effort to avoid them. If they came to a wall or a tree, repeated attempts were made to climb over but none to find a way around. Whatever crops or gardens their course brought them to they utterly destroyed. In the morning they would attack a green field and by evening it would be as bare as the streets.

Ingenious methods were devised by the settlers to protect their crops and gardens. They nailed boards around the bottoms of their fences so close to the ground that none of the insects could crawl under, and on top of this they nailed a strip at right angles so as to protrude a short distance outward beyond the vertical boards, so that when the insects attempted to climb over the top board they would fall back. To destroy the pests they dug trenches along the edges of the fences in such a way that the insects would fall in and could not climb out. It is claimed that as soon as the crickets fell into the pit dug for them they would fall each upon the other, tearing off all their limbs as if their neighbors in distress had been responsible for their own trouble. When the trenches were filled with the insects, the farmers would cover them up with dirt to prevent stench. Some built fires across the line of travel of the pests, into which they would jump and be consumed, and by these and other methods a few saved their grain and gardens from being entirely destroyed. The crickets made their appearance each successive year until 1870, and by the 1st of March of that year the hillsides and valleys were almost black with the little insects, but ten days later a heavy fall of snow covered the ground and before it melted away the crickets were all dead. This species has never given any serious trouble since.

Up to this time, 1864, the whole Alder creek and Camas prairie country was an unsettled wilderness, nor were there many settlers on Rock creek or Chamberlain Flats. In 1861 Joseph Chapman settled and put out an orchard on a place along the Columbia beyond Rock creek. The same year Merrill S. Short came to Chamberlain Flats, where Tim Chamberlain and his brother had a wood-yard and were engaged in hauling wood for the boats. Mr. Short moved away the following winter and did not return for some years. The Chamberlain brothers lost all their oxen during the severe winter and had to abandon the wood business. In 1863 Chancey Goodnoe first came to the Flats and remained a short time, but he did not become a permanent settler until the following year. Thomas Burgen moved to Chamberlain Flats in 1864, settled on the place where his family still live, and spent there the remainder of his life.

A few years after the Indian war, Neil and A. Girdon Palmer, brothers, became the second permanent white settlers in the White Salmon country, locating on land just below the Joslyn place. Rev. E. P. Roberts, a retired missionary, and his wife were the next to enter that region. They came in 1860 or 1861, and settled upon the claim adjoining Joslyn on the east. Roberts sold out to J. R. Warner in 1864. A year or two later John Perry and his Indian wife settled on the river near Lyle. E. S. Tanner came to White Salmon in 1865, and in the early sixties, also, David Street, a bachelor, settled in the valley about four miles above White Salmon river.

The first schoolhouse in the Klickitat valley was built in the year 1866 by private donations of the settlers. The building was afterward moved to its present location on the Columbus road, about four miles south of Goldendale, as a more central site than the one it originally occupied. It has since given place to a more comfortable and commodious structure erected across the road. A private school supported by subscriptions of the settlers had been established several years before on the Swale. Nelson Whitney taught the first term in the private school, and Miss Jennie Chamberlain, afterward Mrs. Nelson Whitney, taught the first public school. No particular system of text-books was used, each pupil making use of the books he happened to possess, whether they were purchased for his special benefit or came to him as the abandoned text-books of his parents. These irregularities would be demoralizing to a school of this day, but it was surprising how much the children learned then, notwithstanding such disadvantages.

The only Indian trouble in Klickitat during the early years which gave evidence of developing into anything of a serious nature happened in 1866, and this could scarcely be considered anything more serious than a family quarrel. The quarrel occurred at Joseph Chapman's place, on Rock creek, now known as the W. B. Walker ranch. The Chapmans had a little Indian boy staying with them, and they were in the habit of sending him out every evening to drive up the horses. They also had a boy of their own who was about equal in age to the Indian. The young "Siwash" did not consider it fair that he should be sent for the horses every night while the other boy remained comfortably at home, so he made complaint to the boy's sister, Jane. All the satisfaction she gave him was a sound cuffing upon the ears, a treatment which probably did not hurt the young brave very much, but thoroughly ruffled his temper. He went forthwith to the other Indians with his tale of woe and stirred them into a violent passion. Being determined to slaughter the whole Chapman family, they went with loaded guns directly to Chapman's and made an attack on them. In the fight that ensued one of the Indians shot Jane Chapman in the head, but the bullet failed to penetrate the skull, and after its removal the girl soon recovered. One of the Indians, called Chief George, was shot through the body and also badly slashed with a sword. The Civil war was closed then only a short time; soldiers were continually passing back and forth through the country, one of whom had left an old sword at the Chapman place, and when the Indians made their attack, a man stopping at Chapman's, familiarly known as "Alabama Joe," made at the old chief with the sword and slashed him so severely that he was left for dead, though he subsequently regained consciousness and crawled away. He lived a year.

It was thought this was liable to cause a general outbreak of the Indians, and a runner was immediately despatched to warn the settlers and summon aid. As the Indians still far outnumbered the whites, a war would have been fraught with great danger to the settlement. The real danger of war was greatly magnified because the circumstances of the trouble were unknown to the people and there was danger that some indiscreet act on their part might incense the Indians not already disaffected by the Chapman incident. Many of the settlers collected as much as they could of their effects and left the country. Some, thoroughly panic-stricken, fled in wild disorder, racing their horses across the plains in their mad rush to get away, but most of the people took the matter more calmly. A number went to the assistance of the Chapman family and a guard was maintained during that night, which was so dark that the watchers could see very little, but the Indians never molested them, although the dense darkness seemed to favor a night attack. The four or five hundred Indians seemed to be afraid of a handful of white men.

Father Wilbur was then Indian agent at the Yakima reservation, and when any serious trouble occurred it was customary to send for him. This great, powerful, fearless man seemed to understand thoroughly Indian character and could manage the Indians as if they were children. When he went to the Yakima reservation, the government thought it necessary to maintain a large force of soldiers as an inducement to peace to the red men, but shortly after his arrival the soldiers were removed at his request, and it was never found necessary to replace them. He would go right into the midst of the armed and angry Indians, arrest the leaders and compel the others to desist from their hostile acts.

Although many of the early settlers opposed county organization, on account of the taxation which was its necessary concomitant, it soon became evident that there were some advantages which could not be obtained without some form of local government. The county had no public school system, no roads, no bridges and no method by which these desiderata could be provided. Those who were opposed to organization in the first place because of the paucity of settlers in the county, now began to favor it. Previous to this time the county had been organized and officers elected, as has been said, but very little attention was given to the county government. Some paid their taxes, others did not, most of the officers never qualified, and nothing was ever done with the taxes collected, that is, nothing to the advantage of the county.

We are informed by a settler of that time that it was customary for the officials to divide the spoil and spend it for their own purposes. At that time the sheriff collected the taxes and turned over the money to the treasurer. In 1865 Sheriff Reuben Booten collected from all who were willing to pay and left the county, and the following year no attempt whatever was made to collect taxes. Very early in 1867, however, the county was reorganized, and the following officers were appointed by the territorial government: Commissioners, Amos Stark, August Schuster and H. M. McNary; auditor, Thomas Johnson; treasurer, William Connell; assessor, Stanton H. Jones; probate judge, James Taylor. August Schuster resigned and was appointed sheriff. John Burgen was appointed superintendent of schools. This was the first really effective organization that had ever been accomplished in the county. The courthouse was a building at Rockland, rented from William Connell at the rate of eight dollars per month. It is still standing.

These officers were appointed to hold office only until the general election of June 30, 1867. The officers elected were: Amos Stark, H. M. McNary and T. J. Chambers, commissioners; August Schuster, sheriff; A. H. Simmons, probate judge; Martin Harper, auditor; John Burgen, superintendent of schools. Most of the officers were then paid fees or wages by the day for the time spent in the service of the county, but the superintendent of schools was granted the special dignity of drawing an annual salary. He received twenty-five dollars a year.

No records were preserved of any business transacted during the former organization of the county, and Klickitat may be said, without great inaccuracy, to have begun its existence as a political organization in 1867. A number of years afterward an attempt was made by the territorial attorney to collect sixty-seven dollars taxes levied by the state against the county prior to January 28, 1867, but as no records could be produced and many of the officers elected during that time had left the county, the attempt failed.

By an act passed in the territorial legislature and approved January 18, 1868, the boundary lines of the county were changed so that commencing at a point in the mid-channel of the Columbia, opposite Mimaluse island, above five miles below the mouth of the Klickitat, the line ran north to the summit of the mountains and the headwaters of the Ahtanum, thence following the channel of the Ahtanum and Yakima rivers to the Columbia, and down the Columbia to the place of beginning. The following year the country lying north of the Toppenish was added to Yakima county.

Although the population of Klickitat could yet be numbered in three places of figures, the number of business enterprises in which the people had already embarked was sufficient to indicate the industrious nature of the few scattered settlers that had remained permanently in the valley. Stock-raising had from the first claimed a larger measure of attention than any other business, and, although the severe winter of 1861-62 had given a hard blow to the enterprise, it was still the chief occupation of the people. Ben E. Snipes, William Connell, the Burgen brothers, Watson Helm and a large number of others, were carrying on an extensive trade in cattle in the county, and sold each year large herds to the mines of British Columbia and Idaho. The wood business had also become an important industry. Abundance of material was at hand, as the mountains were covered with a thick growth of timber, and as the boats were entirely dependent upon wood for fuel, wood-hauling soon developed into an important industry. Stanton H. Jones, who himself was engaged in the enterprise, states that at one time for a period of two years ten large teams and a number of small ones were engaged in hauling and furnishing wood to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company at Columbus, at that time the only place with any business pretensions in the county. A hotel, store, butcher shop and several other small business houses were established there.

The lumber business also made a good beginning early in the history of the county. As has been previously stated, the first saw-mill was erected by a company of men in 1860. This was followed by another a few years later on Klickitat creek, above the site of Goldendale, and soon the lumber trade became an important source of revenue to the county. From an early publication we glean the information that Klickitat pine was considered even at an early date very valuable for the making of patterns for foundry work. It has no hard grain like the fir, but is uniformly soft, and for that reason is peculiarly adapted to this purpose.

A few advance steps had also been made in agriculture, but not sufficient as yet to show what the county was capable of doing as a farming country. No one had as yet dreamed that Klickitat was to become one of the great grain-raising counties of the territory. In 1870 John W. Burgeh raised a small crop of wheat, and to him is given the credit of being the pioneer farmer of Klickitat. The following year a number of farmers in different parts of the valley sowed wheat and were rewarded with a very fair yield, the crops along the Swale averaging forty bushels to the acre. During the year a grist-mill was built at The Dalles and a part of the wheat crop was carried to that point and manufactured into flour for home consumption. Previous to that year all flour had been brought to the valley from Portland, and with the facilities for transportation then in use, it was both a difficult and expensive method of getting supplies. It was not to be many years, however, until the problem was not how to get flour up the river, but how to reach a market outside for the surplus at home. Now that a beginning had been made in agriculture and it had been demonstrated that the valley was a good grain country, the progress in farming was rapid.

Up to 1872 there was not a town in all the county, and Klickitat then embraced a much larger area than at present, as its northern boundary followed the mid-channel of the Toppenish and Yakima rivers to the Columbia. J. L. Henderson had laid out a town and built a store at the point where the military road crossed the Little Klickitat, but, although he offered lots to any person who would build on them, the town never materialized and was abandoned. September 5, 1871, John J. Golden bought from L. J. Kimberland the site of the present town of Goldendale, and the following year he platted a town site and gave it the name Goldendale. That year Thomas Johnson built a house in the new town, the front room of which he used as a store. There was then no other store in the county, although several had been opened previous to this time.

As the location of the county seat at Rockland was only temporary, it was decided by the commissioners, May 8, 1872, that the question of permanently locating the county seat be submitted to the voters of the county at the next regular election to be held November 8, 1872. From the first, Goldendale, being in the midst of one of the best agricultural sections of the county, was considered to represent the farming interest of the district and was strongly opposed by the stockmen. Although the largest number of the voting population was in the valley, and it would have been to their own immediate interests to have Goldendale the county seat, still the influence of the cattlemen was sufficiently strong to defeat it, although by a narrow margin. The vote stood seventy-seven for Goldendale and seventy-eight for Rockland.

Up to this time the county had increased in population very slowly. In 1872 there were not more than five or six hundred people in the county, but this is not surprising when we consider that the population of the entire territory in 1870 was less than twenty-four thousand. The time had now arrived, however, for a more rapid growth in the Klickitat valley. A start had been made in wheat-raising. People had also given some attention to fruit culture, though up to this time there were few, if any, bearing orchards. Some of the first settlers brought trees with them from Oregon, but the varieties were poor and the trees did not thrive. The first orchards of any importance were planted in 1870, and fruit-raising soon after became an important industry in the new county. The development of these various enterprises made it possible for a much larger population to subsist in the country than could have done so in the live-stock industry alone.

While settlement in the western part of the county had been fairly rapid during the early seventies, few had either the desire or courage to risk their fortunes upon the vast prairie east of Rock creek. That great region was presumed to be fitted only for stock-raising, and upon its broad expanse roamed thousands of cattle, horses and sheep. Stockmen alone claimed the vast range for more than two decades after the coming of the whites into southern Washington. Prior to 1871 Joseph Chapman, heretofore referred to, was the only permanent settler east of Rock creek, his ranch and wood-yard being situated near the mouth of the small stream which bears his name. In 1871 L. J. Kimberland left Klickitat valley and settled upon the east fork of Rock creek. The following May Benjamin D. Butler, Robert M. Graham, H. A. South and L. J. Bailey pushed still further east and began the building of homes near the headwaters of Alder creek. They were twenty miles from any settlement, but with brave hearts they faced the rigors of the higher altitude and the difficulties which beset the path of the pioneer. They were discouraged in every possible way by the stockmen, who knew from experience what would result if a permanent settlement were effected, but they stayed, broke ground and built their rude log cabins. Mr. Butler filed the first homestead entry in this region, and Robert M. Graham the second. Others followed during the succeeding two years until, in 1874, the district had sufficient settlers to warrant the establishment of Alder creek precinct.

In November, 1873, the northern boundary of the county was again changed. Instead of following the Toppenish and Yakima rivers to the confluence of the latter with the Columbia, it was made to correspond with the following official description: "Commencing at the northern corner of township six north, range twelve east; thence east along the northern boundary of township six north, to the point where that line intersects the Columbia river." This boundary line has since remained unchanged, although the western line was afterward moved. This change in the boundary of Klickitat decreased the area almost one-half, but as most of the territory added to Yakima county lay within the limits of the Indian reservation, it was not open to white settlement.

In 1873 a much large acreage of wheat was sown than on any previous year, and the necessity for some method for home manufacture of the product began to be strongly felt. The closest point at which flour could be obtained was The Dalles. An immense amount of time and energy was expended each year in the transportation of the wheat to the mill and the flour back to the consumer, all which it was possible to save by erecting a grist-mill at home, a task simple enough if the capital could only be procured. A movement was set on foot the following year by John Graham, Martin V. Harper, T. J. Harper, John W. Burgen, Egbert French and J. H. Alexander, to procure by private subscription the necessary funds to build a grist-mill, but the faith of the settlers was not yet sufficiently strong in the future prospects of the county to incline them to aid the enterprise. They felt certain it would be a losing proposition. A few years later, however, the demand for a grist-mill became imperative, and Messrs. Chatfield, Smith, Marble and Nelson, in 1878, built at Goldendale what was afterward known as the Klickitat mill. Almost simultaneously, Thomas Johnson built the Goldendale mills, giving inception to an era of rapid progress and prosperity in the county.

The manufacture of flour at home did not delay transportation of wheat abroad, as the amount of wheat grown in the valley was by this time sufficient to supply the home market and leave a margin for shipment. In 1876 the first export of wheat to an outside market was made, in round numbers about one thousand bushels. The following year the amount of wheat exported increased to fourteen thousand; in 1878, it was forty-six thousand; in 1879, one hundred thousand. The wheat product for the entire state in 1879 was less than two million bushels.

The city of Goldendale for a long time met with the most bitter opposition from the stockmen. So strong was their influence against the town that, although Goldendale was more centrally and more conveniently located to accommodate a majority of the people, a determined effort was made to prevent its being made the county seat. As it was known that in a fair vote Goldendale would obtain a substantial majority, influence was brought to bear by the friends of the town on the legislature to induce it to refer the question to a popular vote. Those who were interested in the advancement of the interests of Goldendale, were sufficiently farsighted to perceive that the best way to build up the town was to lay out as many county roads leading into it as possible, thus making it an important center. This was accomplished without the opposition's even suspecting its object, and Goldendale, being made easily accessible from almost all parts of the county, soon became quite an important business point. When finally Representative Nelson Whitney succeeded in getting a bill through the legislature allowing a three-fifths vote to settle the question, Goldendale had very much the best of it. At the general election in November, 1878, about five-sixths of the votes were cast for Goldendale. In February of the following year the commissioners ordered the sheriff to move the county property to the site chosen for it by the ballots of the people. This proved a rather difficult undertaking, as the roads were blockaded with snow, about thirty inches having fallen just previously, but it was accomplished nevertheless, and in Goldendale the county offices and records have ever since remained.

During the year the people were again panicked by a report that the Indians had broken out and were about to begin a war of extermination on the white people. To the Bannock and Piute marauding expedition of 1878 more extensive reference will be made in another chapter, that on the Perkins affair, but it may be stated here that in June the disaffected tribes left Fort Hall, Idaho, with intent to form a junction with the tribes on the Umatilla reservation, then sweep northward to join the Yakimas, Spokanes, Coeur d'Alenes and other northern Indians in a grand effort to rid the country of whites and re-establish the primitive condition of barbarism. But the bungling of the Indian leaders and timely and decisive action on the part of the government in hurrying troops to the scene, circumvented their plans and compelled them to abandon the expedition before they effected a crossing of the Columbia.

Many of the people, however, were thoroughly frightened. Not a few of the settlers had come from Minnesota, where they had been during the Sioux troubles, and the memory of the horrors of those dreadful campaigns were fresh in their minds. They had no desire to see such a condition again. The result was very similar to that of 1866, many settlers hastily gathering what they could of their effects and leaving the valley precipitately. In one family a child died during the day on which they heard the report. Their terror was so great that they at once constructed a rude coffin, buried the remains without funeral service and left the valley the same night. Numerous other stories might be told of ridiculous things done by persons almost crazed with fear of the dread savage on the warpath, but the greater portion of the settlers were not so violently disturbed. Many had been in previous Indian wars and knew better the character of the red man, hence took a saner view of the difficulties and set to work to provide some sort of protection for themselves and their property. A company of mounted riflemen was hastily organized, with Enoch W. Pike as captain. These were furnished with arms by the government, thoroughly drilled and otherwise placed in readiness for active service, should occasion demand it. A movement was also started to build a fort at Goldendale, where most of the surrounding settlers had gathered for protection, but timely interference of the United States troops quelled the trouble before the settlers had time to carry out their intentions. The Klickitat Rangers, as Captain Pike's men were known, were not called into active service against the Bannocks in 1878, but participated in the Moses campaign of the following year. An account of their movements at that time is given in the chapter which treats of the Moses demonstration and the Perkins affair.

Although the people of Klickitat have three times been threatened by the Indians, the day of the red man has passed and not a single life has been taken by an Indian since the war of 1855-56.

By this time the valley of the Klickitat had become almost entirely settled, and the more remote districts of the country began to attract the attention of the immigrant. In 1878 Samuel P. Flower came to eastern Klickitat, together with his brother, Charles E. Flower, also George Lawman and David Sprinkle, and settled on Pine creek, ten miles south of the site of Bickleton. Two families, those of Joseph Nixon and William Fadden, farmers, had preceded the Flower party. Mr. Flower informs us that he found Ben Butler and sons, James and Marion, stockmen, and Dixon Gaunt, located on Six Prong creek; Milton Imbrie, a farmer, on Pine creek, just above Butler's; while up toward Bickleton, near Alder creek, were Robert M. and John Graham, L. J. Bailey, George W. McCredy, Angus Forbus, Gottfried Peterson, Martin Holbrook, Charles N. Bickle, Rasmus Gotfredson, and a few others whose names he has forgotten. Near Cleveland's site were Ripley Dodge, Isaac Cousins, Ralph Cousins and Samuel Martin, who came in 1877, and Edward D. Morris, whose residence dated from June, 1878. Among the arrivals of the next two years were Simeon E. Warren, John Baker, George Alexander, Alcana Miller, Henry C. Hackley, Dickson P. Shattuck, in 1879; William A. McCredy and sons, Lycander I. Coleman and sons, William J. Story, Josiah Smith and George H. Ellis. In 1879 Ephraim McFarland built a saw-mill at the point where the present wagon road crosses the creek west of Bickleton. In later years several other mills were erected on the east end of Simcoe mountain.

The only serious setback the settlement in eastern Klickitat received in those early years was occasioned by the Indian scare of 1878 which resulted in nearly all the inhabitants fleeing to Goldendale. They made no attempt to prepare defenses near their homes. After the return of the people to their farms and stock, steady growth was resumed. As told elsewhere, two towns were soon established, Bickleton and Cleveland, and during the next few years settlement was rapid. According to a directory of Goldendale and Klickitat county published in 1880, there were not to exceed one hundred claims taken at that time east of Rock creek.

Groups of settlers had also located at Pleasant Valley, Chamberlain Flats, Camas Prairie and other points throughout the county, but outside of these settlements, very few claims were taken. The first settlers were looking for the valleys as the most suitable locations, and the less desirable land lying between they left to the later immigrants. By 1879, according to the Spokane Times, there were six postoffices in the county representing as many different settlements—Goldendale, Columbus, Block House, Klickitat Landing, White Salmon and Fulda.

In 1879 the assessed valuation of real estate for the entire county was only one hundred and fifty-two thousand three hundred and eighty-three dollars. As yet but a small proportion of the land was deeded, the major portion being still in the hands of the government, and for that reason most of the assessable property in the county was personal. The population had by this time grown to more than three thousand, an increase of about four hundred per cent. in six years.

When the vote to move the county seat to Goldendale carried, there was no courthouse in the county, court having been held in a rented building, but as soon as it was decided that Goldendale was to be the county seat, the settlers in the valley determined to erect a courthouse. As the county was still but sparsely populated, the taxpayers had no desire to settle any large indebtedness upon the county, and it was therefore decided to do the work by private subscription of money, materials and labor. The work was enthusiastically taken hold of by private individuals, and in due time a building valued at thirty-five hundred dollars was erected without a single dollar of expense to the county in the way of taxation; a small jail of two cells was also built. The buildings were at that time among the best in Washington territory, which had not yet experienced its period of phenomenal development.

By 1880 grain-raising had become the master industry of the county, wheat, oats and barley being produced in abundance everywhere throughout the valley. Fruit culture also had become an important enterprise, although many of the orchards were still too young to bear. There were, however, some fine apple and peach orchards at Columbus, White Salmon and other points along the Columbia. It had also been demonstrated that all kinds of vegetables could be raised to advantage, as soil and climate and the fortunate absence of diseases and destructive pests united to make the valley especially suited to the growth and development of such products.

The winter of 1880-81 was unusually severe, causing large losses to the stockmen. Up to January 1st the weather was not unusual, but during that month thirty inches of snow fell on the level, and because of sudden changes in the weather, became crusted over in such a manner as to prevent the stock from successfully foraging. The losses sustained by the sheepmen were especially severe. It is estimated that fully one-half of the sheep died, one man being left with only seventy out of a herd of five thousand. The cattle losses were also great, but as most of the stock for which winter feed was not provided were wintered in the Yakima valley at that time, the cattle that perished in Klickitat were few in comparison to the numbers that were lost in the surrounding country. The heaviest losses fell upon the inhabitants of the eastern end of the county.

The final change in the boundary lines of Klickitat county was made by an act approved November 29, 1881, by which the line between Klickitat and Skamania was established as follows: "Commencing at a point in the mid-channel of the Columbia river, directly opposite the mouth of the White Salmon river; thence up the said channel of White Salmon river as far north as to the southern boundary of township four north, of range ten east of Willamette meridian; thence due west on said township line to range nine east of Willamette meridian; thence north following said range line till it intersects the southern boundary of Yakima county."

The people of Klickitat valley were slow in learning the value of their county as an agricultural district. It was with much doubt as to their success that they made the first experiments in farming. Nor were the results obtained altogether satisfactory. The nature of the soil was so different from that to which they had been accustomed that it was necessary to test the value of the land by a series of experiments before they were able to determine the crops for which it was best adapted. Previous to 1870 the crickets had been so numerous as to discourage all efforts at agriculture, and for a number of years it seemed that the stockmen, who claimed that Klickitat was intended for stock alone, had the best of the argument, but some there were who never lost confidence that the valley was a good farming region, and the results have ultimately justified their faith. By 1881 the wide stretch of valley land lying between the Columbia hills and the Simcoe range was for the most part given over to the agriculturist. During that year the farmers and business men of the county formed an agricultural society, the chief object of which was to hold an annual county fair for the benefit of the farming interests of the county. Grounds were procured and suitably laid out about a mile from the town of Goldendale. A pavilion was built sufficient in size for extensive exhibits; stalls were provided for stock; a race-course was laid out; a grand-stand built for spectators, and all was surrounded by a close, high board fence. The exhibit in the fall was of such a nature as to show that the farmers of the county were possessed of enterprise and energy, and that the county had justified their faith in it. Another important feature of the fair was the fruit exhibit. The settlers of the valley had their attention called for the first time to the importance of their county as a fruit country, when they saw displayed not only the hardy varieties, but even the more delicate semi-tropical fruits, all perfect in form and development.

Already the necessity for better methods of outside communication was beginning to be felt by the citizens of Klickitat valley. Hitherto, the local demand had been sufficient for all the products of the county except the stock, which was readily transported overland, but the wheat fields were increasing year by year and it was evident that an outside market would soon be a necessity. A number of years before the government had turned its attention to the opening of the Columbia river for navigation, but government methods are necessarily slow and the Cascade locks were not to be opened to navigation for fifteen years yet. During the year 1881 the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company had secured a right of way down the south bank of the Columbia river and was rapidly pushing to completion a new line of railroad to Portland. The following year this road was ready for traffic, opening a new outlet for the wheat crops of the valley, although it did not dispense with the necessity of crossing the Columbia by ferry.

The year 1882 was a year of drought, and it witnessed the nearest approach to a crop failure that has ever been known in the valley. The west winds are always laden with moisture from the wet district beyond the Cascades and act like a rain to the growing crops, but when the winds continue long from the east, all vegetation becomes scorched and shriveled as if struck by a blast from a heated furnace. When these east winds strike the crops before they have matured the result is disastrous. As a general rule the west wind prevails in the growing season, but the year under consideration was an exceptional one and the crops suffered much damage from drought.

This year of short crops was especially discouraging as agriculture had only recently taken hold in the county and many of the farmers were not yet well established. Some were still in debt for necessary improvements, and consequently were left in straitened circumstances. That they were not disheartened, however, is shown by the energetic manner in which they set about repairing their fortunes the succeeding year. A much increased acreage was sown and substantial improvements were made everywhere. Another indication that the people had not lost confidence was the fact that the records of the proceedings of the spring term of court showed comparatively few suits brought for the collection of debt in the county and not a single one against a farmer. Another creditable feature indicated by the court docket was the remarkably few crimes committed in the county. The records show for the term before mentioned that only two persons were indicted for crime by the grand jury and that there was but one trial by the petit jury and that that one resulted in acquittal. Nor was this peculiar to that particular term of court; a similar condition has obtained throughout the whole history of the county. The pages of its past are blotted with few records of crime. The people who came as settlers were industrious and progressive, and the country being remote from the regular routes of travel, there was little to attract any other class within its borders.

It was the intention of the Agricultural Society when first organized to hold a fair annually and for a number of years it followed this plan. The second of the series was held in October, 1882, a very creditable one, considering the unfavorableness of the year. The following season was much more favorable for the farmer, and the Sentinel of October 11th informs us that the display that year was far the best that had yet been made. The population of the county was still small and their means limited, so that it was not possible to accomplish as much as might be desired, but these exhibitions had the beneficial effect of keeping before the people the natural resources of the county and the great elements of wealth and prosperity which it contained.

Klickitat had now become essentially an agricultural county. Wheat-raising was no longer an experiment, it having been satisfactorily demonstrated that cereals yielded a sure and profitable crop. In 1884 most of the valley land was planted to grain and as the year proved a favorable one, with sufficient rains to mature properly the crop, the result was a harvest unequalled in quantity and quality by any previous yield in the history of the county. The farmers were agreeably surprised by crops far in advance of their most sanguine expectations. The home flouring mills were crowded to their full capacity and a large margin was left for shipment abroad.

While the harvest of the season was all that could be desired, the price of grain was exceptionally low. Wheat ranged throughout the year at from forty to fifty cents a bushel, and as it is generally estimated that the cost per bushel of raising wheat is close to thirty-two cents, the margin of profit was small. It was a time of financial depression throughout the entire country. These times of business stagnation have occurred at intervals in our history so regular as almost to indicate that their recurrence is periodic. They can be accounted for on no general hypothesis unless it be excessive speculation and lack of business confidence. The agricultural sections, however, seem to suffer less at such times than any other part of the country. The farmers are more independent than any other class because they raise more of the actual necessities of life and in consequence are able to curtail expenses with less inconvenience. For this reason, Klickitat, being essentially an agricultural district, felt the season of hard times less than most of the surrounding counties. The lack of money in circulation, however, always seriously retards the progress of a section, delaying improvement, and in this respect Klickitat was no better off than the rest of the country. The Sentinel makes the rather extravagant statement that there was not "money enough in the county that fall to set a hen."

Although the people of Klickitat depended as yet largely on agriculture and stock-raising for their main sources of wealth, they were not the only industries that had gained a foothold in the county. We have already noted that as early as 1860 a saw-mill was brought into the county. From this single small mill of limited capacity, the number had increased to five in 1884, each with a daily capacity of from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand feet. Besides, three shingle mills were in operation with an average daily output of from eight thousand to ten thousand shingles. These mills furnished labor to a small army of woodmen and lumbermen, though the industry was only in its infancy. The outside world had yet to learn that the pine of Klickitat county was of superior excellence for box and all kinds of finishing lumber.

The year closed with unusual snowstorms. By the 15th of December it was estimated that at least six feet of snow had fallen at Goldendale, while in the hills and along the Columbia river the snow was considerably deeper. Because of the excessive amount of moisture it contained, it had settled down to about four feet on the level. All the trains were blockaded in the drifts and Goldendale was shut off from communication with the outside world for almost three weeks. Finally, on January 4th, the letter mail was hauled around the blockades on sleighs and a short time afterwards the road was again opened for regular trains. The soft, wet snow for some time made travel very inconvenient, and when finally the snow went away the roads were left in a very muddy condition, so that considerable time elapsed before they were again passable for freight teams.

During the year 1885 Company B, Washington National Guards, was organized at Goldendale with the following officers: Captain, Enoch W. Pike; first-lieutenant, A. L. Miller; second-lieutenant, G. W. Stapleton. However, this was not the first militia company organized in the county, that honor belonging to Captain Pike's Rangers, heretofore mentioned, who also have the distinction of having been the territory's pioneer militia company. Company B was disbanded by order of the governor in 1895, it having been decided to reduce the militia strength of the state.

The annals of a happy and prosperous people are naturally short, for the story of progress and improvement is quickly told while records of disaster are prolonged through many pages. An examination of the year 1885 shows little worthy of notice except a steady progress in spite of low prices for products and little money in circulation. That the people of Klickitat were suffering less than their neighbors from the existing financial distress, is plainly evident from a comparison of the delinquent tax lists published by the different counties throughout the territory for the year. The lists of Klickitat county show only a very few delinquencies while in many of the other counties of no greater population the lists are several times as long.

Although Klickitat has been settled for more than two score years, few deeds of violence stain the pages of its history. The people of the county were shocked, however, during the year 1886 by a crime of a most foul and revolting nature which occurred in the eastern end or what is known as the Horse Heaven region. The crime, for which the perpetrator finally paid the penalty which his deed merited, was committed on October 4, 1886. The facts in the case were as follows: William Sterling and Jochin Henry Timmerman, alias Beamer, left Ellensburg, where Sterling had been freighting during the summer, and started to drive with their teams and wagons across country to Oregon. They were seen together and recognized at different points on the road by a number of people who knew both parties. Up to the evening of October 3d they were known to be traveling in each other's company, but in the afternoon of the following day Timmerman came to the Arlington ferry alone. He was driving four horses hitched to a wagon with another trailing behind. One span of the horses was afterward recognized as belonging to Sterling. About fifteen days later the body of a man was found, lacerated beyond recognition, but everything seemed to indicate that it was the body of the missing William Sterling. There was evidence that it had been pierced by two bullets, one in the breast and one in the head. The body was buried by the discoverers and the facts reported to the authorities. After some time had elapsed Timmerman was arrested and given a preliminary hearing, which resulted in his being bound over for trial at the October term of court for the year 1887. The case was called on the 25th of October, Hon. George Turner presiding at the trial. The prosecution was conducted by County Attorney Hiram Dustin, assisted by Messrs. Smith and Dunbar, while Hon. D. P. Ballard, of Vancouver, appeared for the defense.

prosecution, testified that he had accompanied Timmerman and Sterling from Ellensburg to North Yakima. He described Sterling as a tall man with dark hair and dark complexion; he further stated that Sterling wore a dark felt hat while Timmerman wore a white one, decorated with tobacco tags. He said they arrived at North Yakima on the last day of September, 1886, and spent the night at S. V. Hughes' place.

S. V. Hughes was next called and testified that Sterling and defendant had spent the night at his home in North Yakima and that they left together on the following morning. Both witnesses claimed that Timmerman was then going under the name of Beamer. W. B. Crow, a resident of Milton, Oregon, testified that he had accompanied Sterling and the accused for some distance and camped with them one night on the Yakima river. From that point he took the Wallula road while they proceeded through the Horse Heaven country. He also had noticed that Sterling wore a black hat and Timmerman a white one. H. F. Williams and A. C. Ketcham both testified that they had seen the men together on the 3d of October and had noticed the team each drove.

The 4th of October, Timmerman was seen by W. H. Boyd, Archie Miller and George B. Kintzley, driving four horses and trailing one wagon. The horses, as described by them, corresponded to the animals driven by the accused and Sterling on the preceding day. Kintzley had been watching for horse thieves and he attached the property of Timmerman on suspicion. Many of the articles found in the wagon were identified as belonging to Sterling, among them a dark felt hat, and the bottom of one wagon was found to be stained with blood. Kintzley further testified of the manner in which he and Forwood had discovered the body of the murdered man. They were looking for stolen horses about October 20th and as they followed up the road over which Timmerman had traveled, they noticed where the track of two wagons led out to one side of the road and again where they had returned, about one hundred and fifty yards beyond. They were moved through curiosity to follow the wagon tracks back through the sand. After they had gone about sixty yards from the road they found a body all lacerated and torn by wild animals until unrecognizable, though an examination resulted in the discovery of indications that the body had been pierced by two bullets.

Two shots were heard by a sheep herder named Martin Peck in the direction in which the body was found, and Peck afterward saw a man with a four-horse team coming from the direction in which the sound of the shots had come. Many of the articles found on the wagon were identified by Mrs. Sterling as belonging to her husband. Her description of the latter's height and general appearance conformed closely to the dimensions of the body found, while a pistol and pocketbook discovered in the pockets of the murdered man were identified as belonging to Sterling.

The strange story told by Timmerman to account for the strong circumstantial evidence against him was that while he and Sterling were traveling together, they had been attacked by armed men who fired upon them. In the shooting which ensued, he had killed in self-defense one of the party that attacked them. He contended that the body discovered by Kintzley and Forwood was that of the man so killed and that William Sterling was still living. Sterling, he said, had run away to escape arrest when he discovered that they had killed a man. This story failed to account for the fact that the body found had neither boots nor hat, while Sterling's boots and hat were in the possession of the defendant.

Timmerman was convicted and sentenced to be hanged on the 15th day of December, 1887. The case was carried to the supreme court on a writ of error, but the decision of the lower court was sustained, and the day of execution was set this time for April 6, 1888. To the end Timmerman persisted in the truth of his very improbable story. He told Sheriff Blakely, of Gilliam county, that the body identified as Sterling's was really that of a man named George Lester, whom he had shot in self-defense in a quarrel over a horse.

Timmerman went through the ordeal of the trial and execution with fortitude, never showing a tremor of emotion. When offered a cigar by the sheriff, he took it, declaring that he would smoke it with the rope around his neck. The hanging took place in the open, just north of Goldendale, across the road from the graveyard. The victim rode to his execution on his own coffin and literally fulfilled his statement by smoking the cigar as he ascended the scaffold. Sheriff William VanVactor was in charge of the execution.

Two years afterward some malicious persons, for an unknown reason, removed the remains of Timmerman from the place where they had been deposited in the graveyard, and placing them in a sack, emptied them into the Little Klickitat. Here they were afterward found, and at the direction of the coroner returned to their former resting-place in the cemetery. The people were very much incensed at this act of brutality, and had the perpetrators of the deed been found, they would have been severely punished.

A glance at some figures exhibited in the report of the sheep commissioner for the year 1888 shows some surprising facts regarding the proportions to which the sheep industry had grown at this time. According to this report, there were at that time 86,000 sheep in the county, without taking into account the 63,000 head brought in from Oregon for summer pasture. During the year 20,000 head of mutton sheep were disposed of at an average price of $2 per head, netting $40,000, and 688,480 pounds of wool were marketed at ten cents per pound. In all, the sheep men of the county had received $118,480 for their year's product. This was an excellent showing, considering the fact that because of a measure passed by congress reducing the tariff on wool, that commodity had depreciated in price eight cents a pound as compared with the previous year.

During the year a destructive fire swept Goldendale, wiping almost the entire business portion of the city out of existence, and leaving the county without any courthouse. The one that had been constructed by private subscription was consumed in the fire. This laid upon the county the necessity of constructing a new building as soon as possible. The proposition to bond the county for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars to build a new courthouse and jail was referred to a vote of the people at the November election, but failed to carry by ten votes. The commissioners, therefore, the following year, let a contract for the construction of the present building, and since that time a jail has been erected at a cost approximating five thousand dollars. The county now has a commodious brick structure with courtroom and offices for the county officials, while under a separate roof is a neat, substantial jail. The two buildings cost, with furnishings, approximately twenty-five thousand dollars.

One encouraging feature of the year 1888 was the voting by the national congress of a new appropriation for the Cascade locks. Work had been going slowly forward for close to twelve years, and the locks were still incomplete. The grain raised in Klickitat county had increased from year to year until the revenue gained from that source had now become a very important element in the wealth of the country, but for lack of transportation facilities they had been placed at a disadvantage. The people of the valley had hoped that the completion of the O. R. & N. railroad line would furnish them a measure of relief, but they soon found that when placed at the mercy of any single line of transportation, they need expect little benefit, as the line could set its freight charges as high as its officials saw fit, and the people had no appeal from the exorbitant rates demanded, which were always a large measure of the crop value.

The settlers of the valley had been hopefully looking forward to the opening of the river as a means of relief from excessive freight rates, but the government work had progressed so slowly that they were growing impatient, as just stated. The friends of the enterprise succeeded in obtaining an appropriation during the year 1888 which it was hoped would prove sufficient for the completion of the work, and the Klickitat farmers were again rejoiced with the prospect of an open river to The Dalles for the following year. They naturally could not foresee that the locks were not to be finished for nearly a decade yet.

But the country was growing in population and wealth, notwithstanding the fact that it was placed at a great disadvantage for want of speedy and cheap transportation. From the assessment rolls for the year 1889, it is observable that the following taxpayers of the county each paid taxes on the sum immediately succeeding his name: J. Scammon, $5,238; Sig. Sichel, $8,365; G. W. Smith, $12,991; B. E. Snipes, $8,000; Amos Stark, $5,000; Jehu Switzler, $8,986; Switzler Bros., $9,490; E. M. Thomas & Son, $8,700; O. D. and Rose Taylor, $5,498; G. W. Waldron, $6,250; W. B. Walker, $8,060; Northern Pacific Railroad Company, $268,812.

It is surprising when one comes to consider the vast elements of wealth and prosperity, the abundant natural resources which the state of Washington contains, that it was so long coming into public notice. Its magnificent harbors, extensive belts of the finest quality of timber, its rich mineral districts and fertile farm regions could not but proclaim a magnificent destiny for it. In 1889 an act was signed by the president which marked the beginning of a new era for the territory. The passage of the act admitting Washington to statehood gave inception to an epoch of rapid progress which has done much indeed in the development of the state's magnificent resources. Klickitat county, for a number of years, did not enjoy quite as rapid a development as did some of its sister counties, not because of any lack of resources, for it had already proven its power in grain and fruit production, but because of its isolation and lack of railroads. The struggle of its citizens to overcome this obstacle and to find an outlet for their products will receive due notice in the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.

Anticipated and eventually realized statehood and all other public considerations were transcended in the interest they awakened in Klickitat county during the year 1889, by a determined movement among the people for railroad facilities. Though the O. R. & N. was separated from the county's southern territory only by the Columbia river, and the Northern Pacific approached it so closely on the north, both were too far away to be directly beneficial to the richest portions of this naturally favored region, and neither had seen fit to construct a branch road into it. Thus, an enlightened and progressive people had the mortification of finding the much-desired steel pathways of commerce and communication "so near and yet so far." Early in 1889 they evidently concluded that this condition of affairs could be endured no longer. If help from without they could not have, they must depend upon themselves. Accordingly, the leading men of the community joined hands in a tremendous effort to construct unitedly a road from Goldendale to some point on the Northern Pacific. In issuing a call for the initial citizens' meeting with this end in view, the Sentinel used the following language, which is here quoted as showing the general sentiment of the people at this time:

"It has become evident that if the people of the county expect a railroad in the next few years, they must bestir themselves and do something toward inducing outside capital to take hold of it, or what might be better, organize, survey a route to a connection with the Northern Pacific east of here, secure the right of way, and proceed to the construction of the road ourselves. When it becomes evident that we mean business and will contribute liberally for the purpose of a railroad, we will have little difficulty in securing assistance from the outside. The whole upper country is becoming a network of railroads, and it is not because of the extraordinary amount of traffic that is assured, but the citizens have gone down into their pockets and have contributed liberal subsidies for the purpose, and the result is that property everywhere is advancing; it is even affecting us here in Goldendale.

"There is probably not a locality in the territory capable of producing a greater amount of traffic than would one through this country, and it only remains for us to set the ball rolling. Every man who owns one hundred and sixty acres north of the brow of the Columbia hills could well afford to give two hundred dollars, and there are many who could afford to give one thousand dollars simply as a bonus or double that amount in labor.

"From conversation with different ones of our citizens, we are satisfied now that all are ready for action in this direction, and to the end that we may put the most plausible scheme in motion that may be suggested, we recommend that a meeting of all hands be called at the armory hall in this city on Tuesday, March 1, 1889, at the hour of one P. M. We want everybody to come, and to come with some fixed plan of action to suggest and to come with a determination to do his entire part."

On the day previous to that set for the meeting, viz., on February 28th, about twenty of the leading citizens of Goldendale met in the A. O. U. W. hall and adopted articles of incorporation, their purpose being to construct and operate a railroad commencing at a point on the Columbia river between Kalama and Columbus and running in an easterly direction, crossing the Northern Pacific between North Yakima and Pasco; thence in a northeasterly direction to the vicinity of Colville. The capital stock was fixed at ten million dollars, divided into one hundred thousand shares, and most of those present subscribed according to the means at their command. The directors elected were D. W. Pierce, E. B. Wise, Sol. Smith, H. D. Young, R. O. Dunbar, William Cummings, J. J. Golden, Joseph Nesbitt and C. S. Reinhart, and the officers named by these were: R. O. Dunbar, president; E. B. Wise, vice-president; William Cummings, treasurer, and C. S. Reinhart, secretary.

At the popular meeting held next day an unusual amount of interest was manifested in the project, almost all subscribing to the capital stock of the new corporation, which was known as the Columbia Valley & Goldendale Railroad Company. A committee of directors addressed itself forthwith to securing the right of way and receiving subscriptions to the capital stock.

The work was pushed with energy. R. A. Habersham was given charge of the survey, and soon had made a preliminary reconnaissance of the line as far as Pasco. He reported having found no serious obstructions and that on no part of the road, as far as his survey extended, would there be a grade of more than one hundred feet to the mile, the maximum being at the head of Rock creek. On April 8th the Columbia Valley & Goldendale railroad effected a consolidation with a similar company which was being formed in Pasco by filing supplementary articles of incorporation. The name of the road was changed to the Pasco, Goldendale & Columbia Valley Railroad Company, and it was decided to push forward the further survey necessary at once. Commenting on the commencement of this work, the Oregonian of April 15th said: "Mr. R. A. Habersham leaves this morning to locate the line of the Columbia Valley & Goldendale railroad from Goldendale eastward to a junction with the Northern Pacific at Pasco, a distance of one hundred and ten miles. This section of the road passes through a belt of wheat lands, containing about fourteen hundred square miles, second to none on the northwest coast, and will also furnish an outlet to market for one hundred and twenty square miles of fine timber land on the ridge between the Columbia river and Yakima valleys. The extension of the road through that magnificent timber and mineral belt north of the Columbia, as contemplated by its projectors, makes it an enterprise of great importance. It is intended to begin the work of constructing the road as soon as the line is located and other preparations completed, as funds for the construction are already assured."

As laid out by Engineer Habersham, the route of the proposed road lay through a fine agricultural section for the first ten miles, then through an open yellow-pine forest to Bickleton via Cleveland, thirty miles; thence down the Glade into the Horse Heaven country, and from that through the branches of what is known as Badger canyon, through the Kennewick country and over the Northern Pacific bridge to Pasco.

But though the Pasco, Goldendale & Columbia Valley Railroad Company maintained its existence for some time and exerted itself to interest outside capital in its enterprise, making surveys and compiling statistics for the purpose, its road failed to materialize. The facts were that the undertaking was too large for local capitalists, and that it was impossible to convince outside men that the country was sufficiently developed to justify investment in the project. The people did not, however, abandon their efforts to secure a road, and hardly a year passed between that date and the building of the Columbia River & Northern without some railway project to keep up the hopes of the isolated inhabitants.

The pioneers of Klickitat county were doomed for more than the usual number of years to the usual struggle of pioneer peoples to secure the building of railroads and the larger developments incident thereto. Indeed, the country is yet without adequate facilities, though there seems to be no good reason why this condition should last much longer.

The railway proposition of 1890 was that of extending G. W. Hunt's Oregon & Washington railroad from its western terminus at Hunt's Junction to Portland. Mr. Hunt required, as a condition precedent to this, that the citizens along the route or in its terminal city should take at par two million dollars of the first mortgage bonds of the road, which were made payable January 1, 1930, and bore interest at six per cent. per annum. These bonds were to be taken and paid for at the rate of one hundred thousand dollars immediately on the completion of each ten miles of the extension, work to begin at Portland and proceed eastward. Should the people comply with the terms of this proposal, Mr. Hunt undertook to have the road completed and in operation on or before December 13, 1891.

Of course, this proposed extension of the Hunt system was of great interest to the Klickitat residents, as it would traverse their country from east to west. They were, therefore, greatly rejoiced when a despatch was received from Portland, dated April 8, 1890, stating that the Hunt subsidy was completed and that Mr. Hunt had been notified to go ahead with his road at once. Mr. Hunt did go ahead. Considerable surveying and preliminary work was done, but there the matter rested, and eventually the entire Hunt system passed into the hands of the Northern Pacific. Once more the hopes of the Klickitat people were disappointed, for though the assignees were expected to carry out the plans of Mr. Hunt, they have not thus far seen fit to do so.

The season of 1889 was one of very moderate harvests in Klickitat county, and the winter following it was so severe as to cause a heavy loss of both cattle and sheep. In its issue of March 6, 1890, the Sentinel remarked that the winter was still holding out in the Bickleton country and that the supply of hay was growing small, but that those who had some on hand were dividing with those who had none in an effort to reduce the loss to a minimum. As is usual, however, the stockman's misfortune was the agriculturist's gain, for the heavy snows of winter caused unusual crops of cereals next season. "One year ago," says the Courier of August 15, 1890, "the Klickitaters were groaning in sorrow; to-day they are singing pæans of joy. And why this great change? From a very light crop to the finest the world has ever seen! The crop of eastern Klickitat to-day beats the record ten-fold and the granger is again on top."

An incident of the fall of 1890, of some importance, was the exodus of citizens of Klickitat county to the vicinity of Mount Adams, caused by the finding of some rock in that region which assayed over three hundred and sixty dollars to the ton. J. J. Golden was the owner of the ore. As it was claimed that an abundance of the same kind of rock was obtainable, naturally considerable excitement resulted from it, especially as the region was but a short distance from the line surveyed by Hunt's engineers. But like many another excitement in the Northwest, it did not result in the discovery of anything of importance.

Of more vital moment to the future of Klickitat as of other parts of the country was the passage of a bill in congress declaring that "there is forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes title to all lands heretofore granted to any state or corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad," where such road was not then constructed and in operation. This act threw open for settlement and development thousands of acres in western Klickitat, though there was, of course, some earned railroad land in the eastern part of the county, owing to the proximity of the Northern Pacific's main line to that section.

Perhaps a copy of the assessor's summary for the year 1890 may be of interest as furnishing a general idea of the country's development at that time, and a basis of comparison with the present. It shows: Horses, mules and asses, 10,135, valued at $217,159; cattle, 9,755, valued at $128,478; sheep, 32,466, $62,983; hogs, 4,789, $9,383; wagons and carriages, 982, $28,374; sewing machines, 320, $3,197; watches, clocks, 154, $1,405; melodeons, organs, etc., 113, $3,820; piano fortes, 4, $240; agricultural implements valued at $19,870; goods, merchandise and lumber, valued at $32,595; improvements on public lands, $92,453; real estate assessed to individuals, 124,063 acres, valued at $2.06 per acre; assessed to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, 345,592, valued at 50 cents per acre. According to the United States census, the population of the county at this time was 5,167.

The season of 1891 appears to have been another prosperous one for farmers and fruit raisers. Notwithstanding the somewhat backward spring, crops and prices and general conditions were good. Abundant rain in the early part of July caused the wheat to fill well, improving its quality and enhancing its value to the purchaser and the price received by the farmer.

The year was one of quiet development. Little happened of a sensational character, except the exploitation of the celebrated North Dalles scheme which most of those who were residents of the Pacific coast states at the time will well remember. Briefly stated, the history of the case, compiled from official documents and other information furnished by J. T. Rorick, is as follows:

Rev. Orson D. Taylor was the originator and moving spirit of the scheme. He had come to The Dalles about 1880 as a Baptist missionary, and had taken charge of the church at that place. He soon came to be recognized as a man of unusual shrewdness and business talent. Late in the eighties he conceived his town-site project and began the acquisition of land lying opposite The Dalles, in the bend of the Columbia river. Here there is a tract of thousands of acres of low land, rocky in parts, excellent for grazing purposes in other portions, and in a few places arable. Across it and in the path of the strong winds blowing up the river, is a wide strip covered with sand dunes, eternally drifting. A town site in this territory would not be a natural outlet for any country except that in the immediate vicinity, a region perhaps ten by ten miles, some of it worthless and little of it valuable for anything but grazing.

Taylor first homesteaded a hundred and sixty acres at the Big Eddy, the foot of the rapids. He then bought seven hundred and twenty acres from Frank P. Taylor, of The Dalles, paying therefor ten dollars an acre; then he purchased one thousand and fifty acres from George B. Rowland for ten thousand five hundred dollars. By picking up three or four small tracts, he became, by 1890, the owner of over two thousand acres, lying in an irregular body east of the Rockland ferry landing. This land was heavily mortgaged to banks in The Dalles and to other money lenders.

July 5th, 1890, Taylor organized the Interstate Investment Company, capitalized at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, divided into shares of the par value of five thousand dollars each. He retained half of the stock himself. The remainder he sold in lots of one and two shares each, principally to Oregonians, though some of it was disposed of in the east. The Investment Company, of which Taylor was elected president and general manager, purchased the property of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, one-third cash, the remainder in two notes for fifty thousand dollars each. Then they platted the town of North Dalles and began operations. During the next four months the company sold about forty thousand dollars' worth of lots to people living in Oregon and Washington; over nine thousand dollars were realized from sales to persons in the vicinity of The Dalles and in Klickitat county. The plats of the property on exhibition at The Dalles and elsewhere were beautifully executed and showed a town site half by three-quarters of a mile in extent. A fine boulevard was pictured as extending along the river, and trolley lines traversed the principal streets and avenues of this city on paper. A beautiful park was also shown, the site of which is to-day marked by three desolate-looking trees. Three railroads were shown as actually constructed, the Hunt system down to Vancouver, the Northern Pacific along the north bank, and The Dalles, Klickitat & Northern, whose southern terminus was North Dalles. The line of the last-mentioned road followed the Klickitat river, the trifling circumstance that no road could both follow the river and terminate at North Dalles, the mouth of the stream being some nine miles from the town, apparently having been entirely overlooked by the map-makers. The plat also showed the proposed steamboat portage road terminating at North Dalles.

The pamphlet issued by the company vouchsafed the information that North Dalles was eighty miles from Portland and could be reached either by rail or by water, that it was self-evident that North Dalles was destined to rival its sister cities, Spokane, Tacoma and Seattle; that it "surpassed in natural products and location," and finally, that it was the "outlet of the wealthy Klickitat, Yakima and Kittitas country."

In March, 1891, the company watered its stock by organizing the Interstate Improvement Company, to which the Investment Company transferred its bond for a deed given by Taylor and wife, in consideration of notes for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars and stock in the new company. Four thousand five hundred shares of Improvement Company stock, of the par value of one hundred dollars each, were issued and placed on the eastern market. Taylor held three thousand shares as trustee and one in his own right, besides the notes for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The name of the town was changed to Grand Dalles. Taylor became general manager, also special sales agent, with a commission of twenty-five per cent. on lots sold and ten per cent. on stock. He secured as his confidential clerk and assistant salesman a Californian named S. L. Skeels, whom he had met in Spokane. Offices were opened at Cleveland, Ohio; Buffalo, New York, and Saginaw, Michigan, and within two years the sales of lots and Improvement Company stock aggregated one hundred and ninety thousand dollars. Skeels reported directly to Taylor, who himself made no reports for a long time, and when at last he was compelled to do so, submitted very unsatisfactory ones.

The Improvement Company, of which Rev. J. F. Ellis was president, issued a handsome descriptive pamphlet in 1891, the title page of which read: "Grand Dalles, the Imperial Gateway of Oregon, Washington and Idaho, Head of Ocean Navigation on the Columbia River."

"This booklet," said the preface, "is issued to answer such questions as naturally arise where investment is proposed.

"That the answer should be truthful and trustworthy, the company owning Grand Dalles hired a gentleman of ability to go upon the grounds and examine carefully the condition and surroundings, charging him particularly to write nothing that he could not verify either by his own observation, the testimony of witnesses or official facts and figures."

The old story of the town's greatness was retold, though the wording was carefully studied and displayed much ingenuity in arranging statements in themselves not far from the truth in such a way as to create a wholly false impression. When this could not be done, false statements were made without scruple. The Oregon & Washington Railroad Company was down on the map accompanying for a line along the Columbia. The Dalles, Goldendale & Northern went north over the Columbia river divide, which a mountain goat could hardly climb on the grade indicated; the Hunt railroad was still pictured, and the Portage road was also noted. A beautiful painting had been made of the country at that point, a fac-simile of which was shown in the booklet. In the picture a suspension bridge, proposed, was shown connecting The Dalles, Oregon, with Grand Dalles, though the only one who ever proposed such a structure was Taylor himself or his associates.

In 1891 Taylor organized a shoe company. The Improvement Company subscribed ten thousand dollars, very little of which was ever paid, while the others, citizens of Wasco and Klickitat counties, subscribed ten or twelve thousand dollars more, and an imposing three-story frame building with a high tower was erected on a lofty promontory facing the Columbia. Machinery was installed; for two or three weeks forty or fifty men were employed, and some good shoes were manufactured; then the creditors closed the business down. The lumber that went into the building was never paid for; neither was the machinery, and only a small part of the laborers' wages was ever paid. The experiment cost the people about fourteen thousand dollars. Its monument is a weather-beaten, empty old shell in Grand Dalles. A box factory was also erected at this time, which never produced anything of moment, and the building is now in use as a barn. But, notwithstanding the complete fiasco of the two enterprises, they resulted in the extensive advertising of the town and the sale of many lots. Taylor was a past master in the art of advertising.

In Saginaw, Taylor sold two shares of Investment Company stock to the man who ultimately caused his downfall and nearly landed him in prison. This man was Dr. Daniel B. Cornell, a well-known physician. Taylor also entered into a contract with Cornell for the sale to him of three hundred and fifteen lots for thirty-two thousand one hundred and sixty dollars, the agreement being that on payment of one-third the price, Cornell was to receive bonds for deeds, and upon payment of eighty-five per cent. full possession. Cornell was aiming to sell at an advance, but before he completed preliminaries and began operations, he discovered things concerning Taylor which caused him to draw back and the contract was never carried out.

In December, 1892, J. T. Rorick, of Michigan, the purchaser of one five thousand dollar share of stock, came out to start a paper at Grand Dalles. Cornell also came out to investigate, and he and Rorick together began an inquiry. Finding that Taylor had made no reports, they cornered Skeels at Buffalo, put him in the "sweat box" and forced from him damaging confessions. Skeels blamed Taylor for everything that was wrong, excusing himself on the ground that he was only an employee, and turned over all the evidence he possessed. Later Skeels addressed the directors of the company and did all he could to straighten matters, claiming that formerly he had simply been following directions of his employer.

Cornell and Rorick succeeded in getting Taylor deposed from office in June, 1893. Going before the Multnomah county grand jury, they secured his indictment on about sixty different counts, charging embezzlement of fifty thousand dollars. However, after two years of waiting, the prosecuting attorney entered a nolle prosequi in the case, the only thing he could do because of a peculiar Oregon statute relating to embezzlement known as the "mingling fund" law.

Dr. Cornell, S. H. Blakely and Joseph Seaman, all well known Saginaw men who had subscribed Investment Company stock, thereupon made complaint in the circuit court of Saginaw county, charging Taylor with obtaining money under false pretenses. This was in 1895. At the same time the two companies began civil action to force Taylor to give an accounting, instituting litigation which did not terminate until January, 1902.

Taylor was arrested at The Dalles in July, 1895, by Detective Parker Owen, of the Saginaw police force, who, after a series of adventures, succeeded in landing his prisoner at Saginaw. In December, 1895, the case in which Cornell was complaining witness came up for trial before Judge Snow. Taylor's attorney raised technical objections touching the legality of the statute upon which the prosecution was based, and the matter had to go to the supreme court. Defendant's counsel secured an agreement on the part of all concerned to rest the Cornell case and carry up the Seaman case. This was done, and in a short time the supreme court ordered the circuit court to try the case. In December, 1896, by consent of all parties, the Cornell case was taken up, and Taylor was found guilty and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, to which body the appellants somehow made it appear that Taylor was a second time in jeopardy for the same offense when the conviction was secured, hence the court ordered the prisoner released. The prosecution, knowing that the other cases were much weaker than Cornell's, dropped everything, and Taylor went forth a free man. He beat his lawyers out of their fees and out of money borrowed from them, and they bitterly and unequivocally denounced him in the press as a criminal of the first water.

Between trials Taylor was liberated on a cash bond furnished by George H. Williams, of Oregon, his western attorney. After his first trial on the Cornell case, Taylor borrowed twenty thousand dollars, giving as security a property on Mill creek, in Oregon, which was mortgaged to Williams for its full value. The man who loaned the money had been present at the trial and heard all the evidence, yet he could not resist the subtle power of the gifted promoter. This mortgage was, however, discharged recently.

The only business building in the famous town of Grand Dalles at the present time is a postoffice. A drearier, more desolate-looking array of shacks and rock piles and sand cannot be found in the Northwest, though further back from the river is some fine grazing land. Perhaps not more than a score of people live in the immediate vicinity.

The year 1892 appears to have been one of activity and prosperity among the farmers and stockmen of the country. That those engaged in the lumber industry were not idle is evident from statistics compiled by the Puget Sound Lumberman, showing the output of Klickitat for the year as follows: D. W. Pierce & Son, 1,000,000 feet; John Hoggard & Son, 1,000,000; Leverett & Company, 500,000; O. P. Shurtz, 800,000; Warren & Company, 500,000; Beaverstock & Jones, 500,000; N. C. Norton, 400,000; Oto Sawmill Company, 4,000,000; Cameron & Company, 500,000; total, 9,600,000 feet. The same authority estimated the output of shingles as follows: M. S. Bishop, 2,000,000; Hale & Son, 1,300,000; Thompson Brothers, 1,550,000; Flekinger & Buckley, 2,100,000; Leverett & Company, 1,400,000; total, 8,350,000.

The most sensational occurrence of the year was the killing of William Dunn by John Green and the trial which grew out of it. The scene of the homicide was the Blockhouse settlement, seven miles northwest of Goldendale, and the date June 25th. It appears that the victim and his slayer had had a quarrel previously over some cattle which Dunn claimed that Green had stolen from him, and of course there was ill-feeling between them in consequence. On the fatal day Green and a companion named William Mehan were at John Cleaves' hotel at Blockhouse when Dunn rode up and began tying his horses to the hitching post just west of the house. Green, who was within, came out and said, railroads were shown as actually constructed, the Hunt system down to Vancouver, the Northern Pacific along the north bank, and The Dalles, Klickitat & Northern, whose southern terminus was North Dalles. The line of the last-mentioned road followed the Klickitat river, the trifling circumstance that no road could both follow the river and terminate at North Dalles, the mouth of the stream being some nine miles from the town, apparently having been entirely overlooked by the map-makers. In December, 1892, J. T. Rorick, of Michigan, the purchaser of one five thousand dollar share of stock, came out to start a paper at Grand Dalles. Cornell also came out to investigate, and he and Rorick together began an inquiry. Finding that Taylor had made no reports, they cornered Skeels at Buffalo, put him in the "sweat box" and forced from him damaging confessions. Skeels blamed Taylor for everything that was wrong, excusing himself on the ground that he was only an employee, and turned over all the evidence he possessed. Later Skeels addressed the directors of the company and did all he could to straighten matters, claiming that formerly he had simply been following directions of his employer.

Cornell and Rorick succeeded in getting Taylor deposed from office in June, 1893. Going before the Multnomah county grand jury, they secured his indictment on about sixty different counts, charging embezzlement of fifty thousand dollars. However, after two years of waiting, the prosecuting attorney entered a nolle prosequi in the case, the only thing he could do because of a peculiar Oregon statute relating to embezzlement known as the "mingling fund" law.

Dr. Cornell, S. H. Blakely and Joseph Seaman, all well known Saginaw men who had subscribed Investment Company stock, thereupon made complaint in the circuit court of Saginaw county, charging Taylor with obtaining money under false pretenses. This was in 1895. At the same time the two companies began civil action to force Taylor to give an accounting, instituting litigation which did not terminate until January, 1902.

Taylor was arrested at The Dalles in July, 1895, by Detective Parker Owen, of the Saginaw police force, who, after a series of adventures, succeeded in landing his prisoner at Saginaw. In December, 1895, the case in which Cornell was complaining witness came up for trial before Judge Snow. Taylor's attorney raised technical objections touching the legality of the statute upon which the prosecution was based, and the matter had to go to the supreme court. Defendant's counsel secured an agreement on the part of all concerned to rest the Cornell case and carry up the Seaman case. This was done, and in a short time the supreme court ordered the circuit court to try the case. In December, 1896, by consent of all parties, the Cornell case was taken up, and Taylor was found guilty and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, to which body the appellants somehow made it appear that Taylor was a second time in jeopardy for the same offense when the conviction was secured, hence the court ordered the prisoner released. The prosecution, knowing that the other cases were much weaker than Cornell's, dropped everything, and Taylor went forth a free man. He beat his lawyers out of their fees and out of money borrowed from them, and they bitterly and unequivocally denounced him in the press as a criminal of the first water.

Between trials Taylor was liberated on a cash bond furnished by George H. Williams, of Oregon, his western attorney. After his first trial on the Cornell case, Taylor borrowed twenty thousand dollars, giving as security a property on Mill creek, in Oregon, which was mortgaged to Williams for its full value. The man who loaned the money had been present at the trial and heard all the evidence, yet he could not resist the subtle power of the gifted promoter. This mortgage was, however, discharged recently.

The only business building in the famous town of Grand Dalles at the present time is a postoffice. A drearier, more desolate-looking array of shacks and rock piles and sand cannot be found in the Northwest, though further back from the river is some fine grazing land. Perhaps not more than a score of people live in the immediate vicinity.

The year 1892 appears to have been one of activity and prosperity among the farmers and stockmen of the country. That those engaged in the lumber industry were not idle is evident from statistics compiled by the Puget Sound Lumberman, showing the output of Klickitat for the year as follows: D. W. Pierce & Son, 1,000,000 feet; John Hoggard & Son, 1,000,000; Leverett & Company, 500,000; O. P. Shurtz, 800,000; Warren & Company, 500,000; Beaverstock & Jones, 500,000; N. C. Norton, 400,000; Oto Sawmill Company, 4,000,000; Cameron & Company, 500,000; total, 9,600,000 feet. The same authority estimated the output of shingles as follows: M. S. Bishop, 2,000,000; Hale & Son, 1,300,000; Thompson Brothers, 1,550,000; Flekinger & Buckley, 2,100,000; Leverett & Company, 1,400,000; total, 8,350,000.

The most sensational occurrence of the year was the killing of William Dunn by John Green and the trial which grew out of it. The scene of the homicide was the Blockhouse settlement, seven miles northwest of Goldendale, and the date June 25th. It appears that the victim and his slayer had had a quarrel previously over some cattle which Dunn claimed that Green had stolen from him, and of course there was ill-feeling between them in consequence. On the fatal day Green and a companion named William Mehan were at John Cleaves' hotel at Blockhouse when Dunn rode up and began tying his horses to the hitching post just west of the house. Green, who was within, came out and said, from Goldendale, a specimen was found which assayed one hundred and ten dollars in the precious metals. Soon the whole mountain was located by Goldendale people, and as there were many other mountains in the vicinity of similar formation, it was hoped that something of great value might be found. Several men worked for a time on the VanVactor, Baker, Tenderfoot and other claims, but during the early days of March it was found that while an occasional rich piece of ore could be found, the average of value was low, too low to pay, and operations were soon suspended.

The promise of better times given by the upward tendency of wheat during the fall of 1896 was fully realized the following year. During the hard times many farmers had become involved to such an extent that they were about to lose their places. Not a few of them were comparatively new settlers and ill-prepared for a period of low prices and dull markets, hence their serious financial embarrassment. The stimulating effect of the combined good crops and good prices during 1897 may well be imagined. Early in July reports began coming in from the No. 6 country, the country above Hartland, the Centerville country, the Bickleton country and all other parts of Klickitat county where wheat was raised, stating that larger yields would be had than for years before. The price at that time was sixty cents, and as time went on it rose rapidly. It is said that the wheat yield in some instances sold for as much as the land upon which it was raised was considered to be worth. "Klickitat farmers, sheepmen, merchants and everybody," says the Agriculturist of November 13th, "are enjoying the wave of prosperity. Men who one year ago were gloomy and morose and who saw no prospect of saving their homes, are now jubilant and can now see their way clear to get out of debt and have something left. There has been more building done this fall than for a long time before. New houses, new barns and other substantial improvements are to be seen in every part of the country, and instead of mortgages being recorded, they are being cancelled. Sixteen have been cancelled during October."

The farmers also realized not a little revenue from potatoes and other vegetables, the prices for which were much in advance of those quoted the previous year. Sheep went from one dollar a head in 1896 to three dollars in 1897, and the price of cattle also materially increased. All other classes enjoyed the benefits of the farmers' and stockmen's good fortunes; indeed, the eastern country was suddenly lifted from the depths of depression and despondency to the heights of prosperity.

In the year 1897 a cause of unusual importance came on for trial in the superior court of Klickitat county. Upon the decision finally rendered depended the title to some two hundred and thirty thousand acres of land in Oregon and Washington, so that the progress of the trial elicited not a little general interest. The case was that of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Alcana Miller, George Miller, C. N. Bickle and J. C. Sigler for the ejection of the defendants from lands held by them under United States patents. June 2, 1864, an act of congress was passed "granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, by the northern route." June 26, 1870, the company filed maps of general location with the secretary of the interior showing two proposed roads extending westward from Pasco, a main line through Yakima and Kittitas counties and on to the sound, and a branch down the Columbia to Portland. In accordance with the provisions of the granting act, withdrawals of alternate sections for a distance of forty miles on each side of the proposed roads from settlement were made by the secretary of the interior, but the roads for a part of their course being less than eighty miles apart, the grants necessarily overlapped each other.

September 29, 1890, a forfeiture act was passed providing that all the land to which the company had not made good its title by the construction of the roads in aid of which such land was granted should revert to the government. The Northern Pacific had completed its line to the sound, but had failed utterly to construct the line down the Columbia river, hence all lands contiguous to the latter road were lost to it by operation of the forfeiture law. Naturally, the question arose whether the alternate sections which were within forty miles of both roads should be considered earned by the building of the Puget sound line or forfeited on account of the failure to build the Columbia river line. It was understood by the department of the interior that as the two grants were made simultaneously, the territory where they overlapped was covered equally by both grants and the title to all of it could not be perfected without the building of both lines. Half the odd numbered sections of land was therefore thrown open for settlement, and the four defendants in the case under consideration filed upon and eventually received their patents for a section of it. Then came the railroad company and sought to have the owners of the land ejected, notwithstanding their patents, claiming that the land was its property, earned by the building of the road through the Yakima valley, and that the United States had no right to grant patents thereto. In the trial the company was represented by Stall, Stephens, Bunn & McDonald, while Nelson E. Brooks, of Goldendale, appeared for the defense.

The land in dispute, though at present a portion of the town site of Bickleton, was not then of sufficient value to admit of a trial of the cause in the federal courts, so the superior court of Klickitat county was resorted to. Attorney Brooks, on behalf of the defendants, contended for the correctness of the view of the department of the interior that only half of the odd sections of right belonged to the railroad company. He was successful in the lower court, Judge Miller rendering a decision in his favor September 5, 1897. The case was appealed to the supreme court of the state. On the 4th of October, 1898, an opinion was handed down by Justice J. B. Keavis and concurred in by Justices Elmon Scott, R. O. Dunbar, T. J. Anders and M. J. Gordon, affirming the decision of the lower court and sustaining Attorney Brooks. The railroad company accepted this decision as final, and never attempted to establish its claim to the remainder of the two hundred and thirty thousand acres similarly situated with reference to its constructed and projected lines or any part of it.

For the immense service rendered the people of Oregon and Washington, Attorney Brooks never received any compensation whatever, not even all of his expenses, as the persons immediately concerned were not financially able to pay a reasonable fee. His only reward for the months of labor expended on the case was the approval of his fellow-citizens and the consciousness of a good work well done.

The events in our nation's history which made the year 1898 one of transcendent importance in the affairs of this land and the world were watched with intense interest in Klickitat county as elsewhere. In no section of the state were the youth more ready to take part in the war, and that the county was not represented by an enthusiastic and courageous military company was in no wise due to a lack of patriotism. Unfortunately, old Company B had been mustered out and abandoned long before the outbreak of hostilities, and as the first call was for militiamen alone, there was no show under it for the Klickitat boys. But on Wednesday, May 18th, instructions were received by Captain H. C. Phillips to enlist a company of volunteers and have them in readiness for response to the next call. Thursday, June 2d, the organization of this company was effected by the election of H. C. Phillips, captain, and Nelson B. Brooks and H. C. Hodgson, first and second lieutenants, respectively. This done, a petition was sent forthwith requesting that the company be mustered into service in response to the call which had just been issued. It was thought that inasmuch as the company was made up of ex-militiamen, it would be accepted among the first, but for some reason it was never given a place in the Washington regiment and had no part in the war.

During its earliest months the year 1899 promised greater things for Klickitat county than any in its previous history. A despatch sent to the Seattle Times in the latter part of January said: "The hope of a coming boom looms high before the vision of all Klickitat residents in the beginning of this gracious year. The expectation that a railroad will soon be built through this country is arousing activity in all lines of business. There are to be four new business firms established in this town as soon as store-room can be prepared for them, and all the businesses already operating are increasing their efforts along all lines. Many new settlers are coming into the county in search of homes, and farms that are changing owners are bringing good figures."

The cause of all this activity was the operations of the Columbia & Southern railway, which had taken hold with apparent earnestness of the project of building a road from Lyle to Goldendale. The terms upon which this company offered to build the road were explicitly set forth in a letter from its president, indited as follows:

WASCO, OREGON, January 21, 1899.

MR. W. F. BYARS, Goldendale, Washington.

Dear Sir: In reply to your letter of the 17th inst., beg to say that it is our intention to commence work on the Columbia & Klickitat railroad as soon as the survey is completed, provided, however, that the estimates we have already made as to cost of construction are not exceeded as shown by the survey, as the statistics of your country now in my possession will not admit of a greater outlay than our present estimate of cost of construction. Reports already received from our engineer would indicate that our estimate would not be exceeded, in which case the only donation I will ask from your people will be the right of way a hundred feet wide along the survey line with sufficient ground at each end of the road for terminal facilities, as well as two hundred feet wide by fifteen hundred feet long for side tracks and depot purposes wherever we might find it necessary to erect the same. This I believe is not asking too much at the hands of your people, considering the great advantages and enhanced valuation to be derived from the completion of such a line as we expect to give you.

It is my intention, if possible, to complete the line for this year's crops. I am pleased to know that you are interested in the enterprise, and any assistance you can give us will be highly appreciated and reciprocated by

Yours truly,

E. E. LYTLE.

Before the first of April the engineers were in the field, two parties of them, one operating between Lyle and the old Happy Home stage station; the other between that point and Goldendale. According to report of the Agriculturist of May 27th, ensuing, the surveying was approaching completion at that time. "The right of way," says the paper referred to, "is being given free in most cases, but it will be necessary to raise from five to eight thousand dollars before a free right of way can be furnished the company, as it will require this much to pay for lands for which the owners require compensation. Parties are now in the field soliciting contributions and report progress."

Little doubt was entertained that the rich Klickitat valley was to have a road this time, but the long-suffering citizens were to be disappointed again, notwithstanding they did, or showed a willingness to do, everything that President Lytle, of the Columbia & Southern railroad, demanded. The good faith of the company is not doubted, but it was prevented from carrying out its plans by the Northern Pacific, which claimed the territory north of the Columbia and was unwilling to have it invaded by another company. The failure of the Columbia & Southern did not greatly depress the Klickitat valley citizens, as all felt certain that the day was not far distant when the steel gladiators should be journeying up and down over their pathway of steel. Too many in different parts of the country had become interested in the proposed road to admit of its construction being much longer delayed.

But there was one railway project that did materialize in 1899, after many years of waiting. The story of Paul Mohr's famous portage railway at the Celilo rapids of the Columbia is one of the most interesting chapters of Klickitat county's history and extends over more than two decades of time.

Those familiar with Northwest history will remember, as heretofore stated on a preceding page, that in 1864 the government gave an immense land grant to any company that would build a railway from the mouth of Snake river down the Columbia to the sea, this line to be a section of a transcontinental road. However, it was not until 1870 that the Northern Pacific filed its map of general location for the transcontinental road, and not until 1881 that this corporation gave substantial evidence of its intention to build the Columbia river line. Work was begun at a point one mile below the village of Columbus on the north bank of the river. By reason of its rough topography, that point is a strategic one in railroad building, a fact which strengthened the Northern Pacific's desire to occupy it at once. The work of building the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company's line down the southern bank of the river was then in progress, and no doubt this was still another strong incentive to the Northern Pacific.

At a cost of several hundred thousand dollars, the Northern Pacific graded two miles of road-bed west of Columbus. One rock cut alone cost the company approximately two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. However, no steel was ever laid, and after six months' work the company decided to abandon, at least temporarily, the Columbia river branch and throw its energies into the construction of the Yakima line.

After the abandonment of the works at Columbus, they lay neglected until the year 1883, when Paul F. Mohr conceived his well-known scheme of building a portage railway alongside the Celilo rapids. He purposed building a line twenty-two miles long, utilizing the Northern Pacific's old right of way. Accordingly, he organized the Farmers' Railway, Navigation & Steamboat Portage Company, commonly called the Farmers' Transportation Company, composed principally of Spokane, Walla Walla and Portland capitalists. The corporation was capitalized at one million dollars. By operation of a statute forfeiting rights of way through government domain after their abandonment for a period of five years, the Northern Pacific's claim had lapsed, and the Farmers' Transportation Company soon secured possession of its old roadbed by filing location maps with the secretary of the interior, a thing permitted by act of congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

The Mohr company succeeded, in 1891, after many years of effort, in floating a small loan. It had in the meanwhile sold considerable stock and made several surveys. April 16, 1891, a mortgage in the sum of one million dollars was given the State Trust Company of New York, trustee, to cover a bond issue of the same amount. President A. M. Cannon and Secretary J. R. Allen signed the papers in behalf of the Transportation Company. As a matter of fact, President Cannon, of Spokane, also pledged himself personally to secure this loan. Although the mortgage called for a million dollars, only three hundred thousand dollars' worth of bonds were taken up; subsequently, the remainder were turned over to Mohr, who in turn transferred them to another as security. Perhaps, in all, the company realized between two hundred and fifty thousand and three hundred thousand dollars by the sale of its bonds and stock. Still but little was done toward building the road, except to survey and resurvey, grade a few miles, pay salaries and other minor expenses.

A reorganization of the company was effected July 5, 1899, by which the corporation's name was changed to the Columbia Railway & Navigation Company. The stockholders remained practically the same as formerly. The objects of the new corporation were set forth as being to build, operate and maintain a railroad from the mouth of the Columbia along the north bank to a point near the mouth of the Yakima river, thence by the most convenient and eligible route to a point at or near the mouth of the Okanogan river; also to build branch lines, a portage railway at Celilo rapids, telegraph lines, etc. The right of way for the portage road, the main objective of the company's energies, as approved by the secretary of the interior, was one hundred feet in width, and extended from a point in section twenty-eight, township two north, range thirteen east, in a generally easterly direction to a point in section four, township two north, range sixteen east, a distance of about twenty-two miles.

About the same time that this reorganization was effected, the stockholders also formed another corporation known as the Central Navigation & Construction Company, in both of which concerns Mohr had a controlling interest. November 25th of the year 1899, the construction company began active work upon the long-delayed project by letting a contract to Winters & Chapman, of Spokane, for the remainder of the grading. That firm immediately placed a large force at work, and by June 1, 1900, had graded nearly ten miles of the route, or to the Big Eddy, about three miles above The Dalles. This, with what had already been done at the eastern end, made a completed roadbed eighteen miles in length. W. D. Hofius & Company furnished the steel. Thus the portage railway was practically finished in the summer of 1900.

In the meanwhile, the company built two steamers—the Billings, above the rapids, the Klickitat, on the river below. The hull of the Billings was formerly the old Northern Pacific ferryboat at Ainsworth, which was fitted up in excellent condition at a cost of about twenty-five thousand dollars. The Billings, unfortunately, struck a rock while running between Arlington and Columbus and was wrecked. Subsequently the boat's machinery was placed in the Charles R. Spencer. The Klickitat was a little smaller than the Billings and cost twenty thousand dollars.

But, alas for human hopes! The Mohr portage railroad, so well conceived, so slow in growth, so promising in results, came to an untimely end in August, 1900, when liens were filed upon the property to collect material and labor debts aggregating fifty thousand dollars. Sixteen parties were represented in the suits, Winters & Chapman being the principal creditors. Two years later William Burgen, sheriff of Klickitat county, sold the property, into which hundreds of thousands of dollars had been placed, for the paltry sum of thirty-six thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars and eighty-eight cents, Winters & Chapman being compelled to take it to satisfy the judgment given them.

Subsequently they transferred the road to a Spokane man, whose name is withheld, but who is said by those informed to represent the Northern Pacific. Hofius & Company were allowed by the court to remove the rails. A dreary-looking, torn-up roadbed, slant in by rocks and covered with drifting sands, alone marks the course of the now historic Paul Mohr portage railway on the Columbia.

It may be asserted with safety that the year 1899 was at least an average one in general conditions. For some reason the wheat crop did not appear good before harvest, but most farmers were happily surprised when their grain was threshed. Some who did not expect more than thirteen or fourteen bushels to the acre received twenty-one, and in many parts the yield exceeded expectations by about a third. "One reason for not anticipating a usual yield," said the Agriculturist of September 22, 1899, "was that much of the grain was wilted at the tops of the heads. As it turned out, however, the average per acre of grain in the valley will be larger than for many years past."

But the year was not quite so kind to sheepmen, whose interests were threatened by the secretary of the interior in cancelling the permits that had been granted for the pasturing of two hundred and sixty thousand head of sheep upon the Cascade forest reserve. The order came as a startling surprise to all sheepmen, who thought the matter definitely settled by the authorities. As the range outside the reserve was limited in extent and almost destroyed, the order of the secretary seemed like a death-blow to the sheep industry, and many began preparing to go out of it, but fortunately, an effort to have the order rescinded had a successful issue. Sheepmen are still enjoying the splendid pasturage furnished by the reserve, though the matter of withdrawing the permits is discussed almost every year, and stockmen can have no assurance that their privileges will long continue.

The winter of 1899-1900 was an exceedingly mild one, and the grass grew green on the upland pastures most of the time. In February it was reported that fall wheat was so far forward that some farmers were preparing to mow it to prevent its jointing, but this was probably an exaggeration. Buyers were vainly offering four dollars and fifty cents a head for mutton sheep, and wool-growers were steadily refusing to contract their spring clip at prices offered, nineteen to twenty-eight cents a pound, nor would the farmers and stockmen accept offers of twenty dollars each for calves not yet a year old. All classes were prosperous. Money was plentiful, and the year 1900, with good crops, good prices and ready markets, was in every way suited to add to the general cheer.

But the year's record was marred by a serious tragedy in Klickitat county—a murder and suicide at Trout Lake. The cause of this unfortunate affair was the old, old one of unreciprocated love. The principals were Ida Foss, a school teacher, the victim of the murder, and Benjamin Wagnitz, the murderer and suicide. Coroner Hart, who was called to the scene, reported the facts, or supposed facts, of the case substantially as follows: Miss Foss, who was teacher of the district school, was boarding in the Wagnitz house, in which were Mrs. Wagnitz, whose husband lived in Portland, and her two sons, Benjamin and August. On the evening of the fatal day, Sunday, May 22d, County Superintendent C. L. Colburn and his wife met Benjamin Wagnitz and Miss Foss near the bridge crossing the outlet of Trout lake, and had a few minutes' conversation with them. They said that the young people both seemed happy and cheerful. After this meeting, Wagnitz and the young lady returned home. At the time of their arrival, the mother and son August were milking a short distance from the house. Hearing a loud scream and the report of a gun, they rushed home and soon saw Benjamin Wagnitz, gun in hand, leaning over the prostrate form of Miss Foss. The murderer called to his mother to come with water, but she was afraid to do so and went rather to a neighbor's house for assistance. As she left, she heard him exclaim: "Oh, what have I done! what have I done!" A few moments later a second shot was heard, and it was found on examination that both Wagnitz and his victim were dead. Miss Foss was shot in the back, the bullet passing through her right lung and entirely out of her body. Wagnitz had killed himself by placing the stock of his rifle on the ground and the muzzle against his heart, then touching the trigger with a small foot-rule. He was twenty-seven years old; his victim twenty-five. It is said that several times he had threatened the lives of his mother and brother, and that that was the reason why they were afraid to go near the prostrate girl at his solicitation.

Miss Foss was a very estimable young lady, highly accomplished and unusually proficient in her profession. Her home was in Hood River, Oregon. There is no likelihood that she ever reciprocated in the least the affections of Wagnitz, in whose company, however, she had been seen frequently, and it is known that she had returned the day before her death a number of letters written to her by Wagnitz during her absence from Trout Lake. Of the quarrel, which proved the immediate cause of her untimely taking off, nothing can be known, but it is surmised that an offer of marriage on his part had excited a declaration on her part that she would have nothing further to do with him.

While 1900 was in general a good year for the residents of Klickitat county, it was much surpassed by the succeeding twelvemonth. A splendid wheat crop caused much interest to center in the Horse Heaven country, partly in Klickitat and partly in Yakima county. One scheme for its exploitation that was in the air during the year 1901 was the old project of carrying the waters of the Klickitat river over it and thus increasing many fold by irrigation its productive capacity. A survey had been made with this for its object in 1892, and, it is claimed, the practicability of the scheme was then fully demonstrated. One of the moving forces in creating a desire for water for irrigation was the dry placer gold deposits above Cleveland, which had long been neglected on account of the absence of water wherewith to wash the rich gravels. The canal did not materialize, doubtless because of the immense amount of capital required, but it is still in project, and many think that some day it will be an accomplished fact. Its effect, should it ever be successfully completed, can hardly be even dimly foreseen at this date.

The great enterprise of the year 1902 was the building of the Columbia River & Northern railroad, connecting Goldendale with Lyle on the Columbia. As heretofore stated, the securing of this road had been a favorite project of the Klickitat people for many years, and when a company organized in Portland for the purpose of supplying the great desideratum, it found them more than willing to co-operate with it. From the inception of the enterprise to its conclusion, the Klickitat residents manifested a deep interest, as did also many of the Portland people and the newspapers of that city. Klickitat valley was undoubtedly indebted for the securing of her road to the earnest wish of Portland to draw the trade of this rich region unto itself.

The Columbia River & Northern began surveying in March, 1902, placing two parties of engineers in the field. Lytle Simmons, superintendent of construction, announced that it was his intention to push operations with vigor and to have the road in shape, if at all possible, to handle a large part of the fall traffic. During the latter part of May, Axtel Anderson was awarded the contract for the construction of the first fifteen miles out from Goldendale, and on the 10th of June, Corey Brothers & Alden entered into a contract with the railroad company to build the road between Lyle and Swale canyon. On that day also Axtel Anderson's bid for constructing the two and a half miles between the terminus of his fifteen-mile section and the head of Swale canyon was accepted, so that the building of the entire road was provided for. The contracts required the completion of the work by December 1st. There was no vexatious delay, no hope deferred. In the latter part of September the Oregonian reported that of the entire forty-two miles, twenty-five had been graded and considerable of the remainder was graded in part, requiring only some finishing touches. "Rock work in cuts and fills," continued the paper, "is now keeping the construction gangs busy. A large shipment of rails has been received from Hamburg, Germany, and the work of track-laying will be commenced in a few days. General Manager H. C. Campbell yesterday received information that the equipment for the road will leave Chicago this week. The equipment will consist of two locomotives, two passenger coaches, fifty-five freight cars, which will be sufficient for the needs of the road for the next few years. Mr. Campbell is also informed that three grain warehouses, sixty by one hundred and fifty feet, have been constructed along the line of the railroad, and that one of these will be enlarged to meet the needs of the business tributary to it.

The 7th of December, 1902, is a day long to be remembered in Klickitat county, for upon it the first locomotive ever landed within the borders of the county began its work. It had just been transferred across the Columbia along with a steam shovel and thirty-two cars. As the river was rising rapidly and endangering the rolling stock close to its edge, it was thought best by Manager Campbell to get the cars out of harm's way at once. Accordingly, the engine crew were instructed to steam up, and soon the hills resounded with the unwonted music of a locomotive whistle. It must have been a heartening sound to the Klickitat people who heard it, for it conveyed to their ears in eloquent language the promise of a larger development, a higher and more modern civilization for the fair land in which they had cast their lot. At this time, only two miles of track had been laid, but it was the intention to push to a rapid completion the work of placing the remaining steel rails. By the middle of April the road was finished to Centerville, and on the 25th it reached Goldendale, its present terminus.

"At 10:30 this morning," wrote an Oregonian correspondent, "the last spike in the main line of the Columbia River & Northern railroad was driven. This honor did not fall to John J. Golden, whose turn will come later, but instead a swarthy son of Italy with a few sharp blows put the spike in position. While the construction train had reached the city limits yesterday, the crew was not able to complete the work that day owing to the lack of material.

"To-day the last mile of track was laid, and laid quickly, as by the middle of the forenoon the track was finished. A vast crowd of sight-seers was on hand early, and by ten o'clock fully half the population of the city was present. It was a spectacle never to be forgotten by the residents of Goldendale, after years of patient waiting, during which time many railroad schemes have been industriously worked only to end in dismal failure. A full-fledged railroad was now complete to the city and Goldendale placed in easy communication with the outside world.

"No regular train service can be established as yet, as for some weeks to come it will be in the hands of the construction department. There is a vast amount of labor yet in sight. The major portion of the track has yet to be ballasted, leveled and adjusted for fast and heavy traffic. There are no terminal buildings erected here as yet, nor at any other point on the line except at Lyle. It will probably be two months before a regular passenger schedule can be put in operation.

"Official advisors to Honorable N. B. Brooks, the local attorney of the company, are to the effect that on or about June 1st the management of the Columbia River & Northern railroad will run an excursion train to this city, at which time the big jubilee celebration over the completion of the road will come off. Local parties here are going to make it the greatest time in the history of Klickitat county. There will be something doing on that occasion sure.

"Immediately after the workmen had completed their labors, they were royally entertained with a fine luncheon and plenty of refreshments. The city's hospitality was open-handed and nothing was considered too good for a hard-working construction gang.

"So, on the 25th day of April, 1903, a new era opened up in the history of this county. The citizens of Goldendale are in joyous mood tonight, and congratulations are the order of the hour. The greatest meed of praise is extended to the Portland capitalists who financed the enterprise, and above all are highly flattering encomiums showered upon Manager H. C. Campbell, who promised a railroad here on the day of his first entrance into Klickitat, and has labored incessantly toward that purpose from that day forward. Nor was the Oregonian ignored, for to its valuable and timely co-operation is due a large measure of the success."

Thursday, April 30th, the first shipment of wheat by rail was made from the Klickitat valley, the consignment being four large carloads from the Centerville station. It was the beginning of much activity in this direction, for fortune had been smiling upon the farmers of the county, and the warehouses were bursting with grain for export. Wheat buyers estimated that there were between eight and ten thousand tons of grain stored along the new road, and a large amount of other traffic was eagerly awaiting the completion of the ballasting, which, in April, 1903, was being pushed with zeal.

The effect of the railroad in inducing immigration may be seen in the appropriation of public lands within the county by homeseekers. From 1900 to 1901 only 13,306 acres were taken for homes under the United States land laws. From 1901 to 1902, 19,629 acres were homesteaded, and in the succeeding year the acreage claimed by homeseekers jumped to 60,160. The population of the county in 1900, according to the United States census, was 6,407. The count by precincts was: Bickleton, 482; Camas Prairie, 396; Canyon, 46; Cedar Valley, 76; Centerville, 621; Cleveland, 350; Columbus, 212; Dot, 305; Gaunt, 29; Goldendale, co-extensive with Goldendale City, 738; Lyle, 150; No. 4, 553; No. 6, 258; Pine Forest, 337; Pleasant Valley, 169; Rockland, 161; Sand Springs, 111; Spring Creek, 377; Timber Valley, 118; Trout Lake, 152; White Salmon, 458. In 1903 the population of the county was reported by the bulletin of the state bureau of statistics as 8,788.

CHAPTER III.

POLITICAL.

Although the territorial assembly of Washington created Klickitat county as early as the year 1859, yet for many years a majority of the people living within the prescribed boundaries were opposed to the acceptance of the privilege granted them. The result was that all attempts at effective organization of the county's government previous to 1867 were unsuccessful. The first real, permanent, recognized organization came through the legislative act of January 28th of that year. The temporary officers appointed by the legislative assembly to serve until the first succeeding election were: Commissioners, August Schuster, Amos Stark and H. M. McNary; auditor, Thomas Johnson; treasurer, William Connell; probate judge, James Taylor.

The board of commissioners held its first session, a special one, March 8, 1867, in William Connell's house at Rockland, the temporary county seat. At this meeting Stanton H. Jones was appointed assessor. As required by the provisions of the act, the board convened at the same place in first regular session, May 6, 1867, and formally organized by electing Amos Stark chairman. Arrangements were at once entered into between the commissioners and Connell for the use of his building as a courthouse, the rent being fixed at practically twenty-five dollars a quarter; this building was used as Klickitat county's courthouse until the county seat was removed to Goldendale. After making a tax levy of fourteen and a half mills, eight of which were for county, three and a half for territorial, and three for school purposes, the board proceeded to prepare for the county's first election.

Three precincts were laid out as follows: "No. 1, Rockland—Commencing on the Columbia at the beginning of the western boundary; thence north six miles along said line; thence east along the summit of The Dalles and Klickitat mountains to a point north of Celilo; thence south to the middle of the Columbia river and down said river channel to place of beginning; No. 2, Klickitat Creek—Includes the Klickitat valley; No. 3, Columbus—All that portion above the landing opposite Celilo between the Columbia river and Klickitat mountains." S. Peasley and August Schuster were appointed judges of Rockland precinct to serve at the June election; A. F. Curtis, inspector; J. C. Mason's house was designated as the polling-place in Klickitat Creek precinct, G. W. Helm and J. C. Mason were appointed judges, and J. R. Bennett inspector; while T. Johnson and R. Wallace were appointed judges, and W. Helm inspector, for Columbus precinct. Just previous to election day, Commissioner Schuster resigned to accept the appointment of sheriff—an office whose duties he administered with commendable zeal and fidelity until 1880. His service dated from May 6, 1867.

The county's first regular election was held in June, 1867, and herewith are presented the official returns, obtained from the original records on file in the office of the secretary of state at Olympia.

Delegate to congress, Alvin Flanders, 38 votes, Frank Clark, 13; joint councilman, A. G. Tripp, 39, representing Yakima, Klickitat, Clarke and Skamania counties; joint representative for Yakima and Klickitat counties, William Taylor (elected), 59, F. Mortimer Thorp, 27; district attorney, H. G. Struve, 38; probate judge, J. C. Murdy, 38; county commissioners, Thomas J. Chambers, 45, Amos Stark, 38, H. M. McNary, 39; auditor, Thomas Johnson, 38; sheriff, August Schuster, 43; assessor, S. H. Jones, 38; treasurer, William Connell, 38; school superintendent, John Burgen, 14, Watson Helm, 13, Walter Helm, 13; coroner, A. M. Bunnell, 28.

In those early years county organization was regarded more in a humorous than in a serious light. Men who would serve the county as officials were rare enough, and when any were found willing to do so, little attention was paid to their party affiliations. As a general rule, however, Klickitat's pioneer officeholders were Democrats.

The records show that May 4, 1868, T. J. Chambers, commissioner, resigned; he was succeeded by J. R. Bennett. The same day A. H. Simmons was appointed by the board as probate judge, vice J. C. Murdy, resigned. Another interesting feature of this meeting was the action taken on the establishment of the pioneer county road. Up to that time there had been no effort made as a county looking to the building of roads, what few highways there were having been constructed by individuals or the government. There were, however, two good roads, one down to the Cascades and the other the Simcoe military road. But the desire for a good transportation route into the Yakima valley, whose people were in early years so intimately connected with those of Klickitat, became so strong that upon the date heretofore mentioned the board appointed William Taylor, John Burgen and John Johnson as commissioners to locate two territorial roads. Both were to terminate at Rockland, opposite The Dalles. One was to follow the northern shore of the Columbia to a point opposite Umatilla, Oregon; the other was to extend to Cock's ferry, in the Yakima valley, by way of the canyon. The following August the roads were officially established. The next county road to be established was a branch one, located in 1869, from Columbus to an intersection with the Yakima road. Josh Brown, A. M. Bunnell and William Dunn located this road.

It is also interesting to note the granting of the first ferry license. February 1, 1869, the board granted to Thomas J. and James Jenkins, brothers, the privilege of operating a ferry on the Columbia at a point one and a half miles above Columbus. The board fixed the following rates: Footman, 25 cents; man and horse, $1; loose animals, 50 cents each; wagon and span of horses or yoke of cattle, $3; each additional span, $1; sheep and hogs, each 15 cents; freight, per ton, $1.25; wood, per cord, $1.25; lumber, per thousand feet, $1.50.

Previous to holding the next election, June 7, 1869, two new precincts were formed—Yakima and Simcoe—the latter including the reservation. At that date there seems to have been an understanding prevalent in this county that the whole Yakima reservation was embraced in Klickitat's boundaries. An attempt was even made to collect taxes of the whites living at the agency. For a time there was a hot dispute between Yakima and Klickitat as to which county possessed the agency at Fort Simcoe. A year later the petition of E. S. Joslyn and twelve others for the erection of a precinct on the river below Rockland was granted, and in May, 1870, Fifteen-Mile or White Salmon precinct, with polls at William Gilmore's home, came into existence.

There are no records on file in Klickitat county showing the returns for any election previous to that of 1902. This condition of affairs has necessitated the gathering of most of the information desired about the early elections from the state offices, and about the later ones from the newspapers. The results of the earliest elections are herewith given in their chronological order, in as complete form as possible to obtain.

June 7, 1869: For delegate, Salucius Garfield, 59, M. F. Moore, 18; joint representative, H. D. Cooke, 57, F. M. Thorp, 11, scattering 2; district attorney, A. G. Cook, 57, Richard Lane, 15; joint councilman, Chancy Goodnoe, 60, H. M.

McNary, 44, John Burgen, 41, J. H. Alexander, 28, Thomas Johnson, 22, E. S. Joslyn, 5; probate judge, William Taylor, 59, G. Chamberlin, 1; auditor, M. V. Harper, 71; sheriff, A. Schuster, 52, George Rowland, 1; assessor, A. Schuster, 50, Levi Armsworthy, 4; treasurer, William Hicinbotham, 45; superintendent of schools, Thomas Johnson, 39, J. H. Wilbur, 1; coroner, John Bartol, 1, Joshua Brown, 1. J. H. Alexander was appointed probate judge by the commissioners June 20, 1870.

June 6, 1870: For delegate, L. D. Mix, 32, Salucius Garfield, 65; joint councilman, E. S. Joslyn, 55, S. R. Curtis, 32; joint representative, Henry D. Cooke, 52, M. V. Harper, 34; district attorney, A. G. Cook, 62, Richard Lane, 30; probate judge, William Taylor, 48, L. J. Kimberland, 30; county commissioners, James O. Lyle, 51, John Burgen, 49, Amos Stark, 46, Bolivar Walker, 34, Washington Ward, 32, Henry Allen, 32; auditor, Thomas Johnson, 41, M. V. Harper, 32; sheriff, August Schuster, 41, G. W. Rowland, 41 (Schuster secured the office in a cut-drawing contest); assessor, August Schuster, 41, G. W. Rowland, 36, C. A. Schuster, 1; treasurer, Thomas Connell, 49, C. A. Schuster, 30; school superintendent, G. W. Helm, 52.

November 3, 1872: For delegate, Salucius Garfield, 120, O. B. McFadden, 45; joint councilman, R. O. Dunbar, 121, B. F. Shaw, 41; representative, J. C. Cartwright, 56, N. Whitney, 69, C. P. Cooke, 35; district attorney, J. M. Fletcher, 120, W. S. Dodge, 33, C. C. Hewett, 8; probate judge, S. Gardner, 68, Merrill Short, 39, William Miller, 29; county commissioners, Stanton H. Jones, 98, J. O. Lyle, 69, J. A. Stout, 51, R. C. Wallace, 57, C. A. Schuster, 32, J. H. Alexander, 79, William Willits, 55, N. Newton, 32; sheriff, R. J. Gilmore, 51, August Schuster, 79, J. C. Story, 27; auditor, William Miller, 50, H. T. Levins, 70, M. V. Harper, 34; treasurer, A. C. Helm, 75, J. W. Parker, 70, E. Snipes, 12; school superintendent, J. A. Balch, 64, J. A. Burgen, 96; surveyor, E. Richardson, 79, F. M. Shick, 43. At this election the permanent location of the county seat was voted upon. Rockland received 78 votes; the new town of Goldendale 77. John J. Golden, of Goldendale, instituted a contest, through his attorney, J. C. Cartwright, over the vote on the county seat question, but at the February session of the county court, the case was dismissed on the grounds of no jurisdiction. Mr. Golden never carried the contest to a higher court. At this session, also, J. A. Balch was appointed probate judge to succeed Gardner.

November 3, 1874: For delegate, Orange Jacobs, 125, B. L. Sharpstein, 49; prosecuting attorney, second district, A. C. Bloomfield, 121, J. B. Judson, 46; joint councilman, S. P. McDondald, 117, B. F. Shaw, 43, F. D. Maxon, 6; joint representative, E. Richardson, 128, J. W. Brazee, 39; county commissioners, George Miller, 161, M. V. Harper, 48, S. M. Gilmore, 81, Nelson Whitney, 114, A. H. Curtis, 84; sheriff and assessor, R. W. Helm, 76, August Schuster, 87; probate judge, James A. Balch, 73, M. V. Harper, 80, scattering, 3; auditor, H. T. Levins, 111, W. H. Mahan, 50; treasurer, Thomas Connell, 161; superintendent of schools, P. E. Michell, 138, scattering, 14; coroner, John Graham, 165; surveyor, M. V. Harper, 151, R. M. Graham, 6, John Meir, 2. Commissioner Miller removed from his district in the summer of 1875, and John Graham was appointed in his stead.

November 7, 1876: For delegate, Orange Jacobs, 144, J. P. Judson, 68; prosecuting attorney, second judicial district, N. H. Bloomfield, 144, C. Lancaster, 52; joint councilman, M. R. Hathaway, 145, H. M. Knapp, 35, scattering, 16; joint representative, Nelson Whitney, 150, J. W. Braze, 43; county commissioners, W. B. Walker, 174, John Graham, 130, A. H. Curtis, 107, John Reavis, 78, scattering, 2; probate judge, S. M. Gilmore, 110, M. V. Harper, 85; sheriff, A. Schuster, 141, T. T. Foster, 63; auditor, H. T. Levins, 114, J. Nesbitt, 85; treasurer, Thomas Connell, 137, W. H. Mahan, 60; assessor, R. D. White, 109, J. C. Story, 88; surveyor, J. P. Crocker, 138, M. V. Harper, 7; coroner, John Keates, 78, John Graham, 60, M. V. Harper, 19, Ed. Snipes, 17, scattering, 6; superintendent of schools, P. E. Michell, 189; in favor of holding a constitutional convention, 24, against, 105. Thomas Connell left the county before his term expired, and the commissioners appointed W. A. McFarland to serve out the term.

By 1878 the rapid growth of the county had necessitated the formation of seven precincts—Rockland, Klickitat, Columbus, White Salmon, Spring Creek, Alder Creek and Camas Prairie. The rapid development of the Klickitat valley had caused the friends of Goldendale to aspire again to county seat honors, and they secured the passage of a bill through the legislature enabling them to test their strength. The bill was approved November 9, 1877, and provided for the submission of the question to the people at the next general election. Goldendale carried off the honors easily, securing far more than the necessary three-fifths vote required by law; the figures are not obtainable. Election day fell on November 5, 1878. The returns follow:

For delegate to congress, Thomas H. Brents, 394, N. T. Caton, 206; adjutant-general, A. Storer, 397, J. R. O'Dell, 196; brigadier-general, J. H. Smith, 394, George W. Hunter, 195; commissary-general, F. W. Sparling, 399, C. D. Emery, 129, O. F. Gerrish, 61; prosecuting attorney, second judicial district, N. H. Bloomfield, 395, J. P. Judson, 199; joint councilman, R. O. Dunbar, 350, Hiram Dustin, 255; joint representative, G. W. Waldron, 256, M. V. Harper, 315; county commissioners, A. H. Curtis, 177, J. R.

Short, 368, W. H. Mahan, 335, Noah Chapman, 410, D. D. McFall, 254, Hugh Adams, 216; probate judge, R. O. Dunbar, 381, William Barr, 205; sheriff, August Schuster, 296, I. Darland, 289; superintendent of schools, Sidney Brown, 422, H. Caldwell, 170; auditor, H. T. Levins, 416, C. J. Google, 170; treasurer, W. A. McFarland, 579; assessor, E. W. Pike, 307, Levi Darland, 278; surveyor, J. P. Crocker, 398, L. McAllister, 177; coroner, S. H. Miller, 380, Peter Cushen, 198; for the adoption of the Walla Walla constitution, 229, opposed, 101. McFarland failed to qualify as treasurer, and his place was filled, January 6, 1879, by the appointment of Thomas Johnson. In March, 1879, Auditor Levins died; he was succeeded by J. A. Stout. That spring, also, the records were removed from Rockland to the new courthouse in Goldendale, where the commissioners held their first meeting March 17th.

Until the establishment of the county seat at Goldendale and the erection of a courthouse there in 1879, all district court business was transacted at Vancouver, which was in the same judicial district. Be it said to the credit of pioneer Klickitat that there was little court business to transact—so little that it was deemed not worth while to bring judge and lawyers to the county. But with the rapid growth of the region during the later seventies, court sessions in the county became imperative, and May 10, 1880, Klickitat county's first term of court began at Goldendale. Judge John P. Hoyt, Clerk J. A. Stout, Prosecuting Attorney N. H. Bloomfield, Sheriff August Schuster and Bailiffs William H. Miller, A. P. Ward and W. C. Boyd were in attendance. James B. Reavis, at present justice of the state supreme court, was the first attorney to be admitted to the county bar. The session was only three days in length and devoid of especial interest.

When court was held in Vancouver, Klickitat county was accustomed to send two citizens there to serve as petit jurors and two as grand jurors, though very often there was no representation from here. Among those who served in the later sixties may be mentioned A. M. Bunnell and G. E. Cook, grand jurors, William Gilmore and Chancy Goodnoe, petit jurors, in 1868; John J. Golden and James O. Lyle, grand jurors, George W. Chapman and T. J. Chambers, petit jurors, in 1869. For many years it was customary to draw as jurors men who were compelled or wished to visit Vancouver on business. However, this was all done away with by the holding of court in the county.

The returns for the election held November 2, 1880, are incomplete, only the following being given: For delegate to congress, Thomas H. Brents, Republican, 492, Thomas Burke, Democrat, 360; adjutant-general, M. R. Hathaway, Republican, 544, Frank Guttenberg, Democrat, 302; brigadier-general, George W. Tibbits, Republican, 546. James McAuliff, Democrat, 300; commissary-general, A. K. Bush, Republican, 544; J. M. Hunt, Democrat, 305; quartermaster-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 543; J. W. Bomer, Democrat, 320; district attorney, N. H. Bloomfield, Republican, 318, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 513; probate judge, Thomas Johnson, Independent, 334, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 309, J. B. Reavis, Democrat, 191. The other county officers elected were: Auditor, George W. Filloon, Democrat; treasurer, George W. Miller; assessor, John Ostrander; sheriff, M. G. Wills; superintendent of schools, J. T. Eshelman, Democrat; surveyor, E. C. Richardson, Democrat; sheep commissioner, J. T. Butler, Democrat; county commissioners, R. M. Graham, Republican, S. W. Gardner.

The first Republican county convention, of which there is any newspaper record, was held in Goldendale, September 9, 1882. S. M. Gilmore presided, Sig. Sichel acted as secretary, and Nelson Brooks as assistant secretary. W. L. Ames, F. P. Taylor, R. O. Dunbar, S. W. Gardner, S. Witkowski and S. M. Gilmore were chosen as delegates to the territorial convention. The platform adopted concerned itself principally with national issues. The Democrats met on the 30th of September. The vote cast at the election ensuing was as follows:

For delegate, Thomas H. Brents, Republican, 570, Thomas Burke, Democrat, 299; brigadier-general, Samuel Vinson, Democrat, 314, M. McPherson, Republican, 552; adjutant-general, L. L. Debeau, Democrat, 316, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 550; quartermaster-general, J. W. Bomer, Democrat, 317, J. H. Smith, Republican, 548; commissary-general, W. A. Wash, Democrat, 296, C. B. Hopkins, Republican, 546; joint councilman, Clarke, Skamania and Klickitat, P. H. Harper, Democrat, 330 (elected), T. Moffatt, Republican, 509; joint representative, same counties, J. B. Landrum, Democrat, 612, N. H. Bloomfield, 236; representative, W. D. Smith, Democrat, 291, Nelson B. Brooks, Republican, 494, J. M. Marble, Independent, 60; prosecuting attorney, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 721 (elected), D. P. Ballard, 113; sheriff, E. B. Wise, Republican, 379, R. D. White, Democrat, 313, August Schuster, Independent, 175; treasurer, Sig. Sichel, Republican, 383, J. T. Eshelman, Democrat, 469; auditor, W. L. Ames, Republican, 250, G. W. Filloon, Democrat, 610; probate judge, W. R. Dunbar, Republican, 572; commissioners, first district, J. T. Lucas, Republican, 445, M. Thompson, Democrat, 407; third district, J. A. Stout, Republican, 479, D. B. Gaunt, Democrat, 373; sheep commissioner, J. W. Jackson, Republican, 513, J. T. Butler, Democrat, 348; superintendent of schools, Mrs. Corwin K. Seitz, Republican, 340, W. R. Neal, Democrat, 500; surveyor, S. B. Stone, Republican, 498, E. C. Richardson, Democrat, 337; coroner, S. H.

Miller, Republican, 506, Dr. William Lee, Democrat, 348.

In 1884 the Republicans held their county convention October 16th, while the Democrats met two days later. The result in Klickitat of the election ensuing may be seen from the canvass of votes given below:

For delegate to congress, J. M. Armstrong, Republican, 537, C. S. Voorhees, Democrat, 781; brigadier-general, W. M. Peel, Republican, 812, James McAuliff, Democrat, 517; adjutant-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 816, William E. Anderson, 516; quartermaster-general, D. B. Jockso, Republican, 813, Frank Hons, Democrat, 519; commissary-general, H. W. Livingston, Republican, 800, Simon Berg, Democrat, 538; prosecuting attorney, Sol Smith, Republican, 464, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 838; joint councilman, Robert M. Graham, Republican, 480, W. R. Neal, Democrat, 813; joint representative, A. A. Lindsay, Republican, 802, D. E. Russell, Democrat, 524; representative, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 716, A. J. Pitman, Democrat, 591; sheriff, E. B. Wise, Republican, 771, William Van Vactor, Democrat, 542; auditor, R. W. Helm, Republican, 567, G. W. Filloon, Democrat, 753; probate judge, W. R. Dunbar, Republican, 895, C. A. Clausen, Democrat, 417; treasurer, Sig. Sichel, Republican, 510, J. T. Eshelman, Democrat, 782; assessor, Howard Averett, Republican, 743, Richard Chillcott, Democrat, 578; commissioners, first district, Jacob Hunsaker, Republican, 775, Marcus Vanbibber, Democrat, 542; second district, A. O. Wood, Republican, 865, Jarvis Emigh, Democrat, 446; superintendent of schools, Mrs. A. E. Rodman, Republican, 691, Dudley Eshelman, Democrat, 624; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 764, S. B. Stone, Democrat, 214; sheep commissioner, J. W. Jackson, Republican, 696, Thomas Butler, Democrat, 638; coroner, August Schuster, Republican, 797, D. E. Vernon, Democrat, 505.

The official returns for the election held November 2, 1886, are as given below:

For delegate to congress, Charles M. Bradshaw, Republican, 997, Charles S. Voorhees, Democrat, 720, W. A. Newell, 9; brigadier-general, George D. Hill, Republican, 1,065; adjutant-general, Ross G. O'Brien, Republican, 1,064; quartermaster-general, D. G. Lovell, Republican, 1,064; commissary-general, W. C. Ellsworth, Republican, 1,065; prosecuting attorney, N. H. Bloomfield, Republican, 911, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 794; joint councilman, R. T. Hawley, Republican, 1,054, J. H. Alexander, Democrat, 683; representative, R. W. Helm, Republican, 1,028, W. R. Neal, Democrat, 704, scattering, 2; auditor, Joseph Nesbitt, Republican 947, J. M. Pitman, Democrat, 791; sheriff, J. C. Moffatt, Republican, 658, William Van Vactor, Democrat, 1,071; treasurer, Justin Scammon, Republican, 871, J. T. Eshelman, Democrat, 866; probate judge, W. R. Dunbar, Republican, 1,209, W. D. Smith, Democrat, 521; commissioners, second district, A. J. Spoon, Republican, 979, D. G. Van Nostern, Democrat, 746; third district, Charles Curtis, Republican, 980, J. C. Jameson, Democrat, 762; school superintendent, Mrs. A. E. Rodman, Republican, 1,034, Miss Nellie E. Lyon, Democrat, 693; assessor, A. Howard, Republican, 995, J. T. Butler, Democrat, 731; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 1,080, Stone, Democrat, 11; coroner, S. H. Miller, Republican, 1,044, Josiah Beal, Democrat, 680.

Democrats met October 6th, in 1888; the Republican convention was held September 29th. The official vote cast at the election was as follows:

Delegate to congress, John B. Allen, Republican, 706, Charles S. Voorhees, Democrat, 365; brigadier-general, A. P. Curry, Republican, 695, H. S. Butler, Democrat, 391; adjutant-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 695, J. F. Mea, Democrat, 391; prosecuting attorney, A. L. Miller, Republican, 708, F. M. Geoghegan, Democrat, 392; joint councilman, Charles Brown, Republican, 639, George W. Stapleton, Democrat, 394; representative, C. S. Reinhart, Republican, 591, A. J. Pitman, Democrat, 503; auditor, Joseph Nesbitt, Republican, 750, W. J. Story, Democrat, 341; sheriff, A. L. Anderson, Republican, 520, William Van Vactor, Democrat, 571; treasurer, John Cummings, Republican, 577, W. H. Ward, Democrat, 524; probate judge, W. R. Dunbar, Republican, 734, W. R. Laidler, Democrat, 363; county commissioners, first district, G. W. French, Republican, 695, A. Bertschid, Democrat, 402; third district, D. Jorden, Republican, 534, B. N. White, Democrat, 485; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 675; coroner, Dr. A. Bonebrake, Republican, 739, W. H. Mears, Democrat, 344.

The entrance of Washington into statehood made necessary an extra election in 1889. It was held October 1st, and at it Klickitat cast the following vote:

For representative in congress, John L. Wilson, Republican, 689, T. C. Griffiths, Democrat, 375; governor, E. P. Ferry, Republican, 686, Eugene Semple, Democrat, 382; lieutenant-governor, Charles E. Loughton, Republican, 687, L. H. Plattor, Democrat, 379; secretary of state, Allen Weir, Republican, 691, W. H. Whittlesey, Democrat, 377; treasurer, A. A. Lindsley, Republican, 690, M. Kaufman, Democrat, 378; auditor, T. M. Reed, Republican, 689, J. M. Murphy, Democrat, 378; attorney-general, W. C. Jones, Republican, 690, H. J. Graves, Republican, 632 (elected), Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 431; state senator, Jacob Hunsaker, Republican, 661, G. W. Stapleton, Democrat, 387; state representatives, Bruce F. Purdy, Dr. H. Blair, Republicans, 700 and 600 votes respectively, G. W. McCredy and Peter Gunn, Democrats, 367 and 387 votes respectively; county clerk, R. E. Jackson, Republican, 684, W. R. Laidler, Democrat, 381; for the adoption of the constitution, 806, against adoption, 217; for woman suffrage, 483, against, 530; for prohibition, 554, against, 448; location state capital, North Yakima, 757, Olympia, 124, Ellensburg, 102, Yakima, 21.

The next year the Prohibitionists entered the local field of politics and made an excellent showing against the two older parties. The Republicans held their county convention October 4th, the Democrats met the same day; the Prohibitionists convened September 20th. The official canvass shows the following vote at the election:

Congressman, John L. Wilson, Republican, 591, Thomas Carroll, Democrat, 387, Robert Abernathy, Prohibitionist, 92; state representative, Jacob Hunsaker, Republican, 591, M. W. In 1892 the People's party was organized in Klickitat county, at a meeting held at Goldendale April 8th. Later a fusion was effected between the People's party and the Democrats in a convention held September 10th. The Republicans held their county convention July 30th. As this campaign was the first national campaign Washington had taken part in as a state, the greater struggle largely influenced local elections. A summary of Klickitat's vote is herewith presented:

For presidential electors, Republican, 614 votes, People's party, 367, Democratic, 281, Prohibitionist, 52; congressmen, John L. Wilson, W. H. Doolittle, Republicans, 589 and 586 votes respectively, Van Patten, M. F. Knox, People's party, 404 and 396 votes respectively, J. A. Munday, Thomas Carroll, Democrats, 248 and 245 votes respectively, C. E. Newberry, A. C. Dickinson, Prohibitionists, 49 and 50 votes respectively; governor, John McGraw, Republican, 557, C. W. Young, People's party, 411, Henry J. Snively, Democrat, 264, R. S. Greene, Prohibitionist, 72; lieutenant-governor, F. H. Luce, Republican, 573, C. P. Twiss, People's party, 406, H. C. Willison, Democrat, 252, D. G. Strong, Prohibitionist, 62; secretary of state, J. H. Price, Republican, 584, Lyman Wood, People's party, 412, J. McReavy, Democrat, 241, W. H. Gilstrap, Prohibitionist, 54; treasurer, O. A. Bowen, Republican, 583, W. C. P. Adams, People's party, 420, H. Clothier, Democrat, 237, G. W. Stewart, Prohibitionist, 53; auditor, L. R. Morgan, Democrat, 236, W. M. Heiney, Prohibitionist, 25; commissioner public lands, W. T. Forrest, Republican, 502, T. M. Callaway, People's party, 431, F. S. Lewis, Democrat, 226, R. M. Gibson, Prohibitionist, 51; state printer, O. C. White, Republican, 567, A. J. Murphy, People's party, 457, J. A. Borden, Democrat, 215, W. H. Boothroyd, Prohibitionist, 48; supreme judges, Elmon Scott, T. J. Anders, Republicans, 582 and 588 votes respectively, G. W. Gardiner, F. T. Reid, People's party, 392 and 402 votes respectively, E. K. Hanna, W. H. Brinker, Democrats, 258 and 242 votes respectively; superior judge, Solomon Smith, Republican, 592, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 541; state representative, D. W. Pierce, Republican, 623,

A. H. Jewett, Fusionist, 582; county attorney, W. B. Presby, Republican, 599; clerk, G. F. McKinney, Republican, 634, D. E. Brooks, Fusionist, 631; auditor, S. Bolton, Republican, 669, John Demsey, Fusionist, 633; sheriff, D. C. Macy, Republican, 638, D. W. Collins, Fusionist, 647 (contested and decision rendered in favor of Macy); commissioners, first district, H. D. Cole, Republican, 600, H. M. Trenner, Fusionist, 605; second district, I. B. Courtney, Republican, 597, J. J. Callaway, Fusionist, 645; third district, McD. Pierce, Republican, 625, E. E. Hinshaw, Fusionist, 634 (contested and decision given in favor of Pierce); treasurer, John Konig, Republican, 634, C. E. Morris, Fusionist, 645; assessor, J. T. Lucas, Republican, 607, John Smith, Fusionist, 679; superintendent of schools, C. M. Ryman, Republican, 681, Mrs. S. S. Long, Fusionist, 574; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 684, E. C. Richardson, Fusionist, 589; coroner, C. D. Wilcox, Republican, 624, H. D. Young, 635.

During the succeeding two years the fusion movement made such slow progress that in 1894 the People's and the Democratic parties discontinued their alliance. One of the most interesting features of the '94 election was the bonding question. The Republicans favored the refunding of the county's indebtedness; the adherents of the People's party element strongly opposed such action. When the votes were counted it was found that bonding had carried by a vote of 496 to 353. The Republicans met in convention September 8th. A week later the People's or Populist party held its convention, at which a platform was adopted containing this plank: "We condemn in unmeasured terms the incompetent and dishonest superior court of Klickitat county which has made a travesty on justice in blocking the wheels of economy and crushing the will of the people as expressed through the ballot. We pledge our candidates, if elected, to require no deputies at the county's expense so long as the salaries remain at their present standard; although this shall not be considered to refer to the necessary incidental expenses of the sheriff's office." The vote cast at the election is given below:

For congressmen, W. H. Doolittle, S. C. Hyde, Republicans, 746 and 719 votes respectively, B. F. Heuston, N. T. Caton, Democrats, 299 and 272 votes respectively, J. C. Van Patten, W. P. C. Adams, Populists, 238 and 221 votes respectively; justices supreme court, R. O. Dunbar, N. J. Gordon, Republicans, 758 and 688 votes respectively, B. L. Sharpstein, W. T. Forrest, Democrats, 282 and 230 votes respectively, Thomas N. Allen, J. M. Ready, Populists, 302 and 213 votes respectively; state senator, twelfth district, D. E. Lesh, Republican, 753, G. Tappor, Democrat, 432; representatives, L. W. Curtis, Republican, 723, W. R. Neil, Democrat, 331,

S. T. Shell, Populist, 261; sheriff, F. B. Stimson, Republican, 841, I. H. Ely, Democrat, 240; treasurer, A. C. Chapman, Republican, 611, W. H. Ward, Democrat, 516, D. F. Hartley, Populist, 196; auditor, H. C. Phillips, Republican, 696, William Van Vactor, Democrat, 401, S. H. Mason, Populist, 221; clerk, G. F. McKinney, Republican, 731, G. Hause, Democrat, 343, T. D. Adams, Populist, 232; county attorney, C. H. Spalding, Republican, 687, G. W. Maddock, Democrat, 484; assessor, J. E. Beeks, Republican, 591, J. K. Jarratt, Democrat, 510, A. Willard, Populist, 208; commissioners, second district, A. O. Woods, Republican, 203, C. Wherry, Democrat, 113, A. J. Long, 85; third district, Joseph Nesbitt, Republican, 302, J. M. Hess, Democrat, 197; superintendent of schools, C. M. Ryman, Republican, 698, C. S. Baker, Democrat, 339, Mrs. M. Reynolds, Populist, 265; surveyor, W. Jones, Republican, 735, C. Schutz, Democrat, 330, E. Y. Stone, Populist, 206; coroner, J. P. Nelson, Republican, 766, C. A. Schroeder, Democrat, 221, H. D. Young, Populist, 294.

The campaign of 1896 was fully as exciting in Klickitat county as elsewhere in the state. The silver issue predominated, concentrating all believers in free silver, irrespective of former party affiliations, into a fusion organization. This organization held its county convention Saturday, September 5th, and nominated a strong ticket upon a platform closely following that adopted by the Chicago convention. The Republicans held their county convention August 22d. A feature of local interest in their platform was a plank demanding a close quarantine of all sheep coming into the county in order that the spread of disease might be prevented. A summary of the county's vote at the election follows:

For presidential electors, Republican, 878, Fusionist, 664, Gold Democratic, 44, Prohibitionist, 14; congressmen, Samuel C. Hyde, W. H. Doolittle, Republicans, 871 and 870 votes respectively, James Hamilton Lewis, W. C. Jones, Fusionist, 669 and 665 votes respectively, C. A. Salyer, Martin Olsen, Prohibitionists, 10; governor, P. C. Sullivan, Republican, 864, John R. Rogers, Fusionist, 678, R. E. Dunlap, Prohibitionist, 8; lieutenant-governor, John W. Arrasmith, Republican, 869, Thurston Daniels, Fusionist, 670, T. A. Shorthill, Prohibitionist, 13; secretary of state, J. H. Price, Republican, 867, W. D. Jenkins, Fusionist, 678, C. L. Haggard, Prohibitionist, 11; state treasurer, J. A. Kellogg, Republican, 867, C. W. Young, Fusionist, 673, John Robins, Prohibitionist, 12; state auditor, J. E. Frost, Republican, 869, N. Cheetham, Fusionist, 572, C. C. Gridley, Prohibitionist, 12; attorney-general, E. W. Ross, Republican, 866, P. H. Winston, Fusionist, 674, Everett Smith, Prohibitionist, 11; supreme judge, John P. Hoyt, Republican, 871, James B. Reavis, Fusionist, 667, E. N. Livermore, Prohibitionist, 14; commissioner of public lands, W. T. Forrest, Republican, 867, Robert Bridges, Fusionist, 670, A. E. Flagg, Prohibitionist, 16; superintendent of public instruction, E. L. Brunton, Republican, 870, F. J. Brown, Fusionist, 668, C. E. Newberry, Prohibitionist, 12; state printer, O. C. White, Republican, 870, Gwin Hicks, Fusionist, 660, H. L. Bull, Prohibitionist, 16; state representative, George H. Baker, Republican, 892, C. E. Rusk, Fusionist, 670; superior judge, A. L. Miller, Republican, 899, J. N. Pearce, Fusionist, 654; sheriff, Frank B. Stimson, Republican, 938, A. B. Courtway, Fusionist, 627; clerk, H. C. Jackson, Republican, 897, R. E. Jackson, Fusionist, 670; auditor, Hugh C. Phillips, Republican, 876, J. E. Chappell, Fusionist, 692; treasurer, A. C. Chapman, Republican, 973, D. E. Brooks, Fusionist, 585; county attorney, C. H. Spalding, Republican, 815, N. B. Brooks, Fusionist, 740; assessor, J. W. Butler, Republican 854, W. H. Ward, Fusionist, 708; superintendent of schools, C. L. Colburn, Republican, 874, W. R. Neal, Fusionist, 634; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 915, A. W. Mohr, Fusionist, 634; coroner, Peter Nelson, Republican, 911, S. H. Miller, Fusionist, 643; commissioners, first district, J. R. Rankin, Republican, 880, Jacob Hunsaker, Fusionist, 673; second district, J. Copenhaver, Republican, 887, J. N. Chamberlain, Fusionist, 667; third district, Joseph Nesbitt, Republican, 867, Peter Gunn, Fusionist, 684.

Again in 1898 national questions predominated in the county election. The Republican county convention was held September 17th; the Silverites and Anti-Expansionists, forming the Fusion party, met October 8th. That Klickitat still remained in the Republican ranks may be seen from the vote cast:

For congressmen, Wesley L. Jones, F. W. Cushman, Republicans, 824 and 800 votes respectively, James H. Lewis, William C. Jones, Fusionists, 396 and 371 votes respectively; sunders judges, Mark W. Fullerton, Thomas J. Anders, Republicans, 828 and 842 votes respectively, Benjamin F. Heuston, Melvin M. Goodman, Fusionists, 378 and 371 votes respectively; joint state senator, twelfth district, George H. Baker, Republican, 826, Nelson B. Brooks, Fusionist, 435; representative, L. W. Curtis, Republican, 801, Newton Norris, Fusionist, 466; auditor, James W. Butler, Republican, 961, no opposition; sheriff, William C. Burgen, Republican, 817, O. H. Rich, Fusionist, 440; clerk, H. C. Jackson, Republican, 887, William Olson, Fusionist, 372; treasurer, A. J. Ahola, Republican, 768, W. H. Ward, Fusionist, 492; attorney, William T. Darch, Republican, 681, Hiram Dustin, Fusionist, 565; assessor, J. R. Rankin, Republican, 738, Elmer Hinshaw, Fusionist, 512; commissioners, first district, William Coate, Republican, 838, Albert Bertsch, Fusionist, 390; second district, A. E. Coley, Republican, 810, R. D. White, Fusionist, 428; superintendent of schools, C. L. Colburn, Republican, 907, Mary J. Reynolds, Fusionist, 339; surveyor, Jacob Richardson, Republican, 976, no opposition; coroner, William Hart, Republican, 840, G. W. Stackhouse, Fusionist, 391. A small Prohibition vote was cast.

With the campaign of 1898 the Fusion party passed away, leaving again but two important political parties in the field. Klickitat still continued to roll up its usual large Republican majority. The Republican convention was held August 11th; the Democrats met September 16th. The official vote cast November 6, 1900, is herewith given, excepting that on minor state officers:

For presidential electors, Republican, 900, Democratic, 495, Prohibitionist, 50; congressmen, F. W. Cushman, Wesley L. Jones, Republicans, 893 and 898 votes respectively, F. C. Robertson, J. T. Ronald, Democrats, 492 and 486 votes respectively; governor, J. M. Frink, Republican, 850, J. R. Rogers, Democrat, 544; superior judge, A. L. Miller, Republican, 1,009, James A. Munday, Democrat, 425; state representative, Joseph Nesbitt, Republican, 900, I. C. Darland, Democrat, 596; commissioners, William McEwen, Republican, 831, Elmer Hinshaw, Democrat, 626; third district, A. J. Spoon, Republican, 865, L. Coleman, Democrat, 575; sheriff, W. C. Burgen, Republican, 981, John A. Niemeia, Democrat, 558; clerk, A. E. Coley, Republican, 773, John H. Smith, Democrat, 694; auditor, J. W. Butler, Republican, 977, John H. Bratton, Democrat, 473; treasurer, A. J. Ahola, Republican, 966, Thomas Turner, Democrat, 491; attorney, William T. Darch, Republican, 804, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 634; assessor, J. R. Rankin, Republican, 829, William Cahill, Democrat, 620; superintendent of schools, C. M. Ryman, Republican, 991; surveyor, Arthur Richardson, Republican, 895, A. R. Collins, Democrat, 544 (Richardson did not qualify, W. F. Byars was appointed to the office and served a full term); coroner, William Hart, Republican, 889, Charles L. Pierce, Democrat, 554.

The campaign of 1902 is of too recent a date to require a discussion of the issues involved. The Democrats secured two important offices, however, notwithstanding the overwhelming Republican majority in control of the county, William VanVactor and John H. Smith being elected by small majorities. The official returns follow:

For representatives in congress, Wesley L. Jones, Francis W. Cushman, William E. Humphrey, Republicans, 925, 902 and 905 votes respectively, George F. Cotterill, O. R. Holcomb, Frank B. Cole, Democrats, 386, 378 and 387 votes respectively, A. H. Sherwood, W. J. McKean, O. L. Fowler, Prohibitionists, 17, 48 and 17 votes respectively, J. H. C. Scurlock, D. Burgess, George W. Scott, Socialists, 30 votes each, Jense C. Martin, William McCormick, Hans P. Jorgensen, Socialist-Laborites, 13, 13 and 12 votes respectively; justices supreme court, Hiram E. Hadley, Republican, 913, James Bradley Reavis, Democrat, 394, Thomas Neill, Socialist, 30, William J. Hoag, Socialist-Laborite, 9; state senator, sixteenth district, George H. Baker, Republican, 938, C. J. Moore, Democrat, 410; state representative, William Coate, Republican, 853, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 494; treasurer, T. B. Montgomery, Republican, 1,001, no opposition; auditor, Ivan M. Macy, Republican, 608, John H. Smith, Democrat, 758; sheriff, William McEwen, Republican, 671, William Van Vactor, Democrat, 697; assessor, Charles F. Kayser, Republican, 889, William Niva, Democrat, 463; clerk, Amos E. Coley, Republican, 993, no opposition; school superintendent, Emma C. Clanton, Republican, 858, C. E. Rusk, Democrat, 493; surveyor, A. L. Richardson, Republican, 885, A. W. Mohr, Democrat, 461; prosecuting attorney, E. C. Ward, Republican, 794, J. W. Snover, Democrat, 564; coroner, Frank Sanders, Republican, 904, S. H. Miller, Democrat, 429; commissioner, first district, B. C. Dymond, Republican, 911, Thomas Lantry, Democrat, 418; commissioner, second district, W. E. Hornbrook, Republican, 865, T. B. Stapleton, Democrat, 484.

TOWNS.

GOLDENDALE.

It is interesting in tracing the history of towns to observe the different elements directly responsible for their origin, growth and development. Some are favored with special natural advantages of harbor or waterway; some have been fostered by railroads and corporations; some have suddenly sprung up mushroom-like because of a great mining or other excitement; a few, like the city of Goldendale, lack the stimulus of all such advantages and owe their existence entirely to the presence of a good tributary country and the energy and labor of a group of enterprising citizens. Goldendale until a year ago had no closer railroad communication than Grant's Station, on the O. R. & N., twelve miles away, while the nearest point on the Columbia from which there was unobstructed navigation to Portland was at The Dalles, thirty-two miles distant.

But, although deprived of the conveniences of modern rapid transportation, the town was not without many natural advantages. It is located on an almost perfectly level tract of land surrounded by one of the richest farming sections in the state, a valley about thirty miles long and ten wide and easily capable of giving support to twenty thousand inhabitants. It comprises the great wheat-growing area of western Klickitat. The hills to the northward, whose bases reach almost to the town, furnish not only an abundance of pine timber, but also an excellent summer range for stock; furthermore, they have proven capable, when cleared of timber, of producing in abundance all the hardier varieties of fruit. The city is afforded thorough drainage through a large stream of water that flows along its lower side, carrying off all seepage. This stream will also furnish an abundance of water-power for an electric plant whenever the capital is forthcoming to harness it. In the matter of a city water supply, Goldendale is also specially favored, as there will always be plenty of pure water within easy reach, no matter how large the town of the future may be. On account of the pure water and good drainage, typhoid and malarial fever are almost unknown, and the city has a very enviable reputation for healthfulness.

The site of the present city of Goldendale was first settled by Mortimer Thorp in the later fifties. Mr. Thorp built a house and fenced in a tract of land close to where the Methodist church now stands. He was a stockman, however, and gave more thought to finding a favorable place for cattle-raising than to the possibilities of his location as a town site. Later he packed his possessions and moved over into the Yakima valley without ever having acquired title to the land. After Mr. Thorp abandoned the claim, it came into the hands of L. J. Kimberland, who sold out, September 5, 1871, to John J. Golden. It was Mr. Golden's plan when he bought the property to lay it out as a town site and give to the rich Klickitat valley a suitable trade center and supply point. Accordingly, he sent the next spring to The Dalles for a surveyor (he was unable to procure one here), and had the town site platted. The original Goldendale was located along Klickitat creek on the flat where the steam laundry and planer now stand. Most of the business portion of the present town lies in Golden's first and second additions and in the Chatfield addition.

The first move on the part of the founder of the new town was toward the establishment of a church within its borders. In the fall of 1871 a large and successful camp-meeting was held, as the result of which a Methodist church was organized in the settlement. Mr. Golden donated to it twelve lots as a building site, and four more were given to the minister.

A short time afterward Rev. J. H. B. Royal, with the co-operation of the people of the settlement, built a parsonage. When the new building was completed the subject of naming the town was broached to a party of settlers, and the minister, noticing the numerous willows that grew in the flat along the bank of the creek, proposed Willowdale, but a suggestion that it be named Goldendale, after its founder met with general approval, and the town was named accordingly.

Mr. Golden offered to donate eight lots to the man building the first store in Goldendale. In the fall of 1872 Thomas Johnson accepted the proposition and erected a building, the front part of which he used as a store, the rear as a dwelling. In 1874 he erected a separate building for store purposes, and by the end of that year the new city contained seven houses.

In drawing up the plat of the town, the surveyor numbered the lots in the same order that is always followed in numbering the sections in a township, but a mistake was made in recording the plat, the reverse order being followed. The deeds, however, were made out according to the surveyor's plat, which Mr. Golden had in his possession. This caused considerable confusion, as all the first deeds had to be changed to correspond to the recorded plat. The lots in the first addition to Goldendale were numbered in a similar manner, but the second was platted according to the usual custom.

When John J. Golden bought the town site, L. J. Kimberland was postmaster and the post-office passed to the purchaser along with the property. It appears to have been discontinued for a time afterward, but Goldendale was again granted a daily mail in 1873. Altogether there were not more than a "hatful of letters" to come or go at any one time, and no papers then had a circulation in the community. We are informed that the postmaster was able to carry the entire mail for the community in his saddle-bags.

Up to 1878 the growth of the town of Goldendale was exceedingly slow, only one store, that of Willis Jenkins, having come in to compete with the pioneer establishment, but that fall occurred an event which gave a new impetus to the growth of the town. In 1872 the question of locating the county seat was referred to a popular vote. The two places then desiring the honor were Goldendale in the valley and Rockland on the Columbia, across from The Dalles. Although it seemed evident that Goldendale would be the point chosen, as most of the settlers were in the valley, Rockland managed to urge its claims so strongly that a majority of the people cast their ballots in favor of that place. John J. Golden, to whom the city of Goldendale has always been as a favorite child, was not discouraged because of this defeat, but set to work with renewed vigor to advance the interests of the prospective city. Soon he and his coadjutors had caused Goldendale to become the center from which well-traveled county roads radiated in all directions. In 1877 stage connections were established with the Dalles, and shortly afterward the line was extended to Yakima and Ellensburg. It was only after a long, severe struggle that Mr. Golden and the other friends of the town were able to bring again to an issue the question of the location of the county seat, as the cattlemen were from the first opposed to Goldendale and their influence was strong not only in the county, but also in the territorial legislature. Pressure was brought to bear by their representatives to prevent the question from being again referred to the voters of the county, but finally, in 1878, Nelson Whitney succeeded in having a bill passed providing that a three-fifths majority of the electors of the county should decide the matter. At the general election held in the fall of 1878, the question was given to the people for final settlement, and nearly five-sixths of the votes cast were for Goldendale.

The following year the county property was removed in accordance with the will of the people as expressed by their suffrages, and Goldendale has ever since remained the county seat. At that time there was no courthouse in Klickitat, and as the business of the county had assumed sufficient proportions to necessitate a building, the people in Goldendale and vicinity took the matter in hand and built by private subscription a substantial wooden structure which they gave to the county free of cost to the taxpayers.

With the year 1878 a period of growth and prosperity for Goldendale began. By the following year the town had sufficient population to entitle it under the existing laws to corporate powers, and an act was passed by the territorial legislature and approved November 14, 1879, incorporating Goldendale with the following described territory: "That portion of land known and designated upon the surveys of the United States in the Territory of Washington, as the south half of the southwest quarter of section sixteen, and the south half of the southeast quarter of section seventeen, and the northeast quarter of section twenty, and the northwest quarter of section twenty-one, township four north, range sixteen east of the Willamette meridian."

The following temporary officers were appointed to serve until the first election, to take place the first Monday in April, 1880: Mayor, Thomas Johnson; recorder, and ex-officio city assessor and clerk, W. F. Ames; councilmen, Homer Sears, John J. Golden, W. E. Chatfield, Justin Scammon and D. B. Gaunt. By 1880 the following business houses had been established in the city of Goldendale: General merchandise, Lowengart & Sichel, S. Lowenberg & Company; flouring mills, Klickitat Flouring Mills, D. Scammon, proprietor, Goldendale Flouring Mills, Nesbitt, Jones & Company, proprietors; planing mills, Klickitat Planing Company, Mitchell & Helm, proprietors, Thomas Johnson; hardware, J. H. McCulloch, Graff & Filloon; furniture, Adolph Plahte; drug stores, City Drug and Book Store, W. L. Ames & Company, proprietors, City Drug Store, Saylor & Company, proprietors; grocery, William Barnett; harness shop, California, M. T. Shannon, proprietor; blacksmith shops, S. W. Gardiner & Son, A. C. Hall, J. C. Marble and Philip S. Caldwell; jewelry stores, L. B. Royal, Victor Gobat; hotels, Occidental, T. E. Caley, proprietor, Palace, W. H. Chappell, M. V. Harper and Joseph Verden; barber shop, Charles Gibbons, proprietor; job printing, John T. Harrell, The Sentinel, C. K. and K. A. Seitz, proprietors; livery stables, Thomas Johnson, Miller & Gaunt; millinery, Mrs. J. Ingersoll; contractors, Robert Jones, Tomlinson & Mowlds, C. M. Phillips; real estate, John J. Golden, John R. Chatfield, M. V. Harper; attorneys-at-law, Dustin & Lamdrum, Dunbar & Reavis; physicians, W. T. McCauley, Dr. Houghton, N. Henton, D. P. Hewitt, G. Hill and P. Laurendeau; postmaster, Justin Scammon.

There was by this time a daily stage line to The Dalles, and three times weekly a stage made the trip to Ellensburg and Yakima. Four churches had organizations in the town—the Baptist, Christian, Methodist and Presbyterian. There was also a private academy with an attendance of one hundred and sixty students, presided over by Captain W. A. Wash. The mail service had been increased to a tri-weekly, and a weekly newspaper, the Klickitat Sentinel, C. K. Seitz, editor, had been established.

The growth of the town was continuous and uninterrupted until the year 1888, when, on May 13th, a destructive fire swept almost the entire business portion of the city out of existence. After the fire there remained only E. W. Pike's livery barn and Philip Caldwell's blacksmith shop.

The fire broke out in James Dickson's livery stable about two o'clock Sunday afternoon while many of the citizens were out of town. Mr. Dickson, who was in the office of the stable, being alarmed by a roaring noise, went to investigate the cause and found the barn on fire. It is probable that if he had had a supply of water handy, he could have extinguished the flames before they had done much damage, for he almost succeeded in doing so with a single pail of water which stood near. But while he was gone for more water, the flames climbed to the roof of the building, igniting the hay and making it impossible with the inadequate supply of water to save the barn and prevent the spread of the flames.

An alarm was instantly sounded. People rushed to the scene with all promptness and the fight began. It was immediately perceived that the barn was doomed and that the whole town was in danger, so the workers gave their attention to removing valuables from the houses in the vicinity of the burning building. This was about all that could be done, as Goldendale had no water system at the time and it was not possible to approach close enough to throw water on the flames with buckets. Everybody labored to save what he could, and before those who had gone to the country, being warned by the smoke, could return to town, those who had stayed at home were nearly exhausted. The country people and their wagons were pressed into service and much valuable property was saved from the ravages of the fire. In some instances the property taken from the burning buildings was not removed beyond danger, and as the flames spread, it caught and burned with the rest. For four hours the fire held high carnival, entirely consuming seven blocks in the heart of the town. All the district between Broadway and Court streets and between Chatfield and Golden avenues was left desolate, and, besides almost the entire business portion, the houses of twenty-five families were destroyed, also much valuable personal property. The following list of estimated losses will give an idea of the magnitude of the disaster:

Bold & Fenton, blacksmiths, $700; James Starfield, dwelling, $300; D. W. Pierce & Company, house and lumber, $900; W. H. Chappell, hotel, $3,000; Jacob Hess, building, $2,500; Cummings & Cram, merchandise, $25,000; Sig. Sichel, $25,000; J. M. Hess, druggist, $6,000; Frank Patton, barber, $500; C. R. Van Allstyn, grocery, $3,000; Bennett & Harvey, building, $600; August Schuster, meat market, $400; R. D. McCulley, $300; E. D. McFall, $6,000; Victor Gobat, jeweler, $2,000; Mrs. L. Hall, household goods, $300; Hiram Wing, merchandise, $2,500; Peter Nelson, dwelling, $1,200; T. L. Masters, dwelling, $400; John Lear, house, $400; W. R. Dunbar, $500; Justin Scammon, dwelling, $700; Dr. Boyd, dwelling, $700; Occidental Hotel, $900; B. Snover, store, $1,300; O. D. Sturgis, merchandise, $200; J. T. Eshelman, $950; Dr. Stowell, household goods, $500; William Millican, merchandise, $2,500; Masters & Benson, $11,000; Mrs. Whitney, $500; James Coffield, building, $1,000; J. W. Washburn, building, $400; A. O. U. W. fixtures, $200; French & McFarland, $600; Isaac Goodnoe, currency, $400; M. Wigal, building, $700; Rev. John Uren, $200; I. O. O. F. fixtures, $600; Klickitat county, courthouse and furnishings, etc., $6,000; Hiram Dustin, books, $100; Tribune office, $600; Frank Lee, household goods, $200; Chinese laundry, $200; Dudley Eshelman, $200; Smith & Dunbar, buildings, $900; Sentinel office, press, etc., $3,500; Dickson's stables, $3,000; Hotling Company, building, $600; Dr. L. M. Willard, sundries, $1,500; W. H. Ward, building, $1,200; H. D. Young, building and furniture, $7,000; D. Cram, building, $600; Downer & Sloper, machinery, $900; Samuel Lear, dwelling, $500; I. B. Courtney, dwelling, $600; Charles Marshall, dwelling, $600; Methodist Episcopal church building, $1,500; Methodist Episcopal church parsonage, $500; Presbyterian church, $1,000; John Hess, building, $300; W. A. Wash, building, $200; Hugh Sutherland, $100; Thomas Butler, $200; the Misses McLin & Phillips, millinery, $100; Mrs. M. E. Van Allstyn, stock and building, $2,000; John Keats, stock and building, $250; Joseph Blanchard, furniture, $150; James Burnett, furniture, $700; R. D. McCulley, $600; I. S. Bonchard, shoe shop, $200; H. C. Jackson, lumber, $250; E. W. Pike, machinery, $1,000.

In all, about $250,000 worth of property was destroyed.

It was prophesied by some that the town would never be rebuilt, but it soon became evident that such prophets greatly underestimated the pluck and energy of the citizens of Goldendale. Scarcely had the smoke ceased to rise from the ruins when plans were under way to rebuild in a safer and more substantial manner. Previous to this time not a single brick building had been erected in Goldendale, but the lessons of the fire were well learned. The people were made to realize the true economy of fireproof buildings, and out of the ruins rose a more substantial city than had ever before existed in the Klickitat valley. The Sentinel of July 1, 1888, tells of the laying of the first brick in the first brick building erected in the city. By August 2d Hiram Wing had rebuilt his store; V. E. Gobat had a brick building almost completed on Main street; John Coffield had a corrugated iron building in course of construction; the Palace Hotel building had been rebuilt on the site of the old hotel of that name; beside the hotel, Pierce had an office for his lumber yard; opposite the Red Barn, Bold & Bold had built a blacksmith shop; on the site of the Occidental, Snover had a building forty by forty feet almost completed; Sol Smith had an office; John Keats a shoeshop; William Millican had a two-story building opposite the Palace Hotel; G. W. McKinney had a hardware store; the Sentinel had a printing office; W. H. Ward a small temporary building; W. B. Presby a law office; J. M. Hess a store in course of construction; Samuel Lear had a residence; an armory hall, fifty by one hundred feet, had taken the place of the old one; the Methodist church was in course of construction, and a contract had been let for the Presbyterian church; all this within three months from the date of the fire.

The rapidity with which the new Goldendale arose out of the ashes is all the more remarkable when it is remembered that the city was without railroad connection and therefore unable to obtain readily building materials from outside sources; neither were there home facilities in readiness for supplying immediately the increased demands.

Goldendale had, however, been accustomed from the beginning to depend entirely on its own resources, and the unusual situation caused by the fire developed new activity and new enterprise. The brick and lumber for the reconstruction were from necessity manufactured at home. There was fortunately abundance of timber within easy reach of the town, also plenty of clay from which to manufacture the needed brick, and both were made use of by an energetic and determined people.

For a long time the city had been handicapped in the transaction of its business because of the absence of a banking house in the town, but in 1889 this desideratum was supplied, a company being formed with a capital of fifty thousand dollars and the First National Bank of Goldendale established. The first officers of this institution were: J. G. Maddock, president; Hugh Fields, vice-president; Hugh Fields, E. W. Pike, J. G. Maddock, F. W. Patterson and O. D. Sturgess, directors. The enterprise flourished from the beginning.

The havoc wrought by the fire caused many of the leading citizens to urge persistently upon the people the necessity of an adequate water supply. The result of this agitation was that the city council was induced to submit to the voters of the town, at an election held June 19, 1890, a proposition to bond the taxable property of the city for five per cent. of its assessed valuation for the purpose of constructing a city water system. The bonds amounted to twelve thousand five hundred dollars and were to run twenty years at six per cent. The vote stood one hundred and twenty-five for the bonds and seven against. Steps were, therefore, immediately taken to build and put into operation the new system, which was to take its water, by the gravity system, from three mountain springs some thirteen miles distant. For the first two years, however, the water was pumped from the Little Klickitat. A large reservoir was constructed about one hundred and fifty feet above the town and mains were laid throughout the city. Goldendale lies at the foot of the hills that flank the Simcoe range, and in the mountains snow lies on the ground the greater part of the year. From these melting snows the water comes cool and fresh and pure the whole year through. The pipe line and water supply was owned, however, by a private company, and it was not until recently that the system came entirely into the hands of the city.

While the water system was being completed, an object lesson was given to the people of the wisdom of the enterprise and the necessity of hastening the work as much as possible. On the evening of September 4, 1890, a fire broke out near the west end of Main street in a stable owned by Mr. Allen. The wind was blowing from the southwest and the flames spread to the north and east. The residence of William Millican, valued at twenty-five hundred dollars, was totally destroyed: the property was uninsured. S. P. Leverett's residence was also destroyed; its value was two thousand dollars, insurance one thousand dollars. The barn where the fire broke out was valued at five hundred dollars and was not insured. It was feared at the time that, with the meager facilities then at hand for fighting the fire, the disaster of two years previous would be repeated. There was no method by which water could be thrown on the flames save with buckets, and the water supply was limited, but the people fought with energy and courage and succeeded in saving the city. A suspicion gained foothold among the citizens of Goldendale that this fire was of incendiary origin, and the mayor authorized the city marshal to provide patrolmen and guards as a precaution against further attempts to destroy the town. The result was that through the vigilance of Charles Alvord, the miscreant was caught in a second attempt. Mr. Alvord saw a suspicious-looking individual enter a barn back of the Palace Hotel and followed him. Just as the pursuer came up, he met one Jesse Allen coming out of the building. When the latter saw Mr. Alvord, he rushed back into the barn and attempted to put out the fire he had already started in a pile of straw. Alvord readily extinguished the flames, then arrested the man and turned him over to the county authorities. It is generally believed that he was also responsible for the other fire, which, indeed, started in his father's barn.

Allen was given a preliminary hearing on a charge of arson and bound over to appear at the November term of court. When his case was called, he entered a plea of not guilty, but the circumstances were so strongly against him that he was convicted and sentenced to three years in the penitentiary.

Although Goldendale was handicapped in its growth by a lack of transportation facilities for a longer period than most of its sister cities throughout the state and thereby suffered much inconvenience, the people were not so far discouraged because of this drawback as to neglect any effort on their part which might count in the development and upbuilding of the city. In the early part of March, 1890, a mass-meeting was held at the courthouse for the purpose of establishing a board of trade to foster the interests of the growing town. A temporary organization was formed which, the following week, was transformed into a permanent one. A constitution was adopted and officers elected as follows: N. B. Brooks, president; R. E. Jackson, first vice-president; Joseph Nesbitt, second vice-president; George H. Baker, third vice-president; C. S. Reinhart, secretary; D. Cram, treasurer. Previous to this time the action of Goldendale's citizens on its behalf had been along separate lines; now by this organization they were prepared to act together.

The best energies of Goldendale's citizens were now directed toward the establishment of a railroad connection for the town. That they were in earnest in this effort is amply demonstrated by the fact that they raised a subsidy of twenty thousand dollars in 1890, as an inducement to any road to build into the city. Their labors in this direction and their final triumph in recent years are of interest not alone to the city of Goldendale, but to the entire county, and, therefore, have been fully detailed elsewhere.

At no time in the history of the town were its educational interests neglected; on the contrary, the importance of education for the youth was always recognized and a high standard of excellence was maintained in the schools. As early as 1880 an academy had been established, but when the public school system became well enough developed, this institution was abandoned and for many years it was necessary for students desiring advanced education to go outside the county for it. It had long been the wish of many Goldendale citizens to provide educational facilities at home, thus obviating, in part at least, the necessity of sending their sons and daughters elsewhere for higher learning.

A meeting was held in February, 1896, with this end in view, and such a lively interest was manifested that those who had the enterprise in contemplation felt encouraged to proceed. The services of professor Charles Timblin were secured, and by the fall of 1896 an academy was established and ready to receive students. Since that time Klickitat Academy has been doing a good work and has been an important adjunct to the educational facilities of the county. Recently, however, the institution has been converted into a high school.

Goldendale was first incorporated in 1879 under the territorial laws. At the city election of 1902 the question of re-incorporation under the state laws was submitted to a popular vote, and the result was one hundred and five for and five against. The new incorporation, by the provisions of which Goldendale is classed as a city of the fourth class, took effect April 15, 1902. Since that time Goldendale has purchased from Hess & Cooper, for the sum of six thousand dollars, the water system from which the city got its water supply. The present city administration, elected in December, 1903, is composed of the following officers: Mayor, Dr. Allen Bonebrake; councilmen, Nelson B. Brooks, Winthrop B. Presby, A. E. Coley, William McGuire, Samuel Waters; treasurer, George Hyatt; secretary, J. R. Putnam; attorney, Edgar C. Ward; marshal, G. W. Stackhouse. R. D. McCulley is the chief of the city's volunteer fire department, which is a creditable organization in every respect.

The transportation question has been the most difficult to solve of the many problems which in the past have perplexed the founders and builders of Goldendale. Several times in the history of the town a railroad seemed assured, but as often some obstruction prevented the final consummation of the project, until 1903, when at last the energies and efforts of the people of the county and town were fitly rewarded. The line completed, Goldendale's citizens justly felt that a celebration was in order, so June 18, 1903, was set apart as a day of jubilee and general rejoicing. In their celebration the people were assisted by business men from The Dalles and Portland, the party arriving in time for dinner at the Central Hotel, which had just been finished. They spent the afternoon in exploring the surrounding country, with which they expressed themselves as delighted, while the evening was given over to speech-making in the armory. Prominent men among the visitors and citizens delivered enthusiastic addresses. The meeting was opened by Attorney Nelson B. Brooks with a few well-chosen remarks; then Harvey W. Scott, of the Oregonian, spoke; also Judge Ballinger and H. C. Campbell. Later a banquet was tendered the visitors at the Central Hotel, Winthrop B. Presby acting as toastmaster.

In response to the toast "Portland," Attorney John M. Gearin said: "Now that this country has been opened up by this railroad and given communication with the markets of the commercial world, your products will take on a new value and the number of your homes will be increased, your lands will be settled more generally, and your wealth will accumulate more rapidly. At Goldendale you have the metropolis of one of the richest valleys in the Northwest, and as this road is extended and possibly brought into connection with some great transcontinental system, your prestige will grow. You stand here living examples of what men can do by their own endeavors. You came into an unsettled country without railroads and without even wagon roads, and have built up a rich and prosperous community."

Other speeches were made in the same strain by experienced business men from other parts, showing that the natural advantages of Goldendale and the riches of her surrounding country were duly appreciated by all. It is yet too soon to judge of the results of this great enterprise on Goldendale, for scarcely a year has passed since the railroad's arrival, but the city has already shown a marked increase in business activity. The growth of Goldendale has been steady and sure. At no time in its history has it suffered from over-booming, but a comparison of census returns shows that a steady growth in population has ever been maintained. In the past few years this increase has been much more rapid than formerly. The census for 1900 shows a population of seven hundred and thirty-eight, not including the thickly-settled districts which lie just without the limits of the corporation. In 1903 the population, as estimated by the state bureau of statistics, was one thousand six hundred and ninety, a gain of more than one hundred per cent. in three years.

An increase in building activity is also to be noticed. Substantial brick buildings are taking the place of old wooden ones, and the new structures are invariably much larger than those they replace, showing that the business of the town is increasing and demanding more room. The residence part of the city is being materially extended by the addition of new buildings, made necessary by the arrival of new families, for during the spring just past almost every train has been bringing home-seekers and home-builders to the valley and city.

Goldendale now has a large sixty-room hotel, covering a ground space of sixty by one hundred feet. The building is three stories high and is elegantly furnished, using electric lights, steam heat, call bells and all the necessary equipment of a modern hotel. The hotel owns its own light plant and is the only building in the city with electric lights. The hotel is owned and operated by Alvord & Ahola, who provide excellent service for their patrons.

Although the National Bank of Goldendale terminated its operations when hard times made business slack, Goldendale was not left long without a bank. In 1899 Moore Brothers, of Moro, Oregon, established the Bank of Goldendale. A. Melgard, formerly of Minnesota, bought the property in May, 1902, and is at present its owner. The bank is a private institution and occupies its own building. Mr. Melgard has had many years of experience in banking, and before coming to this city was cashier of the State Bank of Warren, Minnesota. He is well known in financial circles.

The city has two weekly newspapers, both of which have been and are no small factors in the growth of the community and county at large. The Sentinel, in its twenty-fifth volume, is under the management of W. F. Byars, who owns most of the company's stock. The Agriculturist, in its fourteenth year, is owned and edited by W. J. Story. Both papers are provided with improved printing plants and well equipped job offices. These newspapers will be more fully treated of in the press chapter.

The manufacturing interests of the city are still in their infancy, yet a good beginning has been made in this line. There are two flouring mills—the Goldendale Milling Company's mill, with a capacity of one hundred barrels a day, under the management of Phillips & Aldrich, and the Klickitat mill, owned by J. M. Hess & Son; its capacity is seventy barrels. Besides these mills, there are two planing mills, that of the Klickitat White Pine Company, D. W. Pierce, manager, capacity, twenty thousand feet a day, employing between fifteen and twenty men, and the Goldendale planing mill, of which J. A. Beckett is manager, handling about one million feet a year. A well-equipped foundry is also among the city's industrial institutions.

Goldendale's mercantile houses, business and professional men, other than those heretofore mentioned, may be listed as follows:

General merchandise, Baker Brothers, John E. Chappell, Samuel Waters, A. M. McLeod & Company; clothing store, Rust Brothers; book store, Rankin & Frisbie; drug stores, C. M. Shelton & Company, Chester Pike, McKee & McKee, H. S. Goddard; hardware, W. A. McKenzie, H. N. Frazer; furniture, A. C. Chapman, A. I. Webb & Son; second-hand store, P. D. Presher; groceries, Bartlett & Sons; meat market, Shelton & McCrow; jewelers, Wendelin Leidl, V. E. Campbell; bakery, W. F. Stiner; restaurants, Thomas Kennedy, J. J. O'Rourke, Ryan & Sweeney; racket store, Cochran & Holland; flour and feed, William Van Vactor & Son; implements, wagons, etc., E. W. Pike, C. E. Marshall, William Enderby; harness shop, W. H. Ward; foundry, the Goldendale, Leonard & Leverett, proprietors; millinery stores, Mrs. Lizzie Taylor, Miss Helen Campbell, Miss Alice Coffield; barber shops, Southern & Van Hook, Blagdon & Smith; confectionery, notions, O. S. Ebi, C. M. Shelton & Company; fish and fruit market, Francis McGregor; blacksmith shops, George H. Wood, Julius Plett, M. M. Warner; tailor shop, The Toggery (B. E.) Crawford & (Thomas) Hill; livery stables, William Van Vactor, A. B. Courtway, Charles Alvord, John Washburn; lodging-house, The Chicago, J. Lacost, proprietor; restaurant and lodging-house, J. P. Harris; shoemaker, S. Odrowski; real estate, loans, insurance, Klickitak County Land & Loan Company, J. J. Reid, manager, Phillips & Aldrich, Brooks & Stringfellow, Hiram Dustin, Stevens & Hause; abstract and real estate, Smith & Spoon; farms, loans, etc., E. W. Pike; undertaker, Frank Sanders; lawyers, Winthrop B. Presby, Hiram Dustin, Nelson B. Brooks, E. C. Ward, W. T. Darch; physicians, Drs. Allen Bonebrake, W. M. Hamilton, H. H. Hartley, H. S. Goddard, J. M. Reeder; dentists, Dr. N. R. Norris, R. D. McCulley; veterinary dentist, H. S. Anderson; architect and builder, W. J. Andrews; contractors and builders, N. B. Brooks, A. R. Ketch & Sons; painters and paper hangers, C. H. Carter, E. C. Partridge; transfer business, Bunnell & Carter, Waldo Glover.

It is characteristic of the American community that the schoolhouse and the church are always among the oldest buildings in the settlement. The town of Goldendale was yet only a pile of rails when the first move was made to establish a school within its precincts. In 1873 John J. Golden gave two lots in the newly platted town as a site for a schoolhouse in the district, which was first known as the E. A. Hopkins district. The district is now officially known as No. 7. Its first directors were I. I. Lancaster, E. A. Hopkins and M. V. Harper. They erected a building on the grounds donated by Mr. Golden, and for a number of years this was the only schoolhouse in the town. The entire furniture consisted of rough benches for the children and the customary teacher's desk and chair.

The rapid growth which followed the removal of the county seat to Goldendale rendered this building inadequate, and as the people were scarcely prepared to undergo the expense of erecting a larger schoolhouse, it was taken up as a private enterprise by Captain W. A. Wash in 1879. Again the public spirit of Mr. Golden was brought into evidence by his donation of a suitable location for the new building. Captain Wash organized a joint stock company and built the main part of the present west end schoolhouse. An academy was conducted by Mr. Wash in this building, which was in reality a public institution, as the academy drew the school funds and taught the children of the Goldendale district. A year and a half later Mr. Wash sold the building to the district. In a short time this building also became too small, and about 1884 a wing was added. After purchasing the new building, the district sold the old one to the Predestinarian Baptist church. By 1900 the enlarged building was also overcrowded, and it was necessary to rent the old schoolhouse to accommodate the extra numbers. Two years later it was decided to bond the district and build a new schoolhouse. Bonds were issued in the sum of seven thousand dollars by vote of the people and the new building was completed for the fall term of 1902. It is a slightly two-story, eight-room, frame structure occupying a fine site in the eastern end of the city.

The district owns a well-selected library of several hundred volumes, besides a large number of current magazines. The school census of 1904 shows that it contains four hundred and sixty-eight children of school age; the enrollment for the past year was three hundred and twenty-five. The faculty for the year 1904-5 will be as follows: Charles Boyd, principal; C. M. Ryman, O. B. Frisbie, Miss Lorena Gleason, Miss Hulda Rankin, Miss Jessie Look, Miss Kate Moore, Miss Mary Hutton, besides the high school faculty, of which Professor Charles Timblin will be principal. The school board is composed of Dr. Allen Bonebrake, Wendelin Leidl and W. H. Ward.

The church history of Goldendale reaches even farther back than that of the public schools. The Goldendale Directory, published in 1880, furnishes the information that:

"The M. E. church circuit of Klickitak county was organized by the Rev. J. W. Turner, of Walla Walla district, Oregon annual conference, in the year 1860-70. The first class was formed by the Rev. G. Hines, then in charge of The Dalles district. In August, 1871, the Rev. J. H. B. Royal was appointed to the Klickitak circuit. Twelve lots were donated at that time for a Methodist parsonage by John J. Golden and a building was erected thereon."

In 1875 the church purchased the present location from John R. Chatfield for the sum of twenty dollars, and three years later erected a church building. By 1880 the church had a membership of two hundred and twenty with thirty-three probationers. The disastrous fire that swept Goldendale in 1888 consumed the building, but it was immediately rebuilt. At present the church has a membership of two hundred and thirty, including probationers. They have a fine building with a large seating capacity and a wing for league room and conference. Following is a list of the pastors who have served since 1880: Revs. W. T. Koontz, succeeded in August, 1881, by G. E. Wilcox; S. W. Richards, August 14, 1882, to September 8, 1884; C. M. Bryan, September 8, 1884, to July 21, 1885; John Uren, July 21, 1885, to September 24, 1888; L. J. Whitcomb, September 24, 1888, to August, 1889; G. G. Ferguson, August, 1889, to August 30, 1890; Edward McEvers, August 30, 1890, to September 6, 1892; J. M. McDonald, September 13, 1892, to December 24, 1894; U. F. Hawk, January 2, 1895, to September 1, 1897; N. Evans, September 1, 1897, to March 1, 1901; C. D. Nickelson, March 1, 1901, to August 15, 1902; H. B. Ellsworth, September 1, 1902, serving at present.

In 1879 the Christian denomination organized and built a church. This is now the oldest church building in the city, as the Methodist church built the previous year was afterward destroyed by fire. Among the earliest pastors in charge of the Christian church were Revs. Esherman, McCorkel and Ross. For a period of years, however, the church had no resident pastor, the pulpit being filled from outside sources. The present pastor, Rev. C. M. Himes, who was called to the church February 22, 1904, is the first resident minister in a number of years. The present membership is about seventy-eight.

The Baptist church of Goldendale was organized in 1879 by Rev. T. H. Harper with nine constituent members. The following year the present house of worship was erected on a lot donated to the society by John J. Golden. By the end of the year 1879 the membership had increased to thirty. At this writing the church is without a resident pastor, though it has a fair-sized membership.

The Presbyterian church was organized in Goldendale July 26, 1879. The following is a partial list of its charter members: I. B. Courtney, Mr. and Mrs. Luark, Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Downey, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. White, Mr. and Mrs. Mahen, Mrs. Waldo Glover and Mrs. Peter Gunn. As nearly as can be ascertained, the first church building was erected in 1883. This building was destroyed by the great fire of 1888, but in August of the same year the society let a contract for the rebuilding of the church at a cost of one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars. A very sightly and commodious structure was erected on the corner opposite the Central Hotel. A year ago Rev. D. F. Giles assumed charge of the church, and he is still its pastor.

Owing to incomplete records, it is impossible to give a list of the church's former pastors.

There are sixteen fraternal organizations represented in the city, indicating the presence of an unusually strong fraternal spirit among the inhabitants. Herewith is given a short sketch of each:

Masonic, Goldendale Lodge No. 31, A. F. and A. M., chartered June 4, 1880, with the following officers: Worshipful master, McDonald Pierce; senior warden, John C. Story; junior warden, Joseph Sanders. Its present officers are: Master mason, A. E. Coley; senior warden, W. F. Byars; junior warden, N. B. Brooks; secretary, M. M. Warner. Membership, seventy-five.

Darch; V. G., Jessie Leonardo; recording secretary, Molly Hutton; financial secretary, L. A. Duncan; treasurer, Gertrude Duncan.

Knights of Pythias, Friendship Lodge No. 37, chartered May 21, 1890, with the following members: L. J. Whitcombe, J. W. Snover, Mark Patton, B. N. Snover, O. D. Sturgess, G. W. Stapleton, A. L. Miller, G. W. Billington, C. B. Johnson, David Beckett, John Cummings, W. L. Miller, W. H. Leverett, Jr., James Coffield, W. H. Ward, R. D. McCulley, R. E. Jackson, George T. McKinney, John A. Benson, C. R. Van Allstyn, Fay Fenton, Will H. Hodson, E. F. Patton, William P. Flanary, W. B. Presby, A. Hale, C. M. Shelton and Joseph Stultz. The present officers are: C. C., Murten Darland; V. C., Clare Wilcox; K. R., W. F. Byars; M. F., Samuel Waters; M. E., William P. Flanary. Membership, about one hundred.

Rathbone Sisters, Purity Temple No. 39, established January 28, 1904, by the following charter members: Jane Warner, Delia Richardson, Lulu Leverett, Louisa Ahola, Molly Ward, Bessie M. Goddard and Julia Darland. Present officers: Most excellent chief, Delia Richardson; secretary, Edna Darland; treasurer, Bessie M. Goddard. Membership, fifty.

Ancient Order United Workmen, Goldendale Lodge No. 21, established November 1, 1893, with charter membership as follows: J. C. Darland, C. E. Morris, D. C. Caines, W. Helm, J. W. Reeder, Daniel Cram, W. R. Dunbar, F. C. Bowers and W. A. Van Hoy. Present officers: M. W., V. M. Van Hook; recorder, D. L. Hanson; receiver, W. H. Ward; financier, Dr. Allen Bonebrake. Membership, thirty-four.

Degree of Honor, Temple Lodge No. 55, established April 12, 1902, with following charter membership: Clara R. Bowers, Jennie Van Hoy, Ella Van Hoy, Oliver Carter, Walter Glover, Littitia Bonebrake, Mary O'Neil, Laura Carter, Jessie O'Neil and S. S. Wilson.

Knights of the Maccabees, Goldendale Throne Tent No. 19, established August, 1895, with following charter members: G. M. Slocum, W. J. White, O. D. Sturgess, A. C. Chapman, M. S. Bishop, I. C. Flanary, J. W. Reeder, M. B. Potter, A. W. Shorter, Wendelin Leidl, N. McLeod and Joseph Beeks. Present officers: P. C., A. E. Coley; C., George Hyatt; F. K., Wendelin Leidl; record keeper, George Hause; L. C., Guy Hause; S., Guy Spalding.

Ladies of the Maccabees, Goldendale Hive No. 30, established January, 1898, with following charter members: Mary Potter, Calista E. Marshall, Mary A. Burgen, Toinette McLeod, Mary L. Darland, Mary B. Shorter, Mary E. O'Neil, H. S. Goddard, Jessie A. Bennett, Lizette Leidl and Mary E. Fuhrman. Present officers: P. C., Lizette Leidl; commander, Nellie Powers; record keeper, Ada Lear; finance keeper, Mary Coley. Membership, twenty.

Woodmen of the World, Klickitat Lodge No. 127, established January, 1893, with following charter members: Frank Aldrich, James M. Van Hoy, Hugh Jackson, Frank Sanders, D. W. Pierce, Lewis Johnson, W. J. White, William Schuster, J. M. Reeder, J. Hopkins and M. B. Potter. Present officers: C. C., Dr. Bennett; advisor, William Harris; banker, W. H. Ward; clerk, W. J. Reeder; P. C., D. O. Lear. Membership, one hundred and sixty-four.

Women of Woodcraft, Ahola Lodge No. 246, established quite recently, with the following charter members: Louvenia P. Hause, Toinette McLeod, Hattie L. Wade, Laura Gaunt, Sarah A. Beckett, Ella Sloper, Harriett Sunderland, Wilma Nelson, Louvenia Carratt, Adelia L. Nelson, J. W. Reeder, W. M. Sloper, Abbie V. Nelson and Henry Blarratt. Present officers: P. G. N., Ella Thomas; G. N., Deede Nelson; advisor, Mary Harris; magician, Louvenia P. Hause; clerk, Mary Chappell; attendant, Sadie Harris; banker, George Hause. Membership, one hundred and twenty.

United Artisans, Goldendale Assembly No. 33, chartered May 16, 1896, with the following charter members: N. B. Brooks, O. D. Sturgess, Rosa A. Brooks, Frank Aldrich, Clara J. Aldrich, Lulu B. Chapman; chaplain, Mrs. Mary McKenzie; secretary, C. M. Ryman; treasurer, John Smith. Membership, sixty.

Besides these organizations, the city has one G. A. R. post, Baker Post No. 20. There are at present only eighteen members, whose officers are as follows: Commander, J. R. Putman; adjutant, J. A. Stout; quartermaster, E. W. Pike; officer of the day, F. B. Stimson; chaplain, John Kurtz.

BRUIN IN THE SHAMBLES—HUNTING SCENE NEAR MOUNT ADAMS.

THE TOWN OF BICKLETON

BICKLETON.

The central town of eastern Klickitat county is Bickleton. It enjoys an unusually favored location in one of the finest wheat-growing regions of Washington. The same cereals which bring wealth and prosperity to its citizens also add a charm to the landscape in their season, presenting an almost unbroken sea of verdure during the spring and early summer and a sea of gold in the fall. The natural beauty of the country is likely to be the first thing to appeal to him who visits it for the first time, but it has other characteristics which present themselves even to the superficial observer. The broad, regular areas of farming land, green with the growing crops or brown from the action of the plow and cultivator, the miles of well-kept fences, neat farm buildings, and here and there a schoolhouse or a church, all bear eloquent testimony to the energy of the people, and proclaim that, rich though the country may be in natural resources, the prosperity apparent on every hand did not come gratuitously, but is the result of thrift and well-directed effort.

The town, in its characteristics, is akin to the country. As one enters it, the fresh-looking, substantial, well-painted buildings make a favorable impression upon his mind, an impression which further investigation tends only to deepen and confirm. The people will be found alert and progressive, and to possess a certain geniality of disposition which, combined with brightness and intelligence, makes them companionable indeed.

The town is situated upon the upper edge of the prairie at its junction with the pine timber belt of Simcoe mountain. Its altitude is approximately three thousand two hundred and seventy feet. It is about twenty-five hundred feet higher than the valley of the Yakima at Mabton, twenty-three miles northeast, and three thousand feet above the Columbia at Arlington, an equal distance almost due south. While this height above the sea renders the region subject to a much severer winter climate than is found in the lower altitudes, it makes the summers pleasanter and gives healthfulness and innervating power to the atmosphere.

From the timber's edge the famed wheat plateau, at this point thirty-five miles in width, sweeps northeastward seventy miles to the bend of the Columbia river. At Bickleton the view is a commanding one. To the south, beyond the Columbia, the shadowy outlines of the rugged Blue mountain range in Oregon is an ever attractive sight; from a point a little higher up the mountain west of town, the distant peaks of Mts. Jefferson and Hood in Oregon may be seen, while the nearer prospect has a beauty and a charm of its own.

Upon the prepossessing site of Bickleton, Charles N. Bickle, from whom the town derives its name, settled in the month of May, 1879, and soon he had built the first store in the county east of Rock creek. Le Roy Weaver assisted him in the enterprise. Mr. Bickle had come to Alder Creek in 1878, but on account of the Indian troubles had returned temporarily to Goldendale. Owing to the laws in force at that time, Mr. Bickle was unable to secure title to his claim, so his brother-in-law, John Skiller, took the land as a homestead, and from him at an early date Mr. Bickle acquired the property.

Time soon proved that Mr. Bickle had exercised good judgment in selecting a site for his trading post, for the settlers of that region heartily welcomed him and his business. The little store, which stood on the corner near where the town well now is, soon became the trading point of the region for miles around, while the Bickle home furnished shelter and temporary accommodations to many a traveler. The store also became a species of rendezvous for the Indians, who were wont to come either on business or to lounge and engage in sports. In October, 1880, Samuel P. Flower, an Alder Creek pioneer of 1878, joined Mr. Bickle in his enterprise, organizing the firm of Bickle & Flower. The same fall Mr. Flower built a blacksmith shop near the store, which four years later he sold to James C. Sigler. About the same time William Twitchell opened a like business, but he shortly afterward removed it to the newly organized village of Cleveland. Charles E. Flower erected a drug store in 1882, increasing the business houses of Bickleton to four, namely, a general store, a hotel, a blacksmith shop and a pharmacy. That year also Mr. Bickle formally platted his town, while the government did what it could to help along by granting the settlers' petition for a postoffice. C. N. Bickle was its first postmaster.

Bickleton's second general store was erected by J. C. Chamberlain in 1883. He sold out to Robert M. Graham some two years later. In 1885 Dr. Hamilton Blair, the pioneer physician, came to the hamlet, and the next year Harvey Emigh opened the pioneer meat market.

April 27, 1887, the town of Bickleton experienced its first great disaster. About noon of that day fire broke out in Samuel Flower's new dwelling, and before the flames were extinguished, every business house in the town except the blacksmith shop and nearly every dwelling were burned. The aggregate loss was not less than twenty-five thousand dollars, of which Flower & Bickle's loss was fifteen thousand dollars with six thousand dollars insurance, and R. M. Graham's, six thousand dollars with twenty-five hundred dollars insurance.

But the set-back given the town was only temporary in its effect. Ten days after the fire Bickle & Flower were doing business in a tent. Soon Mr. Bickle began the construction of a commodious hotel, while Charles Flower rebuilt his drug store, and several others erected new buildings, all better than those destroyed. In 1892 Charles W. Chapman opened a second general store, but the next year the village lost Samuel P. Flower, who removed to Mabton. However, his brother took his place in the firm of Bickle & Flower.

Since the hard times Bickleton has grown very rapidly, the principal development being during the past five years. It is said that the population has doubled during the last two. This growth has not resulted from any booming, but has been abundantly justified by development in the surrounding country.

Mr. Bickle has long since disposed of his interests in Bickleton and is now residing in the lower Yakima valley. The principal portion of the town site, which consists of about seventy blocks surrounding the intersection of sections fifteen, sixteen, twenty-one and twenty-two, township six north, range twenty east of the Willamette meridian, is now owned by George W. McCredy. Last fall the property owners replatted the site, renamed the streets, and otherwise prepared for incorporation in the near future, and it is expected that the town will very soon be granted corporate powers.

In the year 1880 the settlers around Bickleton organized school district No. 28 and built, by voluntary subscription, a small box schoolhouse, in which, during the winter of 1880-81, about a dozen pupils were instructed by H. C. Hackley. A widow, Mrs. Osborne, taught the second term. About this time the settlers formed a stock company and built a public hall, twenty by forty feet in size, across from Bickle's store. In the course of the next two or three years, all the stock came into the possession of C. N. Bickle and S. P. Flower, who, in 1884, very generously donated the building to the school district. At the same time Mr. Bickle gave an acre of land for school site purposes. Another site was also offered by J. C. Sigler, but not accepted.

To the Bickle site, a commanding knoll on the eastern edge of the town, the old hall was removed, and there it was converted into a schoolhouse. It served the district until 1897, then the building was moved off the land to make room for the present slightly, two-story frame structure. The contract for this building was let for thirteen hundred dollars, but a much better building was constructed than can usually be secured for that amount. Eight grades are taught, seventy pupils in all being enrolled. T. C. Anderson is principal; Miss Jessie Forker, assistant.

By no means an unimportant factor in the town's recent rapid development has been the Bickleton News, established August 2, 1902, by its present proprietor and editor, S. G. Dorris, formerly of Oregon. The first few issues were only in part printed in the town, but gradually the "patent" portion has been reduced, and finally it was discarded altogether. The News occupies a two-story building especially erected for its use, has one of the best equipped country offices in southern Washington, and is an able, progressive, influential paper.

The only bank in the eastern part of Klickitat county is the Bank of Bickleton. This invaluable institution was organized by eastern Klickitat's most substantial business men, farmers and stockmen, August 9, 1903, with a capital of twenty-five thousand dollars, and at the end of a year's growth its affairs are in a highly satisfactory condition. The bank occupies a fine home, costing three thousand dollars, on Market (or Main) street, and is equipped with modern fixtures, a vault, safety deposit lockers, etc. Its business connections are excellent. George W. McCredy, the well-known Bickleton pioneer, is president of the bank; Stephen Matsen, another well-known pioneer, is vice-president, and Samuel A. Rossier, a man of successful experience in the banking business, is cashier.

The town's other business men and institutions are: General store, Clanton, Mitty & Company, composed of George W. McCredy, W. T. Mitty, A. F. Brockman and John McCredy, carrying the largest stock in eastern Klickitat; drug store, Dr. A. F. Brockman; hotel, The Grand, Wilbur C. S. Nye, proprietor; livery stables, Wilbur C. Nye; paints, oils, etc., E. B. Pyle; meat market, Flower & Coleman; blacksmith shops, Miller & McLean, Richardson & Wommack; harness shop, Walter Baker; billiard hall, H. A. Hussey; lumber yard, George W. McCredy; physicians, Dr. A. F. Brockman, Dr. P. C. West; veterinary surgeon, A. D. Robbins; barber shop, E. M. Wristen; contractors, Philip McCully, George W. Jordan, W. F. Keyes; sawmill (on head of Pine creek), George W. McCredy, proprietor; real estate, insurance, Samuel A. Rossier; photographer, John Lodge; stock dealers, Flower & Coleman; postmaster, W. T. Mitty; stage lines, Arlington-Bickleton, daily, operated by George Van Nostern, Mabton-Bickleton, tri-weekly, C. O. Wommack, Cleveland-Bickleton, daily, George Van Nostern, connecting with the Goldendale line.

April 15, 1904, rural free delivery postal route No. 1 was established with headquarters at Bickleton, Roy McMurray, carrier. This route is twenty-nine and one-quarter miles in length and distributes a daily mail to the region lying immediately east, north and west of Bickleton. Other routes have been asked for and will probably be created in the near future.

The first Methodist sermon preached in eastern Klickitat county, R. M. Graham tells us, was preached at his ranch on Alder creek in 1876 by Rev. J. H. Allyn. In the fall of 1880 Mr. Allyn became the first pastor of the Methodist society which was that year organized at Bickleton. The records show that the first church service held was the quarterly meeting, September 18 and 19, 1880, at which Rev. G. C. Roe, presiding elder, officiated, the meeting taking place in the schoolhouse. Robert M. Graham was appointed class leader; Simeon Bolton and H. C. Clark, stewards. Rev. Allyn was succeeded in 1882 by Rev. Richard Barrett, and the latter's place on the circuit was taken in 1884 by Rev. John Ostrander, under whose pastorate the present comfortable, substantial church was erected in 1884. Mr. Bickle donated as a building site four lots in the heart of the town. Rev. J. W. Helm came to the Bickleton circuit in 1885 (he and Rev. F. R. Spalding held the first revival services that year which resulted in twenty additions to the church); the next year Rev. H. F. Williams came; in 1887 Mr. Helm returned, remaining two years, and in 1889 the society built the parsonage. Rev. A. S. Mulligan came to the church in 1889, Rev. T. W. Atkinson in 1892, Rev. Brannon in 1893, Rev. J. W. Rigby in 1894, Rev. G. R. Moorhead in 1895, succeeded for a short period by Rev. J. W. Helm, Rev. C. Ellery in 1897, Rev. H. Moys in 1898, Rev. F. L. Johns in 1900, Rev. G. W. White in 1901, and the present pastor, Rev. S. E. Hornbrook, in September, 1903. Until recently the Bickleton minister had charge of services at Bickleton, the Glade, Enterprise and Pleasant Ridge. Since Mr. Hornbrook assumed charge of the Bickleton church, the membership has increased from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five. They have just raised a hundred dollars with which to improve the parsonage.

Bickleton's other church organization, the First Presbyterian, came into existence April 19, 1903, with the following members: Mr. and Mrs. L. I. Coleman, Mrs. Emma McCredy, Arthur Trenner, Mrs. Sarah Trenner, H. I. Coleman, Mrs. Lavell Coleman, Mrs. Florence Coleman, W. T. Mitty and W. T. Lingo. The society was organized by Rev. James M. Thompson, of North Yakima. Last fall (1903) the Bickleton society erected one of the handsomest and most substantial church buildings in the county, the structure costing twenty-five hundred dollars. Rev. William Douglass assumed the pastorate April 1, 1904, succeeding Rev. J. G. Hodges. The church has thirty-three members.

Seven thriving lodges represent Bickleton in the fraternal world, quite a strong showing for a place of its size. Their names, officers, dates of establishment and other data concerning them are given below:

Excelsior Lodge No. 111, I. O. O. F., was instituted January 1, 1892, by McDonald Pierce, D. D. G. M., with eighteen charter members. Since its establishment the lodge has been served by the following past grands: C. N. Bickle, A. H. Bromley, A. F. Brockman, J. S. Donoho, C. E. Flowers, George W. McCredy, W. F. Mitty, J. C. Nelson, J. C. Sigler, C. E. Skiller, Guy Walling, C. G. Wattenbarger, E. O. Spoon, E. F. Flower, H. I. Coleman, H. Jepson, W. T. Coleman, J. N. Jensen, J. F. Coleman, L. J. Larsen, Chris. Larsen, W. T. Lingo, A. J. Adams, V. W. Harshbarger, Delbert Gunning, John Lodge and Dwight Belknap. At present Excelsior Lodge has forty-seven members, whose officers are: N. G., I. S. Stone; V. G., Chris Ward, Jr.; financial secretary, A. F. Brockman; recording secretary, Delbert Gunning; treasurer, George W. McCredy; trustees, A. F. Brockman, J. C. Nelson, A. Sharrard; A. F. Brockman, D. D. G. M.

Alder Rebekah Lodge No. 80, I. O. O. F., is the only auxiliary lodge in town. It was instituted March 8, 1898, by G. H. Baker, D. D. G. M., with twenty-two charter members, of whom the following were the first officers: Anna E. Brockman, N. G.; Eliza A. Bromley, V. G.; Alice G. Skiller, treasurer; Lizzie C. Donoho, secretary. Since then Eliza A. Bromley, Alice G. Skiller, Alice M. Flower and Belle Cooley have served as noble grands; Mrs. Anna E. Brockman has also served as D. D. G. P. The lodge now has forty-two members; its present officers are: N. G., Ella D. Mitty; V. G., Lulu Sharrard; treasurer, A. W. Sharrard, and secretary, D. Gunning.

Bickleton Camp No. 6,249, Modern Woodmen of America, was instituted with nineteen charter members, March 30, 1899. Its first officers were: A. F. Brockman, V. C.; J. E. Story, W. A.; W. H. Bierwell, banker; H. H. Flower, clerk; E. O. Spoon, escort; Ezra Miller, watchman; E. E. Collins, sentry; J. E. Story, D. S. Jordan, R. Dorothy, managers; examiner, Dr. A. F. Brockman. Since then D. S. Jordan and O. J. Wommack have served as consuls. This camp now as a membership of fifty; its officers are: V. C., A. F. Brockman; W. A., D. S. Jordan; banker, W. D. Hoisington; clerk, S. G. Dorris; escort, J. G. Hoisington; watchman, J. C. Richardson; sentry, P. P. Chamberlain; managers, R. Dorothy, E. Gleason and G. W. Jordan; examiner, A. F. Brockman.

Bickleton Homestead No. 420, Brotherhood of American Yeomen, was instituted by W. J. Lippord, December 27, 1899, with sixteen charter members, of whom the following were chosen as the first officers: A. F. Brockman, foreman; R. Cousin, overseer; E. E. Collins, correspondent; P. Matsen, M. C.; J. N. Jensen, M. A.; A. Hansen, guard; R. Peterson, watchman. The present corps of officers is: Foreman, A. F. Brockman, who has served continuously since 1899; overseer, J. Pendl; correspondent, Robert M. Graham; M. C., P. Matsen; M. A., J. N. Jensen; guard, Dule Shattuck; watchman, R. Peterson. The lodge has twenty-three members.

Simcoe Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias, with fourteen charter members, was instituted by Nelson B. Brooks, D. D. G. C., January 2, 1899, and the following chosen as its first officers: Richard Buckley, P. P. C.; E. Clanton, C. C.; S. Cooley, V. C.; E. Demond, P.; Isaac Van Nostern, M. of W.; J. Noblet, K. R. S.; T. H. Hooker, M. of E.; George Van Nostern, M. of F.; F. W. Sanders, M. of A.; E. Hooker, I. G.; J. Hooker, O. G. The roll of past chancellors includes Richard Buckley, Edward Clanton, S. Cooley, T. H. Hooker, Joseph Noblet, F. W. Sanders, A. F. Brockman, George Van Nostern and H. H. Faulkner. At present Simcoe Lodge has twenty-seven members, and its officers are as follows: C. C., A. F. Brockman; V. C., J. G. Hoisington; P., J. E. Shoveland; M. of W., Isaac Van Nostern; K. R. S., Richard Buckley; M. of E., T. H. Hooker; M. of F., F. W. Sanders; M. of A., George Van Nostern; I. G., O. J. Wommack; O. G., C. A. Zypf; trustees, Richard Buckley, O. J. Wommack, C. A. Zypf; D. D. G. C., F. W. Sanders.

Bunchgrass Lodge No. 81, Ancient Order of United Workmen, was established in February, 1897, with a charter membership of twenty-four. J. W. Rogers became the lodge's first master workman; James Nelson, its second. The lodge now has twenty-six members. Its officers are: Past master workman, James Story; master workman, Stephen Matsen; foreman, T. H. Hooker; financier, E. F. Flower; recorder, J. W. Rogers; overseer, Chris. Larsen; receiver, J. N. Jensen.

Wheatland Union No. 175, Order of Washington, was instituted January 14, 1903, by Captain Leonard, its charter roll containing the names of eighteen members. The lodge has twenty-three members at present. Its first and present corps of officers is as follows: President, A. F. Brockman; vice-president, J. Piendl; treasurer, Anna E. Brockman; secretary, S. It is estimated by reliable authorities that in 1903 the region within a radius of ten miles of Bickleton raised five hundred thousand bushels of wheat, besides a large amount of barley and oats and some hay. The wheat sold at an average price of between sixty-five and seventy cents a bushel, from which it will be seen that the grain product alone brought the farmers of the wheat region more than three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The crop was only an average one. Fully fifty thousand head of sheep are owned by Bickleton residents and grazed in this region; also hundreds of neat cattle.

The business men of Bickleton may feel secure in the knowledge that, with a surrounding country of such capabilities, their town will never lack an abundant support. Its growth in future may be slow, as it has been in the past, but it can hardly fail to be steady and substantial. Although the town will probably never gain, unless something unforeseen happens, a rank among the larger cities of the state, it will, at no distant day, hold a place among the best of the secondary cities of Washington. Let us hope that as its wealth and its population increase, it will lose none of the geniality and good-fellowship which to-day appeal so strongly to the sojourner within its bounds.

CLEVELAND.

The second town founded in eastern Klickitat and one of that section's present important trading centers is Cleveland, situated near the head of Wood gulch. Bickleton lies three miles east; Goldendale, thirty miles southwest. With both these places Cleveland has stage connections, as also with Arlington, Oregon. Arthur Hale operates the tri-weekly stage to Goldendale; George Van Nostern, the daily stage between Bickleton and Cleveland and between Cleveland and Arlington.

Cleveland has a pretty location in a sort of basin on the lower border of the pine forest of the Simcoe mountains, with an open plateau stretching to the southward. Comfortable farm buildings and well-cultivated fields cover the prairie, evincing the presence of a thrifty farming population, the source of Cleveland's prosperity. As elsewhere in the eastern end of the county, wheat-growing is the principal industry, stock-raising coming next in importance.

The town of Cleveland had its first feeble beginnings in 1880 or 1881 (the date cannot be certainly determined), when S. Lowenberg, a Goldendale merchant, established a branch store upon the site of the present town. The land was then held as a homestead by a man named Ripley Dodge, who settled upon it about the year 1879. It is officially described as the southeast quarter of section thirty, township six north, range twenty east. Mr. Dodge opened a hotel soon after, and later, in the same year, Frank Remington opened another store near Lowenberg's, but he abandoned the field the following fall, going to Arlington. In the spring of 1881, if Edward Morris' memory of the date is correct, a blacksmith shop was opened on Dodge's farm by William Twitchell.

Mr. Lowenberg had not been long in the town before he had secured the establishment of a postoffice and an appointment as the first postmaster. But he stayed in Cleveland only a year, selling out at the end of that time to James L. Chamberlain, who also succeeded to the office of postmaster.

About this time Mr. Dodge formally laid out the town, naming it Cleveland, in honor of Ohio's great city, Mr. Dodge having been a native of that state. Before this time the settlement had been called Dodgetown. In 1895, just previous to his death, Mr. Dodge sold the site to William A. McCredy, who still owns it. Mr. Chamberlain remained at Cleveland a short time, then sold out his interests, moved to Prosser, and became the pioneer merchant of that town. Another of Cleveland's early business men was David Mason, who kept a drug store there for a short time during the eighties; still another was George Merton, the founder of a small general store. The latter sold out subsequently to Millard Hackley, who in turn sold to Hiram Bloome. Archibald Dodge, whose store was opened about 1882; J. J. Purviance, who erected a furniture store in 1883, and Charles McLean, who started the blacksmith shop that subsequently became the property of George Merton, are also to be mentioned among Cleveland's pioneer business men.

The thrifty little town suffered a disastrous misfortune, Thursday morning, September 24, 1896, when fire swept nearly the whole business portion out of existence. About daybreak the fire started in Bloome's livery barn, and, fanned by a strong wind, it was soon beyond control. The business houses destroyed were: Hiram Bloome's general store, livery barn, warehouse and blacksmith shop, loss five thousand dollars; Will G. Faulkner's furniture store, loss five hundred dollars; Paul Beck's hall, and Sherman Cooley's blacksmith shop. Little insurance was carried. A general belief prevails that this appalling fire was of incendiary origin. Courtnay's store was saved; also the grist-mill, which had been built by Henry C. Hackley in 1890 and had added greatly to the town's prosperity.

Many fires of less magnitude have visited the place at different times, the last one, which occurred April 9, 1904, destroying W. A. McCredy's hotel. John Van Nostern, a boy asleep in the hotel when the fire started, had a narrow escape from the flames. So rapidly did the fire progress that within thirty minutes from the beginning the building and its contents were a mass of ruins. The loss was twenty-five hundred dollars, covered by five hundred and fifty dollars insurance.

Notwithstanding the terrible blow received by the town in 1896, Cleveland was quickly rebuilt and soon regained its former prosperity. Since then its progress has been steady, though slow. At present its business enterprises are as follows: The Cleveland roller mills, owned by Samuel St. Clair, a new thirty-barrel roller system plant, operated by steam, manufacturing several brands of flour, feed, etc.; general stores, Van Nostern Brothers, James and Isaac; drugs, T. Z. Dodson; harness and groceries, Charles M.

Beck & Son (C. A.); meat market, Charles A. Beck; hotels, The McCredy, William A. McCredy, proprietor, The Cottage, Mrs. Ida Eddy, proprietor; hardware, furniture, Will G. Faulkner; livery, William A. McCredy; blacksmith shop, S. A. Jory; jewelry store, Leonard Jenkins; physician, Dr. T. Z. Dodson; contractor, George Faulkner; postmaster, James Van Nostern; United States commissioner, Will G. Faulkner; two public halls.

The town possesses an excellent school taught at present by Theodore Rolf. Next winter the district expects to employ two teachers, as more than fifty pupils are enrolled. The pioneers of Cleveland organized district No. 30 in the year 1882, erecting a commodious frame schoolhouse, in which Miss Sadie Murphy taught the first school that fall. This old building was replaced in 1898 by a fine structure costing twelve hundred dollars. The site chosen is a pretty and commanding one upon the pine-clad hillside north of the business district. The officers of Cleveland school district are Thomas N. Talbert, J. W. Weer, Will G. Faulkner, directors; Will G. Faulkner, clerk.

The Cleveland Presbyterian church society was organized in 1884, through the efforts of Rev. L. J. Thompson, with the following original members: Rev. L. J. Thompson, Mrs. Nettie Twitchell, Mrs. A. A. Faulkner, Mrs. Isaac Clark, Mrs. Mary Baker, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Purviance, and one or two others whose names could not be learned. The manse was immediately built, and two years later a church was erected at a cost of perhaps eight hundred dollars, Ripley Dodge donating a block to the society for building purposes. Revs. Samuel Meyer, B. F. Harper, A. J. Adams, J. C. Templeton, John Day, R. B. Hodge, J. G. Hodges, and the present pastor, Rev. William Douglass, who came April 1, 1904, have successively served the church. There are eighteen members connected with the Cleveland church. The Bickleton and Dot churches are also presided over by Mr. Douglass.

Two fraternal orders have lodges at Cleveland, the Order of Washington and Knights of the Loyal Guard. Klickitat Union No. 185, O. of W., was organized in December, 1902, with sixteen charter members. Its principal officers are: Past president, Henry Hackley; president, Will G. Faulkner; recording secretary, Joseph Noblet, and treasurer, James Van Nostern. The Knights of the Loyal Guard lodge is three years old and has a large membership. Both lodges are in a flourishing condition.

CENTERVILLE.

Situated in the richest section of the rich Klickitat valley and encompassed by picturesque scenes of grandeur is the little town of Centerville. It is located on a slight elevation along-side of what is known as the Swale, a tract of rich bottom land about five by ten miles in area, and for miles in every direction it is surrounded by the rolling farm lands of the Klickitat valley. Centerville is on the line of the Columbia River & Northern railroad, about thirty-two miles from the terminus at Lyle and seven miles from Goldendale. A stranger in this town is first attracted by the beauty of its surroundings. The low-lying valley with its fields of golden grain, the rugged Columbia hills to the southward, the timber-covered Simcoe range to the north, away to the west the Cascades with their giant snow-capped peaks, all unite to form a picture of marvelous beauty.

The site of the present town was taken as a pre-emption by Albert J. Brown in 1877. Two years later Charles Pomeroy built a blacksmith shop there, and in 1882 Mr. Brown secured the location of a postoffice at that point and named the place Centerville. During the fall of the next year J. B. Golden and W. T. Wallace each built a general merchandise store there, and Levi Clanton started a blacksmith shop. In 1884 Albert J. Brown sold out the town site to J. B. Golden. As early as 1878 a Methodist church was erected on the town site, and in 1884 the Catholics built a small chapel. A livery stable and a small shoe store were also added that year, then for more than half a decade there was little change in the town.

In 1890, however, Curtis, Buford & Company added another general merchandise store, and on August 3d of the same year, Frank Lee started an independent weekly newspaper, the Klickitat Leader.

About this time the town began to take on a thrifty appearance, as a short extract from the newly-founded Leader shows: "Centerville, in the central part of the county, is a prosperous, thriving little city, whose citizens are noted for their enterprize and push. They now have three churches, a large schoolhouse, several stores, blacksmith shops and other places necessary to draw a large share of trade to the city. The sales of several merchants have run as high as seven hundred dollars a day."

A few years ago a disastrous fire broke out in J. R. Harvey's blacksmith shop and destroyed most of the business houses on the south side of the main street. Besides the shop, two hotels and two stores were consumed in the flames, and only the brave fight of the townsmen prevented the destruction of the entire town, as there was no water supply in the place. But the town soon recovered from the fire, and it has enjoyed a steady growth ever since.

The necessity of a water supply has been continually upon the minds of the people. To provide a water system in an unincorporated town is a rather difficult thing, as there is no provision by which taxes can be levied to secure the funds necessary to defray the expense. Few towns have been so fortunate in this respect as was the little city of Centerville. By a combination of circumstances, a forty-acre tract of government land was left unclaimed, although it lay on the very borders of the town. The tract naturally became valuable. Finally, the government sold it at auction to the highest bidder and turned the money over to the town, in all one thousand seven hundred and forty dollars. It was decided at a meeting of citizens that this money could not be expended for a better purpose than for providing a water supply, and work upon a system was in due time commenced. The plant is not completed at this writing, but a well has been dug, a tank built and the necessary pumping outfit provided. All that now remains to be done is the laying of water mains and the necessary plumbing.

Before the establishment of the town there was a school in the community, and as early as 1884 the census enumeration for the district showed eighty-two children, with a school attendance of sixty-four. There is now a large, two-room, graded school in the district, and two teachers are employed. The directors are T. N. Crofton, Kelly Loe and U. F. Abshier. The schoolhouse was erected about thirteen years ago.

A Methodist church was built in the community as early as 1878, and a Catholic church in 1884. Since that time the Christian denomination has been organized and has erected a church building. The only organization that has a resident pastor is the Methodist, of which Rev. Ira E. Webster is in charge. The pulpits of the other churches are filled by outside ministers.

Not quite two years ago a weekly newspaper was established in the town. As previously stated, a paper had been published in Centerville as early as 1890, but it suspended publication after a few years. When it became evident that the railroad through the valley was a certainty, Kelly Loe was induced to undertake the publication of a newspaper, the Journal. There is also a race-track association organized, and grounds have been laid out adjoining the town on the south side with a half-mile track and a baseball ground. There is a large public hall in the town, owned by an incorporated company, known as the A. O. U. W. Company. Previous to the suspension of the militia company in 1895, this was used as a drill room; now it is utilized as a meeting-place for the fraternal organizations and as a public hall.

There are five fraternities represented in Centerville, of which Klickitat Lodge No. 34, A. O. U. W., established in January, 1891, is the oldest. The following are the names of its charter members:

F. L. Hulery, D. B. Gaunt, Ed. Judy, E. S.

Smith, John Shoemaker, A. G. Ward, G. B. St. Lawrence, C. M. Curtis, Sherman Cooley, Peter Shoemaker, G. F. Martin, G. M. Smith, E. E. Brooks, R. M. Merryman, James Wheelhouse, N. M. Brownlie, George E. Stoughton, Henry Layman, James Doupney and J. H. Wilder.

The Knights of Pythias have a local organization known as Mt. Adams Lodge No. 95, established May, 1893, with the following charter members: Will H. Hodson, A. R. Graham, Fred V. Vunk, W. T. Rhodes, Otis Campbell, A. L. Bunnell, Charles F. Jackal, Ed. Clanton, Fred Lucas, Fred T. Axtell, Charles S. Baker, A. C. Short, W. Smith, Thomas Crofton, J. H. Smith, C. McKillip, William B. Campbell, Milo Moser, J. H. Wagner, G. W. Billington, Robert McKillip, George Crofton, Cyrus Guy.

The Modern Woodmen of America, Bonanza Camp No. 9,374, was established March 14, 1901, with the following charter members: Peter Ahola, Fred W. Bold, J. T. Carpenter, John W. Hagan, Frank W. Johnson, John C. Kidra, Henry Lauhouse, August L. Matsen, John M. Mulligan, Singleton D. Smith, John F. Thompson, Edward M. Tobin, John B. Watson, William Wallman, Charles Wiedaner, I. A. Gilmore, Elias Hamlin, H. H. Hartley.

The Woodmen of the World order is represented by Centerville Camp No. 143. Jacob Crocker, C. C.; W. B. Hayden, clerk. This lodge has an auxiliary, Woodmen of Woodcraft, Ambers Circle No. 156. Cora Smith, G. N.; W. B. Hayden, clerk.

The following is a list of the business houses and business men of the town:

General merchandise, T. N. Crofton, W. B. Hayden; hardware, U. F. Abshier; hotels, Klondyke, T. N. Crofton, proprietor, Royal, T. A. Finch, proprietor; feed store, C. B. Runyan; clothing store, Joseph Cohen; butcher shop, D. C. Smith; livery stables, T. N. Crofton, Elias Hamlin; blacksmith shops, Levi Clanton, J. R. Harvey; planing mill, Peter Ahola; telegraph and express office.

Surrounded as it is by a rich and prosperous farming district, and now enjoying a line of rapid transportation to the coast, Centerville seems to possess certain sure elements of growth. It already has a population of about two hundred and fifty inhabitants, and as the surrounding valley is built up, the town cannot help but increase in population. Much of the wheat that once went to The Dalles is now hauled to the railroad at Centerville, whose warehouses contained at one time as much as eighty thousand bushels awaiting shipment. It will always be an important shipping point of the Klickitat valley.

WHITE SALMON.

The most striking features of Klickitat's extreme western river settlement, White Salmon, are its surpassing beauty of location, its healthfulness and the special adaptability of its soil and climate to horticulture. Although the oldest settlement in the county is at this point, the district's development has been very slow, and only in recent years have its rich natural advantages been really appreciated by home-seekers. However, White Salmon is now rapidly forging to the front. It is the county's banner fruit district, and is rapidly winning a reputation as at least the equal of Hood River, Oregon, in the high quality of its horticultural products.

Nowhere along the great river is the scenery more strikingly impressive than at White Salmon, almost directly north of Mount Hood and opposite Hood River. It is said by those acquainted with Balch, that he drew much of his inspiration while writing the "Bridge of the Gods" from the region surrounding White Salmon and Hood River, in which settlements he served several years as a Congregational minister. At any rate, it is generally conceded that the scenery at this point surpasses that at any other along the Columbia.

The town of White Salmon is situated upon the high basaltic bluff that leaves the river bottom a few rods from the water's edge and reaches upward almost perpendicularly six hundred feet. From the river these gently-sloping timbered heights to the southward are indeed picturesque. The village nestles among the oaks near the edge of the bluff, and numerous farm buildings are to be seen around it, while lower down, upon the lowlands bordering the shore, the extensive strawberry and orchard tracts are a no less pleasing sight.

At the boat landing one is perhaps a mile east of the mouth of White Salmon river, the county's western boundary. Leaving the landing, one may follow the road back a quarter of a mile to the foot of the towering cliff, then up a long though easy ascent to the plateau above, or, if he choose, he may save a considerable walk, or ride, by climbing a flight of four hundred and fifty steps, built recently by the citizens of the town. By either route, however, the hill is soon scaled and the little village reached.

As he mounts upward and looks out upon the grand panorama spread before him, the climber is recompensed a hundred-fold for his unusual physical exertion, for the Columbia at this point in the month of June, when the green of earth, the blue of cloudless sky and the white of snow-clad mountain peaks appear to best advantage, forms, with its environs, one of the grandest scenes in America. Here the famed banks of the Hudson are equaled in their quiet, restful beauty, and greatly surpassed in grandeur. Hundreds of feet below the view-point flows the majestic river through its wide canyon—for a valley can scarcely be said to exist. The blue-green tinted waters under the rays of the sun appear at times like a great lake of molten glass, at times they sparkle like gems or quiver in the wind, or are lashed into white-capped billows by the stiffening breeze, but they are ever majestic, ever beautiful. More than twenty-five miles of shore line may be seen, from historic Mimaluse island above one's view-point to the Cascade locks, twenty miles below.

Just across the river lies the noted town of Hood River, Oregon, and behind it upon much higher ground the valley which bears the same name, dotted with homes and farm buildings. A dozen river towns may be seen along the line of the O. R. & N. railroad on the Oregon bank, while the hillsides on either shore, both up and down the river, are sprinkled with smaller settlements and individual homes. To the west the forest-covered summit of the Cascades rises in ragged lines, dividing two states, each into two distinct physical divisions. But the crowning glory of the region is Mount Hood, thirty miles southeast of White Salmon, yet appearing almost at hand, so vividly does it loom up against the sky. Its magnificent proportions are awe-inspiring, its coloring is grand, its glistening, changeless peak, eleven thousand one hundred and fifty feet above the Columbia, never loses its power to enthrall.

Directly north of White Salmon, shut out from sight by the foothills, is Mount Adams, fifty miles away. Between it and the river is a considerable farming and stock-raising country, all of which is reached most conveniently from White Salmon. These settlements include Camas Prairie, Glenwood, Trout Lake, Pulda, Gilmer and Pine Flat. Two lines of stages are operated between White Salmon and these points; in fact, White Salmon is the gateway to the whole interior region. The Bingen settlement lies on the river just east of White Salmon and is closely affiliated with the latter commercially and socially.

Practically all the cultivated region in and around the town is devoted to horticulture, principally to the production of strawberries. A careful estimate places the number of acres in the White Salmon district devoted to strawberries at nearly two hundred, while as great an area is producing apples, cherries, peaches, grapes and other fruits. Steamboat Agent Gladden estimates that White Salmon ships annually 10,000 crates of strawberries, 10,000 cases of tomatoes, full half as many boxes of apples, between 2,000 and 3,000 sacks of potatoes, and 1,000 boxes of peaches, besides large amounts of other products. Trout Lake is at present shipping through White Salmon 1,800 pounds of cheese and 1,000 pounds of butter a week. In December, 1903, the freight receipts at this point were $160; in May, 1904, the amount reached $900. These figures are more eloquent than a volume of description in showing the wealth and productiveness of the region, which is a comparatively small one in tillable area.

Because of its location in the mountains amid groves of pine and oak and beside the great stream of swiftly-moving water, the region is one of the healthiest that can be imagined. Pure water, pure air, sunshine and cooling breezes and a comparatively even temperature are all characteristic of the place and really fit it for a health resort. The winters are mild and short, owing to the low altitude; the summers delightful in every respect.

White Salmon, the town, is of recent origin, though the settlement is the oldest in the county, Erastus S. Joslyn and his wife having come to what is now known as the Byrketts ranch in 1852. However, the growth of the community was slow, largely due to the absence of transportation facilities. About 1868, as near as can be learned, the few settlers there obtained a postoffice, J. R. Warner becoming the first postmaster. He lived two and a half miles east of town, or at what is now Bingen Landing, then called Warner's Landing. The postoffice was maintained there, according to the statement of A. H. Jewett, a pioneer of the year 1874, until 1880, when Jacob H. Hunsaker established the community's pioneer store and succeeded Douglass Suksdorf as postmaster. Hunsaker built his store upon the site now occupied by C. M. Wolfard's store in the town of White Salmon, and with it the present town had its beginning.

In 1891 G. A. Thomas opened a store on the Camas Prairie road, a quarter of a mile above Hunsaker's place. Thomas conducted his store until 1903, when it was consolidated with Wolfard's. A. S. Blowers succeeded Hunsaker in 1892, Rudolph Lauterbach succeeded Blowers two years later, then L. C. Morse became storekeeper and postmaster. Subsequently Wolfard & Bone bought out Morse, and finally the property and postmastership passed into the hands of C. M. Wolfard. Mr. Wolfard is still the town's postmaster. He also keeps a general store.

With the development of the district's strawberry industry, during the latter part of the nineties, came a rapid settlement, creating a strong demand for a town upon the Washington shore. So in the fall of 1901 A. H. Jewett purchased the old Cameron farm of Ward Brothers and platted the present town of White Salmon. The land was originally a portion of a railroad section, but was acquired by R. Hanson in the seventies. He later transferred the claim to Ronald D. Cameron. After platting the town, Mr. Jewett at once began the installation of a fine water system which is now nearly completed. He uses a Rife hydraulic pump capable of raising ten gallons a minute, two hundred and twenty feet high through a half mile of pipe. The water is pumped from a large spring, north of the church, and distributed by a system of wooden and iron mains.

In the fall of 1902 Frank Broshong opened a blacksmith shop on the townsite; Crow & Gearhart built a drug store in September, 1903; A. J. Rath next established a variety store, and then the hotel and other business houses at present constituting the town were erected and opened for trade in rapid succession. The town's business houses are, therefore, all new and, be it said to the people's credit, substantial and well equipped. They may be listed as follows:

Two general stores, C. M. Wolfard and Bal-siger Brothers; hotel, Hyting Brothers; clothing, men's furnishings, J. A. Fanning; drugs, L. J. Wolfard; brickyard, A. H. Jewett, proprietor, capacity, eight thousand a day; meat market, C. S. Bancroft; dry goods, notions, Mrs. Jennie Green; jewelry store, E. H. Dreske; confection-ery, M. C. Fox; blacksmiths, Frank Broshong, James Hancock; real estate dealers, J. W. Eberhart, Harlan & Crow; contractors, (F. L.) Rose-grant & (O. W.) Eberhart. Dr. J. W. Gearhart is the town's physician; Dr. M. A. Jones, its dentist.

The White Salmon Enterprise, a neatly printed weekly, was established by Thomas Harlan, May 8, 1903, and in its existence of a little more than a year it has met with a gratifying success.

This summer J. W. Lauterbach is erecting in White Salmon a modern hotel, to be complete in all its appointments and to cost at least ten thousand dollars. The hotel cannot but lend a considerable impetus to the community's growth.

The attractive Jewett resort, situated on the heights half a mile east of town, is certainly worthy of mention. Here Mr. Jewett, pioneer and owner of the town site, has laid out grounds and gardens surrounding his home that surely rival any to be found on the Columbia, and when the natural forest on the farm is transformed into parks and his new building is erected, both of which improvements are contemplated, Jewett resort will be a much frequented place.

White Salmon landing was built eight years ago at a cost of two thousand dollars, subscribed in labor and money by the settlers on the Washington shore. In March, 1903, they gave the improvements to The Dalles, Portland & Astoria Navigation Company, with the understanding that the corporation was to maintain them. This company, better known as the Regular company, operates four passenger steamers, the Bailey Gatzert, Regulator, Dalles City and Sadie B., and three other freight and passenger boats, the Hercules, Tahoma and the Met-lako, all of which call regularly at White Salmon, giving the town a daily service. The Charles R. Spencer also calls daily at White Salmon, besides which there is a ferry plying between there and Hood River. To The Dalles, the distance by river is twenty-one and a half miles; to Portland, ninety-three. J. R. Gladden took charge of the White Salmon office for the Regular line last December. To him acknowledgments are due for much information and many courtesies.

As nearly as can be learned, the White Salmon school district was organized about 1876. Two schoolhouses were built, one near Salmon falls, the other on the present townsite. An old German named Levison was the pioneer school teacher, teaching first at the falls, then at the other building. The next school was held in a cabin on Jewett's place. The district was divided in 1880, and that year the White Salmon district proper built a new schoolhouse at a cost of five hundred dollars. This building is now being replaced by a four-room structure, having a stone basement and furnace. To erect it the district issued eighteen hundred dollars in bonds last spring. Professor C. L. Colburn and Miss Georgia Johnson constitute the staff of teachers; the school board is composed of S. C. Ziegler, S. W. Condon and J. P. Jensen.

White Salmon has one church, Bethel Congregational, the only Congregational church in the county. Bethel church was organized May 7, 1879, by Rev. George H. Atkinson, with Mrs. J. R. Warner, Mrs. Cynthia E. Warner, Mrs. Arabella Jewett, A. J. Thompson, John Purser, Mrs. Mary Purser, George Swan, Mrs. Mary Anne Swan and Mrs. Martha Purser, as its first members. The following September a site was chosen within the present town limits, and the commodious edifice still in use was erected. Dr. Atkinson dedicated the building October 26, 1879, in the presence of forty-six people. Rev. U. Lyman came to the church from Forest Grove in 1880, then Rev. E. P. Roberts supplied the pulpit for a short time, and the next fall Rev. U. S. Lyman, of Oberlin, Ohio, assumed the pastorate. Rev. F. H. Balch, who later became widely known as the author of "The Bridge of the Gods," occupied the pulpit of Bethel church during the years 1884 and 1885, at the same time serving Congregational churches at Lyle and Hood River. Bethel church was reorganized in March, 1901, since which time Revs. U. S. Drake and L. Cone Garrison, the present pastor, have been resident ministers. During the past year, under Mr. Garrison's leadership, the church has erected a fine parsonage costing eight hundred dollars.

LYLE.

There are few small towns more favorably located both from a natural and a business standpoint than the little village of Lyle at the terminus of the Columbia River & Northern railroad. Situated as it is, at the point where the Klickitat river adds its waters to the Columbia, it is the natural railroad outlet for the whole Klickitat valley. It is also the only port of any importance in the county, with the one exception of White Salmon, that has unobstructed navigation to Portland. With these points of advantage in its favor, Lyle will naturally develop in a very few years into a city of considerable importance.

At an early date James O. Lyle perceived that this location had advantages which would some day lead to its development into an important trade center, and in May, 1878, he purchased the site of the present town from J. M. Williamson. Two years later he laid off the town and named it Lyle. In 1878 a postoffice had been established at that place, known as Klickitat Landing, but after the town was platted, the postoffice also took the name of Lyle. James O. Lyle built a store on the new townsite, and Joseph Clark also started a store there and ran it about two years. The next store was started upon the hill about two miles northwest of town by Mrs. Hensen. The third store in the town proper was that of Collins Elkins, who built in 1897. He sold out recently. In 1898 John Kure erected the Riverside hotel; two years later another store was built by McInnis McLeod, and shortly afterward another hotel by John Daffron.

As soon as work on the Columbia River & Northern railroad was commenced in 1902, the town received a new impetus, and it has been steadily growing ever since. The chief drawback to its growth has been the fact that until recently it was impossible to buy a building site, as the town property was withheld from sale by the Balfours, who bought out Mr. Lyle in 1892. These gentlemen sold all the land lying between the river and the railroad to the Columbia River & Northern Railroad Company, a short time ago, however, for twenty-two thousand dollars, and this tract has been placed on the market at from two hundred and fifty to five hundred dollars a lot, so that the greatest obstacle to progress has been removed. The Balfours still own all the land along the north side of the tract.

Adjoining the town on the north is the large stock farm of Balfour & Magan, embracing about twelve hundred acres of land, much of which is valuable only as a cattle range. About ten acres are devoted to a prune and pear orchard, and the farm is provided with a drier where the prunes are prepared for shipment. On the place are also about sixty-five acres of alfalfa which yields well, notwithstanding the fact that the ground is not irrigated.

Owing to its location at the mouth of the Klickitat river, the town of Lyle has an abundance of water and unused power, the falls of the Klickitat being only three miles away. Here a large volume of water is forced through a narrow chasm, furnishing an abundance of unharassed power. It is probable that in past ages the water at this point fell sheer over the face of the rock for some distance, but as years went by the rock was worn away until little more than a rapids remains. With a reasonable outlay this power, now allowed to go to waste, can be utilized either in operating the Columbia River & Northern railroad or for turning the wheels of industry in the town of Lyle, or both.

The canyon of the Klickitat is one of the grandest and most picturesque along the Columbia. On either side the grass-clad hills rise a thousand feet above the bed of the river, along which the railroad winds in graceful curves. At times the scene changes and a magnificent thicket of green scrub oaks crowns the hills with verdure, while below the rushing stream dashes madly down the canyon. This stream, notwithstanding the swift current, is the home of many fine fish, a fact which, combined with many other advantages of the region, may cause Lyle to become in the near future a popular summer resort.

The principal exports from the town of Lyle are grain, cattle, sheep, lumber, fruit, both green and dried, vegetables and dairy products. Since the building of the Columbia River & Northern railroad practically all goods brought into the Klickitat valley and all products taken out of it are shipped through Lyle.

An interesting fact about the town of Lyle is that F. H. Balch, the author of that famous story, based on Indian tradition, "The Bridge of the Gods," was born in the immediate vicinity of the town. Many of the people now living in that neighborhood knew him well during his youth and early manhood. They describe him as a man of slight frame and delicate constitution; altogether a very ordinary person, in whom they could detect very few indications of genius. They are inclined to believe that he is very much over-estimated and that the popularity he has received is for the most part due to the local color of the book. It is generally conceded, however, that he was well informed on the traditions and legends of the Indian. Those were his favorite theme in conversation, and he spent much time in reading and studying Indian customs and habits. As most of his life was spent along the Columbia river, he had an excellent opportunity to study the country of which he wrote. The island burial-place of the red men lies just beyond Lyle, and only a few miles further down the river is the site of the supposed natural bridge, which was the chief subject of Balch's romance. After his death, F. H. Balch was brought back to Lyle and his remains are buried in the old cemetery near the home of his youth.

Three years ago a school was organized in Lyle, but no building has as yet been erected. Plans are now under consideration, however, for the building of a schoolhouse, and there is also a movement on foot to organize and build a Methodist church, grounds for which the company that owns the townsite has already donated. The only fraternity represented in the town is the Modern Woodmen of America, of which Estes Lodge No. 9,502 was established in April, 1901.

The following is a list of the business houses in Lyle: General merchandise, Collins Elkins and the Lyle Trading Company, McInnis McLeod, proprietor; hotel, the Lyle, John Daffron, proprietor; livery stable, John Daffron; blacksmith shop, Albert B. French.

There are few towns on the upper Columbia that have brighter prospects for future growth than this interesting little settlement at the mouth of the Klickitat, and if ever a railroad is built down the north bank of the river, so that Lyle will have direct communication by rail with the outside world, the development of the little town on the banks of the Columbia will surely be great indeed.

POSTOFFICES.

The Postal Guide of 1903 gives the postoffices in Klickitat as follows: Bickleton, Bingen, Blockhouse, Centerville, Cleveland, Columbus, Expansion, Firwood, Fulda, Furman, Glenwood, Goldendale, Grand Dalles, Guler, Hartland, Huit, Husum, Jersey, Lucus, Lyle, Patterson, Pleasant, Snowden, Teller and White Salmon. At most of them are a general store and a blacksmith shop, around which has grown up a thickly settled community. Many of them have excellent sites and may some day develop into thriving towns.

YAKIMA COUNTY

PART III.

HISTORY OF YAKIMA COUNTY

CHAPTER I.

CURRENT HISTORY—1860-1877.

No attempt shall here be made to determine who first of the trappers and fur traders whose operations have been briefly outlined in previous pages visited the Yakima country. Neither is it practicable to detail the wanderings and vicissitudes of these nomadic traffickers within the limits of the territory forming the subject-matter of this volume, for at the time of their operations territorial, state or county lines had not been drawn, and there is a haziness about such meager accounts as have come down to us, which makes it difficult at times to determine with certainty just where a given event took place. So far as known no sectional history of the fur trade has ever been attempted, and it is doubtful whether any such could be successfully compiled. The historian of the fur trade, to produce a readable work, must do as did Washington Irving in describing the adventures of Bonneville, follow in his narrative the wanderings of his nomadic hero wheresoever they may lead him.

All sojournings by these nomadic merchants were of a temporary character, and though a small fort was built by the Hudson's Bay Company on the banks of the upper Columbia, the purpose of it and of every other establishment made by them was to drain the country of its wealth of peltry, not to develop its latent resources.

More noble in the motives which impelled them hither, though not more potent to effect anything like an industrial development of the country or any part of it, were the zealous Jesuit priests who first made their appearance among the aborigines of central Washington. In recent years a contest was had affecting the title to four hundred and forty-seven acres of land in Yakima county adjoining the present Yakima Indian reservation, which tract was claimed by Catholics by virtue of their having a mission established upon it prior to the organization of Washington territory and the passage of the Organic Act containing a proviso that title to lands not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, occupied at that date (March 2, 1853) for mission purposes, should be confirmed to the religious society to which said missionary station belonged. The testimony in this contest showed that a mission was established in the spring of 1852 by Fathers Chironse and Herlomez. The Ahtanum mission, as it came to be called, was maintained until the outbreak of the war of 1855, the progress of which forced its abandonment. The mission house was burned in November of that year by the regulars under Major Rains and volunteers under Colonel Nesmith, the reason for this destruction of property, it is said, being that the Catholic missionaries were supposed to have sympathized with and aided the Indians. Father Pandozy is mentioned as one of the priests who was in the country at the time of the war.

There is one man now living within the limits of Yakima county who looked upon its crystal streams, sage brush hills and beautiful mountains as early as 1853. It is believed that to him belongs the honor of having passed through it at an earlier date than any other white man now living in the county. The gentleman who has this splendid distinction is the veteran pioneer of the west, David Longmire. During those October days of so long ago, and now of necessity so misty in his memory, he passed up the Yakima valley and over the Cascade mountains by the Naches gap. He was then but nine years old. He found on the site of his present home a sub-chief of the Klickitats by the name of Owhi, from whom the party to which he belonged purchased a quantity of potatoes that had been grown on the land. Some of the details of his transcontinental trip were thus narrated by him to a reporter of the Seattle Times and later to the writer:

"In the month of March, 1853, my father and mother, in company with thirty other families, left Franklin county, Indiana, for Portland, Oregon, traveling across the country by ox teams. November 16th of that same year we reached Olympia.

"We followed the old Oregon trail down the Snake river, crossed the Blue mountains into the Umatilla country, then journeyed to the northward, passing over the waters of the Columbia at Wallula. Walla Walla had not at that time been thought of. At Wallula the Hudson's Bay Company had its fort, an old adobe building.

"An old Indian chief at the mouth of the Yakima river killed one of his best and fattest steers for us and sold the meat at fifteen cents a pound. Father was made weigh-master. Peo-peo-mox-mox, for such was the Indian's name, was a kind chief. He did not want us to cross the Cascades, and with other Indians tried to persuade us to go to the Colville reservation.

"But we did not let them dissuade us from executing our original plans. We crossed the Yakima at its mouth and came up on the east side, Indians following us all the way by thousands. There were thousands of them at that time in the Yakima country. Our wagons were great curiosities, for they were the first they had ever seen and the first to be brought up the Yakima valley and over the Cascade range.

"Not a white man lived in the valley at the time, save two Catholic priests, one at Tampico and the other on the ground taken by George Taylor in 1865 as a homestead. It is opposite the present George Hall ranch.

"In October we wended our way up toward the head of the Wenas creek, and in due time we began the ascent of the Naches river, the Indian name for which was Noch-cheese, meaning swift water. There were no wagon roads in either the Yakima or the Naches country, so we were pioneers in the matter of road-making. We had to ford the Naches something like forty times before we entered the mountains. The Indian trail was all right for single horses, but hauling wagons over it, even after the trees had been cut down to make it wider, was simply out of the question. We could not follow the trail at all, only in a general way. General George B. McClellan, who was located at Steilacoom in that year, was sent over the trail to examine it relative to the feasibility of making it passable for wagons, but we had made the road before the government got around to it.

"In 1854 the government made an appropriation for the improvement of the road, but after the outbreak of the Indian war it fell into disuse and became so overgrown with brush and clogged with fallen logs that it had to be abandoned entirely.

"We reached the top of the mountain all right, taking our outfit with us, and then the question was how to get down the other side. We found it necessary to use ropes to lower the wagons. After ten days of the hardest toil, we managed to overcome the obstacles presented by the almost impenetrable forest and sharp declivities of the west side, and at length we reached Olympia in safety.

"The Indians of those days were not treated altogether right by the white men who came in to take their lands. I remember well the two Nisqually chiefs, Leschi and Quiemuth, coming from a treaty-making meeting with Governor Stevens. They stopped in front of our house on Yelm prairie. I remember when Leschi was hanged. After this affair, Quiemuth gave himself up. He came to our house and asked father to deliver him over to Governor Stevens so the white men would not kill him. Father and the Indian went to Governor Stevens' office in Olympia. Both men stayed at the governor's home that night, sleeping in the same room. Some time during the hours of darkness, my father was suddenly awakened by the sound of a gunshot in the room. The Indian had been shot in the arm by some person from the outside, and moving toward the door, he was shortly afterward stabbed through the heart by the same midnight assassin. This made the governor very angry, and also made Indian affairs more difficult to handle."

Of course, the great Yakima war of 1856-6 made it impossible for white men, other than those banded together in military companies, to remain in or even pass through the valley of the Yakima river, but it is quite probable that those who came as soldiers or volunteers retained recollections of the pastoral wealth of the country, and that many of them, or persons interested by their representations, were induced to visit central Washington and perchance make homes in it in later years. Indeed, it is certainly known that a discovery made by one of the soldiers of this war had a very considerable effect upon the subsequent history of Yakima county, namely, the discovery of placer gold by Captain Ingalls, the sequel to which will receive due notice presently.

In another way also the Indians, by their hostility, hastened the occupancy of the country by white men, the very thing they sought by force of arms to prevent. One of the results of the war was the establishment of Fort Simcoe, which, though a military post, occasioned the presence of white men and furnished encouragement for the entrance of stock raisers into the country by offering them at once protection from predatory Indians and a trading point.

There can be no doubt but that the establishment of Fort Simcoe had much to do with rendering the home of the Yakimas, who were partially subdued in the war of 1855-6 and more completely overawed by the brilliant campaign of Colonel Wright in the Spokane country, a safe place for white men. At any rate, in the late fifties it began to be visited by cattle raisers from the outside country. George Nelson tells us that in 1859 William Murphy and Benjamin E. Snipes, partners, drove cattle from the Klickitat valley onto the Yakima range, as did also John B. Nelson and Fred Allen, with the latter's two sons, Bart and Jacob. They remained with their herds on the Yakima river during the winter of 1859-60, but did not effect a permanent settlement. Mr. Nelson names also John E. Murphy, James Murphy, William Henderson, ——— Preston, William Connell and John Jeffrey and his brother as among the Klickitat stockmen, who used the Yakima ranges at a very early date. During this period, the only whites, aside from these intrepid stockmen, who visited the country were the no less intrepid and even more mercurial packers engaged in transporting goods to the upper Columbia river.

It seems to be a conceded fact that the first permanent settler within the limits of the present Yakima country was F. Mortimer Thorp, who had likewise made journeys into it from Klickitat county and to whom its rich pastures and utter lack of civilization appealed with a peculiar potency. Mr. Thorp belonged to that old school of stockmen who considered solitude and primeval conditions essential to the success of their business. Utterly indifferent to the advantages of society and the luxuries which can be enjoyed only where a considerable number of people are united together in communities, he wished always to be so situated that his herds might multiply indefinitely and find an abundant pasture. His great desideratum was an unbounded country without farms and fences, where cattle might roam at will, nor ever, by any chance, involve their owner in bickerings and quarrels and litigation. Thus it came to pass that Mr. Thorp had sought earnestly the heart of the wilderness since 1844, when first he had set his face resolutely westward, making the long journey over plain and mountain to the land lavied by the Pacific's billows. This desire of solitude and isolation had more than once impelled him to pull up stakes and move on, for the country at the time was being appropriated and subjugated with considerable rapidity. In July, 1858, he settled near the site of the present Goldendale; indeed, a part of the land on which that town is built served him as a calf pasture at this early period. Soon the progress of civilization drove him thence also, as it had driven him just before from Benton county, Oregon, and in his quest for more elbow room he turned naturally to the Yakima country. And so it happened that October, 1860, found him once more on the move. Ben Snelling, John Zumwalt and A. C. Myers accompanied, assisting with the two hundred and fifty head of fine Durham stock. Establishing himself in the now famous Moxee valley, Mr. Thorp spent there the winter of 1860-61, his family remaining at their home in Klickitat county. The season was mild, and those with the cattle were able to make trips between the two places as often as occasion might arise.

In February, 1861, this pioneer stockman brought his family, consisting of his wife, Margaret, and a number of children, of whom the oldest was only eighteen, to the new place of abode he had picked out for them. The accommodations prepared for their use and comfort were necessarily of the rudest kind, consisting mainly of a small cabin with a dirt roof; the furnishings few and of home manufacture. As culinary utensils had to be packed over a long rough trail, it may be assumed that only the most essential articles found their way into Mrs. Thorp's kitchen. Certainly this pioneer lady purchased at a cost of not a little inconvenience, privation and loneliness, the honor of having been the first white woman to make her home in the Yakima country. In company with the family came the now widely known Charles Splawn, who was engaged in packing to the mines during the winter of 1860.

In the fall of 1861 Mr. Thorp succeeded in getting through from his old home in Klickitat county a wagon, the first to enter the Yakima valley from that direction, and thereafter his worthy helpmate enjoyed the luxury of a cook stove. A supply of vegetables was obtained that fall from a garden of five or six acres planted in the spring.

"At that time," says Leonard L. Thorp, from whom our information concerning the first family to settle in the Yakima country was obtained, "the bottom lands were covered with a dense growth of rye grass twelve feet high in many places, while a luxuriant carpet of nutritious bunch grass made the sage brush hills a veritable paradise to cattle and horses. Within five minutes after turning loose the animals, they would be completely lost sight of in the tall grass and could be found only by trailing. Fortunately, the Indians were disposed to be friendly, and except by the occasional theft of an animal, never seriously troubled the early settlers. Indeed, they rendered us valuable service during the late fall of 1861, by bringing great quantities of salmon, which could be procured from them at trifling cost. A string of beads, costing ten cents, would purchase a thirty-pound fish."

With the Thorp family when they came into the Moxee valley in February, 1861, besides Mr. Splawn, before mentioned, were Alfred Henson and family, George Bearfield and John Grubsher, en route to the Peshastin mines. As the discovery of this district was an important event of the early days and doubtless exerted some influence upon the history of central Washington, it is thought fitting that a brief account of it should here be given.

One Captain Ingalls, the discoverer of the Coos Bay mines, in Oregon, and a typical representative of the nomadic prospecting class which formed so important a part of the early population of the West, may perhaps be considered the original discoverer of the Peshastin district. During the Indian war of 1855-6 he served as a scout, and in company with other scouts from the ranks of the friendly Indians, reconnoitered the eastern slope of the Cascade range. While on the Wenatchee river, so the story is told, he and an Indian named Colawash found, in one of the tributary canyons, several gold nuggets and other substantial indications of the existence of placer deposits. They dare not tarry for close investigation, however, for should they be discovered by the hostiles, their lives would not be worth a copper cent. Ingalls was, therefore, compelled to abandon his find for the time being.

When at length the Indian troubles were at an end and the intrepid prospector might with safety attempt a further reconnoissance of the gold-bearing region, he again entered the country, but with all his experience in finding his way in the wilderness by landmarks, he was unable to rediscover the gold-bearing gravels or the creek whose bed and banks they formed. Eventually, in 1860, he went to the home of Colawash in the Klickitat valley, hoping to induce the red man to guide him to the spot. Vain were his efforts. Colawash could not be induced by the most tempting offer to make the journey, and all hope of help from this source had to be abandoned.

Nothing daunted, Ingalls associated himself with Levi and Andrew Jackson Knott, Robert Ladd and one or two others, with intent to make a more extended and thorough search for the lost placers. Their expedition was destined to be brought to an abrupt and melancholy termination. While the company was in camp in the upper country, Ingalls was accidentally shot and killed by A. J. Knott, so the rest of the party, left without a guide, were compelled to return with sad hearts to the settlements.

The next effort to discover the lost placer ground was made by Charles A. Splawn, then living near the site of Goldendale. In the spring of 1860 he had gone to try his fortunes in the Similkameen mines, having first talked with Colawash, with whom he was on friendly terms, regarding the Ingalls discovery. Colawash refused to guide him or anybody else to the spot, but told Mr. Splawn that the name of the creek was Peshastin; also drew a rough map for his further information.

While returning from the Similkameen district in the fall of 1860, Mr. Splawn fell in with four other returning miners, whom he readily induced to join him in a search for the Peshastin prospect. The party proceeded forthwith to the mouth of the Wenatchee river, where an Indian guide was procured. As they proceeded up the Wenatchee, the Indian named the different tributary streams as he came to them. When the prospectors had reached a place between fifteen and twenty miles from the river's mouth, the guide pointed out a considerable creek flowing in from the south and stated that it was the Peshastin, of which they were in search.

Mr. Splawn, who is our authority for the story, states that he himself started up the stream while the rest of the party took a hill trail, the agreement being that all should meet at the summit of the divide. In the first narrow canyon after leaving the mouth of the creek, Mr. Splawn dug out a promising crevice and panned from its contents a dollar in gold. The bed-rock was slate.

With the evidence of his find safe in his pocket, Mr. Splawn eagerly pushed on to the appointed rendezvous, where he found his companions in waiting. They had accidentally fallen in with a young man named Russell, who joined their ranks. Russell was the messenger who had been entrusted to carry the news of Lincoln's election to the northern mines, and was on his return to the sound when he met Splawn's party. He became enthusiastic over the discovery, and having begged the gold from its rightful owner, proceeded with it to Seattle. Its exhibition there caused not a little excitement. The few newspapers then in the Northwest published exaggerated accounts of the discovery, and some of them indulged in useless prophesying as to the future extensive development of the region. Numerous parties at once outfitted and started for the new diggings, and Mr. Splawn estimated that seventy-five miners spent the winter on the Peshastin. But the gold fields, though they produced nuggets weighing as high as twelve dollars, were of small extent. They were soon overshadowed in public interest by the more important discoveries made in Idaho and British Columbia about this time, and eventually ceased entirely to be the center of excitement, though gold was found there for several years, and in later days quartz ledges have been uncovered in the district. The principal branch of Peshastin creek is known today as Ingalls creek, having been so named in honor of the man who first discovered, but did not live to open the mines.

As before stated, Mr. Henson and family were among those who went into the Peshastin country in February, 1861. During the ensuing October they returned disgusted to the Moxee valley. Mr. Henson took a claim in that region, intending to plant there his vine and fig tree, but after a residence of two weeks, he decided that the danger to himself and family from Indians was too great and that prudence required him to give up the idea of establishing a home in the Yakima country just then.

The Thorps were, therefore, left the sole permanent settlers of the valley with none to bear them company except the savages and such travelers, packers and stockmen as might occasionally pass their way. Neither did they have a large force of employees to help beguile the lonely hours. The work of caring for the cattle was done entirely by Mr. Thorp, his sons and Charles A. Splawn, who had married the oldest girl.

But during the winter of 1861-2 the men at least had no time to think of their loneliness and isolation. That winter is known in local history as the severest ever experienced by white men in the Northwest, and the Yakima country was not more favored than were other parts. On the 10th of November, Mr. Thorp informs us, snow began falling, and it did not cease until it had attained a depth of eight inches. This settled down to four inches of hard, icy snow, upon which came successive falls, until by December 20th, the earth had a compact blanket two feet thick. Throughout the whole of the 22d and the succeeding night rain came down in torrents, settling the snow to a depth of eighteen inches. A hard frost on the night of the 23d converted this into a vast sheet of ice, the last of which did not disappear from the face of the country until after the middle of the following March. There was no thermometer in the valley at the time, but some idea of the cold may be obtained from the fact that the Yakima and Naches rivers very early froze to the bottom, swift mountain streams though they were. Their waters covered a large scope of lowlands, which, with the beds of the rivers, were supplied all winter with a thick, unyielding coat of mail. In the spring the ice marks were eight feet high on the trees in Moxee bottom, and when the center of the vast glacier began to move out, side walls of ice in some places more than twelve feet high were left.

Strange to say, the stock loss of the one family in the country was slight, notwithstanding this extreme cold. Their three hundred cattle and sixty horses were in prime condition when the cold weather set in, an important point in their favor, and those in charge of the animals made heroic efforts to secure forage for them. An unlimited range of nutritious bunch grass, cured while standing, after the manner of this peculiar plant of the desert, was concealed under the ice and snow. The only chance of saving the herds lay in breaking the crusts so that the cattle and horses might reach this excellent fodder, and for forty successive days the Thorps wrought with great energy, despite the extreme cold, assisting the animals to dig down for sustenance. The legs and arms of the men were at times so badly cut and frozen as almost to incapacitate them for further work, but still they toiled on and their labors and sacrifices were rewarded, for only seven of the neat cattle perished, while the horse band remained entire. About the 15th of February a Chinook began blowing, and soon the snow on the south hillsides cleared away, making it possible for the animals to take care of themselves. During the summer of 1861 several out-buildings were erected for the shelter of stock and the next summer Mr. Thorp built a permanent home for his family at the lower spring in the Moxee valley, a two-story hewed-log structure, much superior to the pioneer cabin of round cottonwood logs. The original home was, however, allowed to stand for many years as a monument of the early days.

The year 1862 brought a few additions to the population of Yakima county, perhaps the first of whom was William Parker, a Columbia river packer who had passed through the valley in 1861. He took a homestead on the bottom that has ever since borne his name, but being not yet ready to give up the trail, he left the place in charge of another arrival of the year, Andrew C. Gervais, who had heard of the Thorp settlement and had come over from Walla Walla to visit it. Mr. Gervais says John Allen and John Jeffrey, the former of whom, like Parker, was married to an Indian wife, were partners in this homestead venture. Gervais harvested a small crop of vegetables and cereals for his employers, then left the place in charge of its proprietors and entered the service of Mr. Thorp, with whom he remained that winter. Albert Haines also came to the country in 1862, locating with his wife and little daughter in the Moxee, a mile and a half north of the Thorp place.

An event of the winter of 1862 deserving of at least a passing notice was the establishment of the first school in the valley, a private one. The home of this pioneer institution was the upper story of Mr. Thorp's house; the teacher was Luitia, wife of Albert Haines, a well educated young woman, equipped for her duties by a little former experience in teaching, and the pupils were the Thorp children, the only ones in the valley at the time save the little Haines girl. It is said that Mrs. Haines proved very efficient and accomplished not a little in her three-month term, despite the many difficulties she had to encounter in the way of dissimilar text-books, lack of equipment, etc.

No serious trouble with Indians was experienced by the earliest settlers, though occasionally the thievish red men would appropriate to their own use some animal belonging to the whites. During the summer of 1862 a very fine horse disappeared from Mr. Thorp's band. The owner took up the trail of the animal, and after a long, hard chase, succeeded in overtaking him and the Indian who had appropriated him. The thief was captured, treated to a sound rib-roasting, and turned loose with the injunction to spread the news of his misfortunes among his brethren. Whether or not the miscreant obeyed Mr. Thorp's instructions and held himself up to his tribesmen as an example of the ills that are likely to befall the horse-thief, we are unable to state.

During the summer of 1863, Mr. Thorp and his family were given reason to believe that a serious difficulty with Indians was about to be experienced. One day the father and his son Leonard descried a band of Indians, mounted and in full war paint, approaching their home. Seized with a sudden alarm, they, with Charles Splawn, and Mr. Thorp's other sons, Willis and Bayless, hastily hid the women and children and prepared to make as stubborn a defense as possible, taking their stand behind a yard fence. The Indians rode up rapidly without sign of enmity or hatred. The white men saw when the advancing band came near enough that they were no other than Smohollah, the dreamer, and his following.

Just as the head of the column reached the fence, the older Thorp sprang over, revolver in hand, seized the chief's horse by the bridle and demanded the reason for such a warlike approach. The dreamer smiled affably, proffering his hand, and stated as the reason for his conduct that he had heard of a report current among the whites to the effect that he was about to overwhelm their settlements with a thousand warriors and had come to reassure them by exhibiting the smallness of his following. After a friendly talk, the chief rode away, bowing and smiling, but Mr. Thorp always believed that the ugly-looking revolver was really responsible for his apparent friendliness.

There being no newspapers or other printed or written records of general events during the earliest days, it is practically impossible to write with certainty regarding the pioneer settlers and the dates of their settlements. The average memory is hardly equal to the task of accurately retaining such minutiae of forty years ago as initials, the correct orthography of proper names, dates of personal incidents, etc., and a work treating of events which occurred prior to the advent of the printing press must needs be more or less inaccurate and deficient in detail. For these reasons it may be impossible to enumerate all those who settled in the county before 1865 or during that year, but a list would include, besides those already mentioned, William Ish, John Hailey and a man named King, who had formed themselves into a copartnership to cut wild hay from the Columbia plains near the mouth of the Yakima and ship it down the former river. Mr. Hailey later entered into the stage business and became very widely known throughout the Northwest. He was one of the organizers of the celebrated Northwest Stage Company, whose operations extended from Washington to Utah. Then there was J. T. Hicklin, to whom, on January 13, 1863, the legislature granted the right to operate a ferry across the Yakima at a location somewhere between the mouth of the Wenas river and a point three miles below the debouchement of the Naches, the tolls fixed by the act being: For a wagon drawn by two animals, $2; hack or sulkey, one horse, $1.50; man and horse, 75 cents; animal packed, 50 cents; footman, 25 cents; horses, mules or cattle, loose, 25 cents each; sheep, goats or hogs, 8 cents. There were also in the valley Gilbert Pell, appointed sheriff by the act organizing the county; and William Wright, appointed county auditor; and Elisha McDaniel, who settled on a place near the Jock Morgan home; and J. B. Nelson, who later served as probate judge of the county; and Augustan Cleman, who settled first on the south fork of the Cowiche, but moved a year later to the Wenas, becoming the first permanent settler there; and McAllister and George Taylor, the pioneers of the Selah valley; and Walter Lindsey, with his sons, except William, who was in the Civil war, daughters and daughter-in-law, and Dr. L. H. Goodwin, with his brothers Thomas and Benton, his sons, George W., Christopher Columbus and Flavius, and his stepdaughter; also John Rozelle, wife and three sons, and his son-in-law, William Harrington, and wife. The Rozelles and Harringtons soon moved to and settled in the Kittitas valley, then a part of Yakima county, where they suffered much the first winter from want and cold until brought back to the Yakima valley in February by the benevolent F. M. Thorp, who sent Andrew Gervais to their rescue. Here, also, was J. W. Copeland, who settled on the Ahtanum; Nathan Olney, Perry and Jacob Cleman, and, no doubt, others. According to John Mattoon, who entered the employ of the government in March, 1864, as an attache of the Indian agency at Fort Simcoe, the persons living in the vicinity of the fort besides himself, or as many of them as he can recall, were: Indian Agent Bancroft, Rev. James H. Wilbur, school superintendent and Methodist missionary; James McGue, blacksmith; Foster, wagon-maker; Praspex, gunsmith; Hall, carpenter; Wright, harness-maker; Carman, miller; Thompson, superintendent of farming; Dr. Miller, physician, and Sumner Barker, post trader.

The entire population of what are now Yakima and Kittitas counties probably did not exceed two hundred in 1865. Almost all except the agency people were in the cattle business. This seems like a small number indeed to bear the burdens of county organization, nevertheless in that year they were intrusted with the responsibilities and granted the benefits of a local government. Indeed, as early as 1863, the territorial legislature had showed its willingness to bestow upon the people of central Washington as large a degree of autonomy as possible by creating the county of Ferguson. The extent of this political subdivision of the territory was thus described by section one of the act: "All that portion of Washington territory lying north of the summit of the Simcoe range of mountains, bounded on the west by the summit of the Cascade range, and the counties of Walla Walla and Spokane on the east, and the Wenatchee river on the north." Section two enacted that James H. Wilbur, Alfred Hall and — Place be appointed county commissioners; W. Shaugh, justice of the peace, and — Thorp, sheriff. The act was passed January 23, 1863. But the few families then in the district took no interest in the new county; the appointees were so little elated over the honors bestowed upon them that they never performed their respective duties, probably never qualified, and, in brief, the county gained no existence except on the statute book. The creating act was repealed January 18, 1865.

This step was, however, taken by the legislature only for the purpose of clearing the way for other and more appropriate legislation. January 21, 1865, another act was passed directly affecting the section with which this work is concerned. Its text in full is as follows:

AN ACT

Establishing and Organizing the County of Yakima.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington:

Section 1. That the territory heretofore embraced in the county of Ferguson, lying and being south of a line running due west from a point two miles above the lower steamboat landing at Priest's rapids, on the Columbia river, to the summit of the Cascade mountains, be, and the same is hereby, constituted and organized into a separate county, to be known as and called Yakima county.

Section 2. That said territory shall compose a county for civil and military purposes, and be subject to all the laws relating to counties, and be entitled to elect the same officers as other counties are entitled to elect.

Section 3. That, until the next general election, William Parker, J. H. Wilbur and Charles Splawn be and are hereby appointed county commissioners; that William Wright be and is hereby appointed county auditor; that — Thorp be and is hereby appointed county treasurer, and Gilbert Pell be and is hereby appointed sheriff, who shall, before entering upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices, qualify in the manner as is now required by law for county officers.

Section 4. The county seat of said county of Yakima is temporarily located at the house of William Wright.

Section 5. That the said county of Yakima is attached for judicial purposes and for the election of members of the legislative assembly, to the county of Stevens.

Section 6. This act to take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved January 21, 1865.

In 1866 the county seat was removed to the home of F. Mortimer Thorp. For three years, or until that worthy pioneer moved away, it found lodgment in his house; then, it is thought, the officers met for a short time at Charles P. Cooke's, but about 1870, Yakima City, a small village at the mouth of the Ahtanum, became the seat of local government. The courthouse stood on a block of ground donated by the Parker Brothers, near their store. We are informed by Andrew C. Gervais that it was a story and a half box structure, and that the lower floor was used for a jail and sheriff's office, while the upper floor served as a court room and recorder's office. The records were moved to another building in 1880.

Throughout all the later sixties the country continued to settle up slowly, and gradually to take on the characteristics of a civilized community. According to records in the local land office, the first surveys in Yakima valley were made by Charles A. White. The third standard parallel, running between Yakima City and North Yakima, Leonard Thorp tells us, was the basis of this survey and the first township surveyed was township thirteen north, range eighteen east. The survey was extended in later years as the development and settlement of the county demanded.

An incident of the early times which aroused considerable interest then and later was the exhibition at Fort Simcoe, by an old Indian named Zokeseye, of some silver-bearing rock. This was about 1862 or 1863. Zokeseye gave the quartz to the agency secretary, whose name was Walker, and about a week or ten days later Walker took it with him to The Dalles, Oregon, where he showed it, while intoxicated, to a California assayer, Blachley by name. Fully appreciating its richness, the Californian at once assayed the rock and found it to be nearly two-thirds silver. He questioned Walker regarding the place where it was discovered, and was sent to F. M. Thorp as the one who could most likely find the ledge on account of his friendliness with the Indians. Thorp joined him in a prospecting tour, taking along some Indian guides, of whom, unfortunately, Zokeseye could not be one, as the old red man had died shortly after giving Walker the rock.

The party prospected for more than a month, going up the Tietan to the summit of the Cascades, thence northwest to the headwaters of Bumping river, exploring numerous streams, but finding nothing.

After returning from this trip, Blachley went back to California, but the next summer he was again in the Yakima country, ready for another search. With Thorp and Indian guides and part of the time Charles Splawn, he explored the Wenatchee country, the upper Yakima and towards Mount Baker, going wherever the Indians reported the existence of the precious metals. The search was bootless.

For several years afterward F. M. Thorp and Charles Splawn gave a portion of each summer to prospecting. Numerous other parties and individuals sought earnestly for the Zokeseye lode during the sixties and seventies, and the story has been revived frequently in more recent times, but, despite every effort, the ledge from which the old Indian took his rich specimen is still a lost one.

About the fall of 1864 a discovery of placer gold was made on what is known as Ringold bar on the west side of the Columbia river, twenty miles north of Goldendale, by a party of which a surveyor named Hall was one. Quite a large number of men flocked to the diggings, which were worked with water from the Columbia river. L. L. Thorp spent three months there and received as recompense for his labors only a twenty-dollar clean up, but White & Black, four claims below him, took out twenty-five hundred dollars in less than six weeks, while a French company did even better. The bar yielded some thirty thousand or forty thousand dollars in all to white miners, and an unknown sum to the Chinamen who washed its gravels intermittently for several years afterward.

Persons who were here at the time speak of the year 1867 as a particularly mild and prosperous one, though its closing month brought some disaster to lowland settlers. A snowfall of six or eight inches was followed by three days of rain, causing all the streams and rivers to rise to high water mark. The Naches was especially high and the old Nelson farm, situated on a low flat close to the river, was greatly damaged. A rapid erosion followed the flood, threatening to undermine even the house and farm buildings. The family were compelled to leave their house at midnight, but though their place was greatly damaged, the house still stood when the waters subsided. The farm of James Allen, near by, was also seriously injured, and other lowland settlers suffered, though in a less degree. Next season the Nelsons moved to a spot a little higher up the Naches, where they located the homesteads now known by their names.

Although the earliest settlers were practically all engaged in the stock business, the great industry of the country, yet some experiments had been made in agriculture from the first; small ones, however, owing to the erroneous impression which prevailed as to the capabilities of the sage brush lands, and confined to the areas of sub-irrigation, near the streams. But the facts being as they were subsequently discovered to be, such experiments could tend in only one direction, namely, toward the ushering out of cattle raising on an extensive scale, and the ushering in of the era of irrigation, farming, horticulture and the like. The first attempts at fruit raising were ridiculed by stockmen in general, who scouted the idea of planting trees in the desert. They lived to see their error, though the initial experiments were calculated to confirm them partially in their preconceived ideas.

It is unnecessary to attempt to determine who first set out fruit trees within the limits of the county. No doubt many of the settlers planted a few in the late sixties and early seventies. Alfred Henson is said to have planted an orchard on river bottom lands in 1866 which did not begin to bear until nine years old. N. T. Goodwin states that in 1868 he set out an orchard of one hundred and fifty trees on his homestead on the west side of the Yakima near the Moxee bridge. Being, like other pioneers, of the opinion that the sage brush land was worthless, he chose for his orchard a location on the bottom next to the river. The result was that the trees were washed away by high water. George Hinkle stated to the editor of the Herald that he planted an orchard about 1868, and that his experiments seemed a failure at first, the tender limbs of the trees being destroyed by frost during the winter season, but that the trees eventually got a start and bore bountifully. Mr. Goodwin states that in 1870 a man named Vaughn made a successful attempt at fruit tree culture, and it is known that during that year the late Judge John Wilson Beck set out fifty apple and the same number of peach trees on his homestead above Yakima City. These and other like experiments in time demonstrated the adaptability of the country to fruit raising.

The culture of some kinds of vegetables was contemporaneous with the coming of the earliest settlers; indeed, had been tried in a small way by Indians before the cattlemen came in to spy out the land. Small quantities of cereals were also raised; always, however, on the bottoms near the streams. Perhaps one of the first, if not the first, to demonstrate that the sage brush land farther back contained elements of fertility was the N. T. Goodwin heretofore mentioned. He preempted land near the Moxee bridge in the spring of 1866. A year later he cleared the sage brush from a five-acre tract, and seeded it with wheat, obtained from the Walla Walla country. That fall he harvested a crop, averaging forty bushels to the acre. The result of this success and the practical demonstration it gave of the fertility of sage brush land was the starting of an irrigation enterprise, by a species of farmers' cooperative company. The promoters were Messrs. Goodwin, Stollop, Vaughn, Maybury and Simmons. Work was begun by these men during the spring of 1868, the intake of their canal being located about a mile above the mouth of the Naches river. The ditch was a small one. It had to be constructed under difficulties by men who were not blessed with an abundance of capital, and its progress was slow. By the early seventies, however, it was turned to good account by farmers near its head, though it was not completed to Mr. Goodwin's place until several years afterward. In later times it was greatly enlarged and improved, becoming what is now known as the Union canal. Judge John Wilson Beck stated to a Herald reporter some time before his death that he constructed an irrigation ditch in 1872, "before Charles Schanno built his ditch," taking the water out of the Yakima half a mile above the Moxee bridge, and conveying it in a rudely constructed aqueduct to his homestead above Yakima City.

Simultaneous with or shortly after the construction of these simple and primitive irrigation canals, a number of others were put in, all small, each being used only by one or a few farmers. The era of extensive irrigation did not dawn until some years later.

The interview with Judge Beck just referred to gives us a glimpse of conditions as they were when he came to the country in 1869. Among other things, he said:

"After the close of the war I got the western fever, like a great many other people of the East. On June 1, 1865, our band of two hundred pioneers met at Fort Kearney, Nebraska, according to agreement and started across the plains by ox teams. We followed the old Oregon trail and experienced the usual hardships of such a long journey by land. We had no trouble with the Indians, for they were well under subjection by that time. We landed in Walla Walla September 18, 1865. That was a small place then with perhaps five hundred population.

"I remained there four years, and in the spring of 1869 left for the Yakima valley. This was a memorable journey, and when I look back I marvel at the development that has taken place in a few short years. We crossed the Columbia at Umatilla and followed up its west bank to the Yakima, and thence to the present site of Prosser, where we crossed the Yakima. The first family we met was at the Henry Cock place, ten or fifteen miles above Prosser. Then came Ben Snipes' ranch at Snipes mountain. Our next stop was Sam. Chapel's place near the present site of Zillah. He lived one-half mile northeast of this city (North Yakima). George Taylor and Alfred Henson lived in the Selah valley. A man named Mauldin lived near the Naches bridge; a bachelor named Bell lived on the John Cleman place in the Wenas; Alfred Miller and A. Cleman, the father of John Cleman, also lived on the Wenas.

"On the Ahtanum there were Andrew Gervais, James Allen, H. M. Benton, 'Judge' Olney, Joseph Bowser, Joseph Robbins and a man named Honsacker. Father Santosh was the priest at the time at the mission on the upper Ahtanum. As far as I can remember these were the families living in the valley when I came here, and for a short time afterward. [Judge Beck overlooked a considerable settlement in the Moxee valley.] While I enjoyed the isolation, we had to put up with a great many hardships and privations.

"The only store in the county when I came was kept by O. D. and Sumner Barker, under the firm name of Barker Brothers. Their place of business was at Fort Simcoe, where we went to buy our necessities of life and other things. Store goods of all kinds were high then. The freight from The Dalles over the mountains was two dollars a hundred pounds. Sugar sold at twenty cents; muslin, twenty cents; oil was five dollars a can or one dollar a gallon; coffee, fifty cents; nails, ten cents; but meat was cheap because this was the chief product of the valley at the time. We got our lumber and grist at Fort Simcoe."

The gentleman who is responsible for the foregoing quoted statements received his title of judge from his having served as justice of the peace for twenty years continuously. He was the first to hold that office in the county, having been appointed in 1870. The Indians who took part in the massacre of Lorenzo Perkins and wife had their preliminary hearing before him, and Kipe, Salusakin, Tommy Hop-Towne, Tewowney, Wyantatic and Moosetonic were by him bound over to appear before the superior court for trial. It is stated that in all the years of his service as justice, and very many cases were tried before him, he rendered just one decision that was reversed by a higher tribunal.

Mr. Beck's statement that there was only one store in the county in 1869 seems to be a little inaccurate. Wallace Wiley, who settled on the Ahtanum in early days, states that Joseph Bowser kept at his home, two miles east of the mission, a miniature trading post. The store room was a small addition to the cabin in which Mr. Bowser resided, and it could only be entered by the residence part. When a customer appeared, the worthy merchant would retire to the store and attend to the wants of his patron (who was compelled to remain without), exhibiting the goods and receiving the price through a small window, the only aperture by which direct communication with the outside could be had from the store. The Indians soon dubbed this window the "pot-latch hole," and by that expressive sobriquet it became widely known among both races. It is stated, too, that a kind of general store was kept by a squaw man named French in Parker bottom. Mr. French was afterward killed in Klickitat county by a vicious horse.

During the early seventies, the process of settling and subjugating the country, already begun in the preceding decade, was carried on quietly and slowly. August 13, 1870, the pioneer settlers were given the first substantial intimation that their isolation from the rest of the world and the inconvenience of getting their products to trade centers and their supplies back might some day be things of the past. On that date the Northern Pacific Railroad Company filed its map of preliminary location in the United States general land office. The map showed that the railroad, if built according to the then existing plans, would traverse Yakima and Kittitas valleys, and to those of astuteness and prevision the future of the region began to reveal itself. Every step made by the Northern Pacific company in promotion of its great scheme to span the continent by a mighty highway of steel gave an impetus to the general progress of Washington territory, a progress in which every part of that commonwealth must necessarily have its share. There can be no doubt that the prospect of the transcontinental railway hastened on the work of settlement in Yakima county, though its influence was not specially marked at first. Time was required to demonstrate the value of the soil, the effect of irrigation and the practicability of agriculture; and when all of these were known, time was required to project and construct the great canal systems, without which farming, fruit raising or horticulture on a considerable scale was an impossibility.

Then, too, in accordance with the laws of agricultural development which have obtained among all peoples, the wealth of pasturage the country afforded must show signs of coming exhaustion before sufficient incentive could exist for seeking the treasures it might hold as a reward for the husbandman's toil.

But as already stated, there were premonitory signs of the larger and fuller development for central Washington very soon after the country was invaded by whites, and these signs did not disappear as time went on. Thus, in 1872, Sebastian Lauber and Charles and Joseph Schano began their efforts to get water upon their land at Yakima City. The first ditch was a small one, taking its water out of Wide Hollow creek. It did not prove satisfactory, as a sufficient water supply was available only while the snow lay on the foothills, so its proprietors decided to construct a large ditch, conveying water from the Naches river. Operations were begun in 1873. The surveys followed the path of least resistance, utilizing natural draws as much as possible. When completed, the ditch was eighteen feet wide on the bottom and carried a body of water eighteen inches deep under normal conditions, with a fall of a quarter of an inch to the rod. Its length exceeded eight miles. Plows and scrapers were used in its construction, and at times as many as fifteen or twenty men were employed in its deepest cuts. Water did not reach the old town of Yakima until 1875, the reason being that the bed of the canal was very porous, necessitating a great deal of puddling. This was the first ditch of large size and public utility to be constructed in the country. While the ditch later known as the Union canal was sooner started, it was of slower growth and did not develop into an important factor in the agricultural progress of the county until some time afterwards. Of course, the number of small, private ditches constructed for the use of one or a few farmers increased with the passage of time.

Those who were residents of the Yakima country at the time will remember that a very noticeable earthquake occurred in the fall of 1872. No newspapers of that date are available and the memories of the old pioneers do not seem adequate to the task of fixing the day of the month upon which the seismic disturbance was experienced, but perhaps we are justified in supposing that the earthquake was the same as that noticed in many parts of the Inland Empire. If it was, it occurred on the evening of December 14th. The old north Idaho newspapers mention such a phenomenon at that time, as did the Baker City, Union and Walla Walla publications. Speaking of the shock in Yakima county, Wallace Wiley stated that the house on the Ahtanum in which his family lived was rocked with such violence as to scare the inmates. A Congregational minister, he said, was staying at his home with two children, and when the earth began its strange motions he lost his head and ran out, taking one of the children with him, but temporarily forgetting the other. At the mouth of Nasty creek, a small branch of the upper Ahtanum, Frank A. Splawn was then operating a small sash sawmill (said to be the first erected in the county). He was living alone in a little box house that he had built for temporary use. When the earthquake came his first thought was that mischievous boys were playing pranks on him, and wishing to give the practical jokers a scare, he rushed out, half-naked, gun in hand. The shock is described as consisting of two disturbances, the first being of considerable force and lasting several seconds, the second milder and of shorter duration. It did no damage. The time of its occurrence here is stated as late in the evening, and the eastern Oregon newspapers fixed the hour of the disturbance in those parts as 10:21 p. m.

It is claimed that the summer of 1874 was rendered memorable by a remarkable series of earthquakes in central Washington, some of them of unusual severity. Indeed, it has been asserted that as many as sixty-four distinct shocks were counted. The Yakima Herald of March 4, 1892, states that not since Washington was known to white men had so great an earthquake been experienced within its confines. "The indications of its force," continues the publication referred to, "are still seen in great crevices, huge stone monuments of queer shapes and broken trails. A great mountain at Chief Wapato John's ranch, near the mouth of the Chelan river, was rocked into the Columbia, damming that huge stream, flooding the chief's ranch, carrying away his house, and forcing him to fly for his life. It was a number of days before the waters washed away a portion of the rocks and receded to anywhere near their original level. Chief John was so thoroughly scared that he never returned to his ranch." It is thought by some that the flooding of Wapato John's ranch was an incident of the earthquake of 1872.

Leonard Thorp tells us that in 1874 a slide took place on the west side of Yakima river a few miles above the mouth of the Satus, opposite Snipes mountain. A slice of rock a quarter of a mile wide and of still greater length broke away from its fastening, forming an interesting monument to the force of the internal convulsions in that region. In other parts of Yakima county great cracks were made in solid rocks, and considerable excitement, sometimes feelings of apprehension and terror, were aroused, but no damage was done.

It is worthy of notice at this point that by legislative enactment approved November 14, 1873, the boundaries of Yakima county, as defined in the creating act heretofore quoted, were changed somewhat, the new boundary on the south and a part of that on the east being thus described: "Commencing at the northwest corner of township number six north of range number twelve east; thence east along the north boundary of township number six north, until said line intersects the Columbia river, thence north up the mid-channel of said river to the mouth of the Yakima river."

In 1875 the interests of Yakima and other counties of central Washington received due attention from the territorial legislature, as appears from the fact that a memorial to congress was that year passed asking for an appropriation from the national treasury of fifty thousand dollars for the construction of a wagon road to connect King and Yakima counties, said road to lead through the Snoqualmie pass. The memorial also petitioned that E. P. Boyles, George Taylor, F. R. Geddis, Jeremiah W. Borst and Rufus Sterns be constituted a board of commissioners to disburse said appropriation. Its initial paragraph reads:

"Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, would respectfully represent to your honorable body, that the Cascade range of mountains divides the territory into western and eastern Washington; that eastern Washington Territory is almost exclusively a grazing and agricultural country; that in the western country the lumbering and mining industries largely predominate; and that the western is largely dependent upon Oregon and the eastern portion for its supply of beef and breadstuffs; that even in the present undeveloped condition of the western, $200,000 in gold is taken annually from the Puget Sound district to the eastern portion for beef cattle, which sum is expended by the cattle raiser of the eastern section without this territory to the great detriment of the western and the whole territory; that the wheat, breadstuffs and dairy products of eastern Washington have to seek a market without this territory to the great detriment of both sections; that Puget sound is the safest and most accessible harbor known and affords facilities for commerce superior to any other body of water in the world; that a connection of the material interests of the eastern and western sections of the territory would insure a rapid increase of population and wealth; that direct mail facilities by said pass are of great necessity; that a semi-weekly mail and stage line could run on such road with very little interruption from snow, and accommodate the traveling public many times when they could not be accommodated by way of the Columbia river on account of ice. The unity and ultimate prosperity of both sections of the territory require that every means be fostered to protect and promote the material interests of both sections."

For some reason the national government did not see fit to make the appropriation petitioned for or any appropriation, and the much desired aid to communication with Puget sound was not secured at this time.

The same legislature memorialized the postmaster-general of the United States relative to the establishment of a mail route from Seattle to Wallula. As giving an idea of conditions obtaining during the period, its language is here reproduced:

To the Honorable Postmaster-General of the United States.

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, would respectfully represent that there are over 2,000 inhabitants in the valley of the Yakima river in Yakima county in this Territory, and the number is very rapidly increasing in consequence of recently discovered gold mines in said valley, as well as the rich and extensive agricultural and grazing lands in that section; that a large portion of the people of said valley are entirely without mail service, and that what service there is in said valley is by very circuitous routes, namely, to Wallula via Umatilla on the Columbia river, over the foothills of the Blue mountains, and to Puget sound via the Columbia river. Also that there is no postoffice at the mouth of the Yakima river, where one is very much needed to accommodate a large settlement at that point. Therefore,

Your memorialists pray that a mail route may be established from Seattle, in King county, via the Snoqualmie pass to Ellensburg, thence to Yakima City, thence to Smith Barnum's at the mouth of the Yakima river, and thence to Wallula on the Columbia river; that a postoffice be established at Smith Barnum's, at the mouth of the Yakima river, and that Smith Barnum be appointed postmaster of said postoffice. Also that a semi-weekly mail service be immediately established on such route.

Thus it will be seen that the early settlers, though their major industry was such as thrives in isolated communities, were somewhat restive under the inconveniences and privations of their lonely life, and occasionally attempted to tear down the barriers which separated them so completely from the rest of mankind. The social instincts were strong within them. They possessed as broad a public spirit as did the residents of any other portion of the territory, and were willing to co-operate with others in an effort to build up a harmonious commonwealth, whose people should be drawn together by the ties of mutual interdependence and trade relationships. Furthermore, the pioneer stockmen were alert to secure from time to time new and more convenient markets for the products of their vast herds. During the first decade of the industry their beef found sale in the mines of British Columbia, Idaho and Montana. The annual drives would start from Yakima in the spring and would last for several months, in the course of which the value of each animal would increase from forty dollars at Yakima to from seventy-five to one hundred at the mines, but the danger of loss en route was great, not a few cattle perishing in attempts to cross the swift streams or being appropriated by the predacious savages and cattle rustlers. In 1869 the attention of central Washington stockmen was attracted toward the sound country as likely to furnish a promising market. About that time Joseph Borst, of Booth, Foss & Borst, butchers, of Seattle, came to the country by way of the Snoqualmie pass, purchased a number of steers and drove them over the Cascades. Having found these animals larger, fatter and better than those produced on the west side, they continued to seek a supply of beef in the Yakima valley. Other sound buyers followed their example, and a trade grew up between the two sections of the state which has continued to increase in importance, though changing in character with the change of conditions.

Notwithstanding the development of new markets, the cattle industry outgrew the requirements of the country, and the result was a decided slump in prices. For a number of years fine beef animals could be purchased for eighteen and twenty dollars per head, but about the middle seventies, eastern men began stocking the Wyoming ranges, thereby increasing the demand for, and enhancing the value of, neat cattle. However, the impetus thus given to the industry was nullified completely by the severe winter of 1880-81; the business was further curtailed by the introduction of sheep and consequent injury to the range, as also by the development of other antagonistic industries, and in the later eighties it began its long decline. While cattle are still an important factor in the wealth production of Yakima county, the industry is very unlike that of the earlier days, when countless thousands roamed freely over the hills, and the cowboy was a power in the land.

CHAPTER II.

THE PERKINS MURDER AND MOSES DEMONSTRATION.

The years 1877 and 1878 were characterized by not a little Indian difficulty throughout the whole Northwest. During the former twelve months the non-treaty Nez Percés and other disaffected Indians took the warpath under the leadership of Chief Joseph, and during the latter the Piutes and Bannocks started, with Chiefs Buffalo Horn and Egan at their head, on a marauding expedition. The war of 1877 had its seat at too great a distance from the central Washington country to seriously affect this section, though an Indian war always causes uneasiness and excitement among the tribes anywhere within hundreds of miles of the scene of hostilities. There were several leaders among the Columbia river Indians known to be disaffected. Naturally, then, some apprehension was felt by the settlers and agency people and a close watch was maintained upon the movements of the Indians, lest some hot-heads among them should start on a career of murder and pillage. But the war of 1877 was fought to a conclusion without bringing any disaster to this part of the country.

Much more direct and important was the influence of the war of 1878. The actual fighting in this conflict was likewise without the territory with which our history purposes to deal, but that the plans of the belligerent red men contemplated a campaign of slaughter in the Yakima valley there could be no doubt. During the continuance of hostilities, the people were on the verge of a volcano that might break forth in furious, destructive eruption at any moment. A brief outline of the hostile expedition which occasioned so much apprehension in Yakima and Kittitas counties is necessary to a correct understanding of conditions at this period.

The causes of the Bannock and Piute outbreak of 1878 are not definitely known. Gilbert, in his "Historical Sketches," says: "Buffalo Horn was a celebrated warrior who had the year before aided the government against Chief Joseph and his hostile band of Nez Percés. His reward for such service was not in keeping with his estimate of its value and importance. He saw Chief Joseph honored and made the recipient of presents and flattering attentions, while the great Buffalo Horn was practically ignored. His philosophical mind at once led him to the conclusion that more favors could be wrung from the government by hostility than by fighting its battles."

Colonel William Parsons, of Pendleton, who has given the subject considerable study, thinks this surmise very wide of the truth. "From time immemorial," says he, "the Bannocks have been hereditary enemies of the Oregon and Idaho Indians, including the Cayuses, Umatillas, Walla Wallas and Nez Percés, and more than once they crossed the Blue mountains and inflicted bitter injuries upon the Cayuses and their allies. Therefore, when Chief Joseph and his band of non-treaty Nez Percés took up arms in 1877, and began their famous retreat through the Lolo pass and the Yellowstone park to the British possessions, the Bannocks furnished nearly a hundred warriors to harass the fleeing Nez Percés. They saw the whole of that remarkable campaign; they saw Joseph, with less than four hundred warriors and encumbered with one thousand women and children, carry on a running fight for fourteen hundred miles, eluding Howard again and again, recapturing his camp at Big Hole Basin from General Gibbon and pursuing the latter so fiercely that nothing but his reserve artillery saved him from annihilation, and finally surrendering with the honors of war to General Miles at Bear Paw mountain, near the British line. He saw Joseph captured, but not dishonored, and became jealous of the Nez Percé chieftain's military fame; he also realized, when it was too late, that he had made a serious mistake in joining his forces to those of the whites in the pursuit and capture of the brave Nez Percés, and that in gratifying a tribal grudge, he had dealt a deadly blow at the Indian race; he saw the whites crowding into Montana and Idaho, his people ordered within the confines of the Fort Hall reservation, and it finally dawned upon his benighted mind that the same chains which had been fastened to the ankles of Joseph were already forged for his and were about to be riveted upon them. Buffalo Horn was something of a statesman but no general. He came to the conclusion that if he could unite all the Indians west of the Missouri into a confederacy, the whites could be wiped out. Therefore he visited the various bands of the Utes, Shoshones, Umatillas, Cayuses and Walla Wallas and sent runners to the Columbias, Spokanes, Chief Moses' band and other northern Indians, requesting them to unite with him in a final effort to drive the whites out of the Inland Empire."

There can be no doubt that Buffalo Horn's acts of hostility were inspired by jealousy and ambition. His schemes were comprehensive, well conceived, seemingly feasible, and could he have combined Joseph's ability to execute with his own ability to plan, the result would have been serious indeed for the whites. But no Joseph arose to lead on the Indian hordes, and the scheme failed.

Buffalo Horn's overtures to the other bands of Indians being received with favor, he set out from Fort Hall on his marauding and pillaging expedition early in June, 1878. The Bannocks and a number of Shoshones were joined by large bands of Piutes under the command of their war chief, Egan. The confederated force numbered perhaps five hundred warriors and about fifteen hundred women and children. Their plan was to move west and north from Pocatello, past Boise, until a junction was formed with the Umatillas, Cayuses, Walla Wallas and Columbias, on the Umatilla reservation; then, devastating the country, to move north, uniting with the Spokanes and other Indians in northern Washington, there to make a stand, but if hard pressed to retire across the British line.

Going around Boise, where there was a considerable military force, and keeping in the lava beds, timber and thinly settled portions of the country, they encountered during the first part of their march but little opposition. But they could not desist from murdering the few whites or Chinamen whom they met, and the result was that alarm was taken and opposing forces were put into the field before the execution of their plans could be well begun. They received at Silver creek, Idaho, a severe check from Colonels Robbins and Bernard, the former of whom had a fierce hand-to-hand encounter with Egan, which resulted in some very bad wounds for the red man.

Upon Egan, however, wounded though he was and incompetent at best, soon devolved the command of the united forces, for Buffalo Horn was killed in a skirmish before reaching the Blue mountains. The consternation in eastern Oregon, on the approach of the hostiles, can hardly be imagined. "In wagons, on horseback and on foot, the settlers hastened to the nearest towns for protection. Pendleton, Umatilla, Wallula, Milton and Walla Walla were crowded with refugees. Homes were abandoned so hastily that neither provisions nor extra clothing were provided. All settlements within reach of the warning voice were deserted in a day. Cattle and sheep men in the mountains were in a precarious situation, and many were killed before they could reach places of safety. Major Cornoyer, the Indian agent, gathered in all the Indians possible, including the Columbia river and Warm Spring Indians, amounting to about two thousand, the loyalty of many of whom was seriously doubted. But while most of the settlers escaped to towns, it must not be forgotten that the towns themselves were scarcely able to make any defense. Pendleton had not more than one hundred and fifty inhabitants. Heppner, Wallula, Weston and Milton were mere hamlets. They were widely separated—too far for mutual support—and fifteen hundred savage warriors were supposed to be about to fall upon them. Pendleton was to receive the first assault."

Had Egan marched upon Pendleton without delay during the early days of July, he could have captured the town almost without an effort. But instead of striking a decisive blow before the troops from Walla Walla and the volunteers from Weston, Milton and other points could concentrate, he frittered away the time in killing a few sheep herders and skirmishing with Captain Wilson's handful of thirty men. "So small was the force of the whites at Pendleton," says Parsons, "and so badly was it provided with arms and competent officers, to say nothing of its utter demoralization through rumors and reports of the overwhelming strength of the Indians, that men who were present affirm that if one hundred Indians had made a sharp attack on the 4th, 5th or 6th of July, the town would have fallen. If Egan's whole force of five hundred warriors had made the assault the valley of the Umatilla from the Blue mountains to the Columbia would have been swept clear of the whites. The Umatilla reservation Indians would have been forced to unite with the hostiles; the Columbias and the Washington Indians would have followed their example and Buffalo Horn's confederacy would have been consummated, to the enormous damage of white interests throughout the whole Inland Empire."

But Egan hesitated until the forces of Howard and Throckmorton had formed a junction to oppose their progress. The Umatilla reservation Indians were confirmed in their loyalty, even converted into allies of the whites, and some of their number decoyed Egan into a trap and killed him. The triumphal advance of the Indian hordes was rapidly changed into a disorderly retreat. Eventually, in Harney county, Oregon, they were captured by the United States forces, who placed them under guard on the Yakima reservation.

Had the Indians achieved the success which might easily have been theirs had they been led by able chieftains, the conditions in the Yakima country would have been indeed appalling. Many of the Indians in this locality were undoubtedly hostile in feeling. Their unfriendliness had been noticed early in the spring of 1878. They were quarrelsome and sulky; camp fires and signal lights blazed at night upon the hill tops, and small bands rode rapidly through the valleys without the usual friendly demonstrations or visits. In May the Deatons and Nelsons learned that the Piutes had despatched runners to the Yakimas and had made arrangements in accordance with which the latter were to sweep down the valley, form a junction with the other hostiles at the Columbia and proceed northward with them on a career of devastation and slaughter.

George Nelson tells us that one day in the early summer while the men were at work on his father's farm on the Naches, Yallup, a well-known young Indian, came along and suggested to the proprietor of the place that he need make no preparations for cutting his wheat. "Why?" asked the man addressed, in astonishment. "Because the Indians will attend to that for you." This reply so incensed Judge Nelson that he ordered the immediate arrest of the brazen-faced redskin. Procuring his gun, he made demonstrations as if about to hang and shoot Yallup, but eventually released the thoroughly frightened Indian, protesting, however, that he was guilty of dereliction to duty in so doing.

The details of the plan the Indians were endeavoring to execute were revealed to General Howard by a friendly squaw named Sarah Winnemucca. The information received from this woman enabled the troops to checkmate the hostiles and bring them to submission much more rapidly and effectually than could have been done otherwise. It was understood by the citizens of the Yakima valley that according to Indian plans, Moses was to occupy a position between the Wenatchee and Kittitas valleys; Smohollah was to station himself on the upper Naches and all were to await the crossing of the Columbia by the Fort Hall Indians. When signal fires should announce that the Piutes and their allies were safely over the big river, a general slaughter was to commence. Moses was to clean out the Kittitas valley, cross the Umptanum mountains and sweep the Wenas; Smohollah was to murder the settlers in the Naches and Cowiche valleys; the Piutes were to raid the lower Yakima country and Parker bottom, and all were to unite for a grand carnival of slaughter at Yakima City and the Ahtanum valley. Fortunately, the Piutes and Bannocks never got across the Columbia in force; the dreadful signal fires were never lighted and the hands of the lecherous, blood-thirsty savages were stayed.

But the settlers of central Washington could not foresee that the Indian campaign would miscarry as it did, and their condition of mind in the summer of 1878 was one of extreme anxiety, sometimes of terror. War, especially war with Indians, is a game always played in the dark, and in the dark strange terrors possess the imaginative which can never exist in the garish day. Uncertainty as to the position of the Indians, uncertainty as to the state of mind of those in their own midst, wild rumors flying everywhere and losing nothing in their flight, the knowledge of their lack of arms and ammunition, authorized leaders and concert of action, and the sickening certainty of their fate if they should be overcome by the savages—all these made the hearts and minds of the settlers a perfect maelstrom of anxiety. There was no supineness among them, however. They had been habituated by long practice to make the best of the situation, and they did so in this instance.

Though not a little alarm had existed among the people from the outbreak of the war, its terrors were not brought home to them directly until the Fourth of July. Then came a runner, carrying the dreadful intelligence that the Indians had at last arrived. Other runners started out in other directions with the message, and soon the whole country was in the throes of a wild excitement. Nearly all in the lower Yakima valley flocked to Yakima City, taking refuge in the Centennial and Schanno halls there. Later a sod fort was built on the J. B. Dickerson meadow about a mile southeast of the spot now occupied by Woodcock Academy. The walls were of mud, piled up to a height of eight feet, and were three feet thick on the average. A trench was dug around the fortification on the outside, the plan being that supplies and other property and all non-combatants should find protection within this structure, while the men should defend it from the shelter of the intrenchments. Tunnels were dug at intervals to provide communication between the trench and interior of the fort, and wells were sunk at convenient places, that the refugees might be able to withstand a long siege. A report that a number of hostiles had crossed the Columbia sent most of the farmers for many miles around from their harvesting to the protection of this fortification. For more than a week they remained in the fort or its vicinity, but their scouting parties failed to find any hostile bands, and in time they ventured back to their deserted crops. A few Indians had indeed succeeded in crossing the Columbia, despite the vigilance of the two armed boats which were patrolling it, but, as the scouts learned, they had gone toward White Bluffs.

After the return of these settlers to their homes, a petition was sent to the governor for arms and ammunition, and the chief executive responded with three hundred stand of Remington needle-guns and a supply of cartridges. These were shipped by river to The Dalles, where they were secured by a party of thirty volunteers, among them William Wylie. The rifles were brought over the old military road to Yakima City, and there distributed among the citizens. These arms have never been collected, and it is presumed that they are still in the homes of the old residents of Yakima and Kittitas counties.

When the Indian scare of the Fourth of July reached the people of the Selah and Wenas valleys, they built a fortification on the homestead of John Cleman. It consisted of a dirt breastwork two or three feet high surrounding Mr. Cleman's cabin and of a trench outside the wall. Settlers from the upper Naches, the Selah and the Wenas valleys congregated here to the number of eighty, a quarter of whom were able-bodied men, fairly well armed and equipped for military operations. Among the families gathered here were those of Leonard Thorp, George S. Taylor, Alfred Miller, Thomas Taylor, Thomas Kelly, Doc. McLaughlin, Robert Kandle, David Longmire, Richard and Hiram Perkins, brothers of the Lorenzo D. Perkins who later perished at the hands of Indians; Anson and William White, Clifford Cleman, John Cleman, Charles Longmire, John Brice, Allen Rice, Elijah Denton, — Kincaid and a clergyman named Capps. There were also two bachelors, James Henson and Thomas Pierce.

At this time it was believed by the settlers that they were entrapped and must prepare to fight their way through the ranks of the hostiles. Rumor had it that Chief Colawash, with his Klickitats, was encamped in the Naches pass; that Smohollah, with his band of Columbia Rivers, was guarding the Snoqualmie pass, while the advancing Bannocks and the Okanogans would prevent egress toward the eastward or southward. The situation, if as believed, would have been indeed serious.

Upon the return of a party from Cottonwood gulch bringing the information that no Indians were to be seen in that direction, Leonard Thorp proposed an expedition to the Naches pass to ascertain the truth concerning its reported blockade. To many of the settlers it seemed like unwarranted temerity to thus ride into a camp of hostiles, but there were those among them who shrank not from the dangerous undertaking. The personnel of the company, as finally made up, was Leonard Thorp, David Longmire, Thomas Pierce and James Henson. They set out at daylight, all well mounted and armed, with a professedly friendly Indian as scout. Ascending the Wenas to the old sawmill, they followed the trail thence over the high divide between that stream and the Naches to a position just above the mouth of Nile creek. The party determined to make a reconnaissance of this locality, and proceeded to the banks of the Nile. At its junction with the Naches they found many tracks of Indian women and children. They noticed also that their Indian scout displayed signs of uneasiness. Finally he tried to separate himself from the whites, giving as an excuse that he wished to look for lost horses, but his companions would not permit his departure. Mr. Longmire took upon himself the duty of keeping an eye on the Indian, of whose good faith doubts were beginning to be seriously entertained.

In time the party came upon a company of old squaws; also caught a glimpse of a young buck in war regalia riding through the brush at full speed. The attention of the men was attracted by the beating of a tom-tom drum lower down the Naches, and proceeding in the direction whence the sound came, they soon discovered several tepees and tents across the river. There was now no retreat. Their presence was known to the savages, and to escape them by flight, if they chose to pursue, was an impossibility. Anyhow, the party had come for information, and was determined to get it if possible, at whatever personal risk, so they crossed the river and boldly rode into the midst of the camp. Mr. Thorp walked up to the largest tent, the one whence the tom-tom noise was issuing, and boldly entered it, gun in hand. Inquiring of old Sharlow, the first Indian he encountered, what the Indians were doing on the Naches, he received no reply except a grunt. Other questions elicited like responses, the ancient redskin being in too ill a humor to bear catechising graciously. Meanwhile the other savages continued to pound the logs, which they were using as drums, leading the whites to believe that a war dance was in progress.

At last Sharlow demanded what the white men were doing in the Indian camp and why they had guns. He was told that a few days previously four government horses had been stolen from the reservation either by whites or Indians; that the party was in search of the property and that the guns were for use in case the thieves, when found, resisted arrest. Sharlow, apparently mollified by this explanation, assured the white men that there were no stolen horses in the camp, and continued to talk while they reconnoitered the situation, making cautious inquiries betimes as to whether the red men were disposed to be friendly or hostile. Sharlow protested that not only he but all the Indians there encamped were most cordial in their feelings of amity toward the "Bostons."

The object of the scouting party's mission accomplished, and expressions of mutual goodwill interchanged, the whites withdrew from the Indian camp, glad to get away unscathed, yet having seen no cause of alarm. A long, hard ride brought them back to the fort by dark.

Their report so far restored the confidence of the people that many returned to their homes next day, though the majority were still apprehensive of danger. These moved seven miles farther up the creek and built a rude plank fortification, known as Fort Union, on the Allen Rice place. It was, however, never much used, as the settlers, their fears quieted by the fact that no depredations of Indians were reported, soon resumed their usual vocations.

But it does not follow from the fact that the main body of the settlers escaped so well that their apprehensions were wholly unfounded and that the local Indians were unanimous in their sentiments toward the whites. Indeed, the valleys of central Washington were by no means safe places for small parties during the troublous summer of 1878. The Indians led by Moses and the old dreamer, Smohollah, were undoubtedly hostile in feeling, and some of them, excited by reports of the war which were constantly reaching them from the scene of action, were ready to commit depredations should opportunity offer. Opportunity did offer before the summer was over, and Lorenzo D. Perkins and his wife lost their lives as a result.

Mr. Perkins was a successful stock raiser about thirty-five years old at the time of his sad fate. He had come to the country with his brothers and settled on the Wenas several years before, and had been married the year previous. His wife, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bunting, was much younger than he. Early in the summer Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, in company with Harry Burbanks, his son, Walter, his nephew, Albert Burbanks, and John M. Edwards, had made a trip into the Spokane country in quest of range. Before the first of July they were back to White Bluffs, on the Columbia river, where the married couple separated from their companions, going to their cabin ten miles below. The rest of the company came on to Yakima City. A few days later, when startling reports of invading hostiles reached the people of the valley, the elder Burbanks sent Walter and his cousin, Albert, over to the Columbia river slope to gather up his horses, lest they fall into the hands of Indians. The young men proceeded on their way without adventure until they reached Big Willows, now known as the hog ranch. There, however, they encountered eight Indians, who attacked them fiercely, forcing them to retreat hastily. Before they could get out of range, Walter's coat and vest were punctured by a bullet. For more than four miles the Indians followed him closely, firing occasionally, but without success. At length he escaped through the superior speed and endurance of his horse. His companion escaped, not only the rifles of the attacking party but a stern chase, by leaping his horse over a precipice, and remaining off the road for a distance. He at length rejoined his cousin and both returned to Yakima City, where the relation of their experience caused not a little excitement. Walter Burbanks returned at once to the scene with William Splawn, Edward Lindsey, John M. Edwards and two or three others to reconnoiter and bring in whatever stock they could find. They discovered the desired band of horses, but no Indians.

About this time the inquiry was made of a number of stockmen who visited Yakima City from the White Bluffs country concerning the Perkins couple. The men stated that Perkins and his wife had left for Yakima City several days before, and one of their number, a man named King, said he had ferried them across the Columbia at White Bluffs July 9th. Agent Wilbur sought to calm the fears of relatives by reporting to them the statement of Indians that the missing people were safe at Wallula, but the Indian reports were not considered worthy of full confidence, and, no word coming from trustworthy sources, John McAllister, uncle of Mrs. Perkins, and Adam Duncan made a trip to White Bluffs to investigate. They found no traces. Another trip was made by the same persons for the same purpose, and this time, at Rattlesnake springs, a piece of quilt and a broken dish, which were subsequently identified by friends as the property of the missing couple, were unearthed. Rev. J. H. Wilbur, agent in charge of the Yakima reservation, was now appealed to for Indian scouts, and he sent three, Stick Joe, Joe Ennius and a California Indian known as Dick. These, with six white men, namely, John M. Edwards, Andrew J. Chambers, John Splawn, J. H. Conrad, Adam Duncan and John McAllister, proceeded direct to Rattlesnake springs, thirty-eight miles east of Yakima City, where they engaged in a diligent search. Clues to the missing were soon discovered, and in due time the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Perkins were found by Stick Joe in the bottom of a shallow ravine a mile below the upper springs. A heavy flood had passed down this draw at some time, creating a washout several yards in width. The rushing waters had been separated at one point in their career into two streams, which, reuniting lower down, had formed a miniature island. On one side of this island the body of Perkins was interred, and on the other that of his wife, both being covered with rocks and cobble stones. The remains of the unfortunate lady gave strong evidence that her spirit had not yet deserted its prison house of clay when she was laid to rest, for one knee protruded through the rocks as if raised in spite of the heavy burden upon it, while one arm was thrust outward and above her head. It was impossible to examine the corpses with much minuteness, as decomposition was in an advanced stage, but it was observed that the clothing of the man had been pierced by many bullets.

Such parts of the story of the unfortunate affair as could not be learned by observation were disclosed later by the confession and state's evidence of Moosetonic, one of the Indian miscreants responsible for the awful deed. Unfortunately, the court records of the trial were destroyed by fire, and no printed reports of the celebrated case are at hand, if any exist, but the facts disclosed by the testimony as nearly as can be recalled by those who followed the case closely at the time are as follows:

The Indians who perpetrated the foul crime numbered seven in all. Wyantatic, their leader, together with Salusakin, Tewowney, Moosetonic, Tommy Hop-Towne and Chuck Chuck, belonged on the Yakima reservation; the seventh, named Kipe, lived on the Columbia, near The Dalles. They had joined the hostile Bannock and Piute hordes south of the Columbia, had been among the number who attempted to effect a crossing at Long Island, but had been prevented from so doing by the forces under Howard and Ferry; had later separated themselves from their confreres and crossed to the north side of the river, despite the vigilance of the armed boats, and were on their way northward to join Moses when they met Perkins and his wife. Both the doomed pair and the murderers camped that fatal day at Rattlesnake springs. Disappointed that they had been foiled in their military plans and burning with hatred toward the superior race, the Indians resolved to get what revenge they could by attacking the two non-combatants in their power. First, however, they desired to learn whether or not they were armed, so two of their number, of whom the leader was one, came up to the Perkins camp and requested food. Mr. Perkins gave them nearly all he had, saying the necessity of the Indians was greater than that of himself and wife, and that anyway the distance to Yakima City, where plenty could be obtained, was not great.

This evidence of good-will toward them and solicitude for their comfort would surely have touched a tender spot in the hearts of the savages, had there been any there to touch, but with a malevolence and hate which nothing but blood could appease, the dastardly Wyantatic threw aside his mask of friendship and drew his gun. Tommy Hop-Towne did likewise. Mrs. Perkins began pleading for mercy, while her husband addressed himself to the task of saddling up. Prayers and tears were as unavailing as charity had been. Mr. Perkins received a shot which crippled him, but managed, nevertheless, to get his wife and himself on the horses. Then began the race for life. A second shot took effect on the body of Mr. Perkins, inflicting a mortal wound, and, of course, putting escape for him out of the question. Time had not been given to saddle the horse on which Mrs. Perkins was mounted, but she was an excellent rider and could guide her animal accurately by the tethering rope. Escape by the road was cut off by Moose-tonic, so she was forced to take to the sage brush. She rode a horse abundantly capable of distancing the fleetest of the Indian ponies, and might have got away safely were it not for an accident. Though a deep, wide draw lay in front of her, she shrank not from the dangerous leap.

The horse, however, instead of gathering his forces for the jump, hesitated, thereby losing the momentum necessary to carry him safely over.
As a result, he fell short of the opposite bank, threw his rider and crippled her. The Indians came up, forced her back to her expiring husband, and, notwithstanding her pleadings and the offer of all that she and her husband possessed as a ransom for their lives, put an end to the earthly career of both. There is some doubt as to how Mrs. Perkins came to her death. Her mother, Mrs. Cheney, formerly Mrs. Bunting, claims that she was shot, but some of those who found the bodies think she was stunned in some way and buried even before the light of her life had gone out.

During the summer and fall every effort was made to find the murderers, but the most definite information that could be obtained was that they had joined Chief Moses, who was himself giving trouble to the authorities by refusing to go with his followers upon the Yakima reservation. Both he and Smohollah, the dreamer, were thought to have been implicated, directly or indirectly, in the Perkins affair. At this time John M. Edwards and an Indian boy named Jim Nelson were engaged in herding and looking after William Splawn's cattle on the east side of the Columbia.
One day an Indian known as Warnateer came to Mr. Edwards and told him the murderers so much desired by the citizens were at White Bluffs, engaged in a great gambling game. "If you will go with me," said he, "I will point out the guilty ones by moving around the circle and extending my foot towards each of them in succession."
Edwards decided to accompany Warnateer, despite the risk involved, so he and his dusky companion crossed the river together and walked boldly into the midst of the gamblers. Warnateer kept his word, and Edwards noted carefully the features of the seven men indicated, who, being in blissful ignorance of the significance of the visit their band had received, continued in play all night long.

Mr. Edwards returned to the eastern side of the Columbia, crossing at the Indian camp and going some distance in the direction in which his Indian boy, Jim, was. This he did to disarm suspicion, for his real intention was to proceed alone to Yakima City and arouse the people there to a pursuit of the murderers. He accordingly made a detour back to the river, hunted up a rickety canoe, recrossed to the west side at great risk, for his craft was badly disabled, secured a mount and rode rapidly up the valley. Arriving at Yakima City, he communicated to William Splawn the information he had gained. The call for a party of volunteers to go out and bring in the Indian murderers went forth at once, but for some reason it did not meet with a hearty response. Finally, Splawn, Edwards and a man named Denny started for White Bluffs, intending to make the arrest themselves if opportunity offered, otherwise to turn their attention to their cattle on the range. Upon arriving at the Indian camping place, they found their birds had flown, but the adventure of Mr. Edwards and such information as had been gained by the subsequent expedition were communicated to the officers at the agency.

About December 1st, Agent Wilbur sent an invitation to Chief Moses, requesting that worthy to meet him in Yakima City for the purpose of holding a friendly council. Moses accepted, and appeared at the appointed time. An anxious crowd, large enough to thoroughly pack old Centennial hall, congregated to hear what the dreaded chieftain might have to say. Father Wilbur opened the council with an address in which he dwelt upon the wrong committed when one man takes the life of another. Coming to the Perkins murder, he said Moses was chief over the tribe whose members committed the deed, and could, if he would, assist in the capture. When called upon for a speech, Moses stepped forward.
He was attired "in a long coat, Prince Albert style, black trousers, buckskin leggings, wore a white handkerchief about his neck and a wide-brimmed Spanish hat." For two or three hours he talked, dwelling considerably upon his own greatness, denying complicity in the murders and finally agreeing to assist in capturing the murderers.

It was arranged that Moses should proceed to a point ten miles above the head of Priest rapids, on the Columbia river, that later the whites should rejoin him there in sufficient force and that both should proceed together to the camp of the Indians wanted by the civil authorities.

Accordingly, thirty determined white men and as many Yakima Indian police, the latter under the leadership of Captain Ennius, organized and set out upon this unpleasant and dangerous mission. The party was in the nature of a posse, as Deputy Sheriff John Splawn carried warrants for the arrest of the Indian suspects. Contrary to the original design, the combined white and Indian force proceeded direct to Priest rapids, doing so on the advice of Ennius, who was fearful lest Moses might be meditating treachery. At Priest rapids, the whites held a military election, which resulted in the choice of William Splawn as captain, and George Taylor as lieutenant. What caused Ennius to be so suspicious is unknown, but he was unremitting in his warnings to Captain Splawn to guard against treachery, and the latter was inclined to pay good heed to his advice, believing that an Indian was best qualified to understand an Indian.

The party had been on the east side of the Columbia about an hour when Ennius started on a reconnoissance toward the supposed position of Chief Moses. Presently the scout reappeared in an excited frame of mind, and advised Captain Splawn to prepare for action forthwith, as he had seen Moses approaching rapidly with a hundred warriors. Immediately the order was given to take a position behind some driftwood near the shore, but the men, not being trained to execute movements with military precision, fumbled around some, and when Moses appeared a short distance from camp were in anything but readiness for a charge. Seeing that time must be gained at all hazards, Captain Splawn mounted his horse rapidly and rode forward to meet the oncoming chieftain.

According to the reports of eye-witnesses, the scene presented by Moses and his warriors was one of entrancing picturesqueness. As the hundred dusky riders swept rapidly across the plains in full martial array with Chief Moses and Inmeseka Bill in the lead, the whites failed not to notice the perfect order of their wild, swift movements or their gay array of savage war toggery. Though the air was crisp and frosty, they were clad in the garb that nature gave them, with no additions thereto save moccasins for the feet and small breech-clouts for their loins. Some also wore feathered hoods, some nothing but plumage stuck in their heavy black hair, while most had smeared their heads fantastically with a peculiar blue clay. All were in full war paint and fully armed.

No awful war whoop rent the air as they approached. Silently, except for the measured hoof-beats, they bore down upon the solitary white man a few hundred feet from his command. He sat quietly awaiting them. Soon he found himself in an awkward position between the two Indian leaders, but putting on a bold front, he, revolver in hand, hailed the chief in an authoritative tone, demanding the reason for his approach in such a hostile manner. Moses replied that he did so "just for fun;" that he always approached Howard in that way. Captain Splawn reminded the chieftain that he had promised to send ten guides with the whites to ferret out the Perkins murderers and asked if he thought it in keeping with the spirit of that agreement to meet the whites with a hundred warriors prepared for battle at a moment's notice. "We have come for the murderers," said he, "and do not desire war with the Columbia river tribes, but if you wish to fight, all you have to do is to open the attack."

Moses turned in his saddle and uttered a word in his native tongue. Instantly the warriors executed a well-ordered movement which placed them two columns deep in a line directly facing the whites. At the same time a score of Indian weapons went to the shoulders of their owners. The whites and reservation police, who had by this time formed in some kind of order, also leveled their guns.

Thus the flower of the Columbia river warriors stood facing the handful of pioneers. The Indian gleam of hatred and defiance was answered by the unflinching, calm gaze of a band of men picked for their acknowledged courage and iron resolution. The situation was indeed a critical one. A single spasmodic movement of any one of the many fingers which that moment touched the triggers of as many rifles, and a battery of suppressed race hatred would have gone off in one tremendous, death-dealing explosion. But the self-control of both white and Indian was equal to the strain to which it was subjected, and the key to the situation was left in possession of the two leaders.

Once again Captain Splawn spoke. "Moses," said he, "if you want to fight, cut loose. For you and me there can be but one result—death. We'll die. If you don't want to fight, pull your men off." Truly, the famed chieftain of the Columbia had the gauntlet at his feet, while at his back was a force sufficient to justify his picking it up had he felt so disposed. Instead, however, he gave a word of command which placed his warriors in marching order, then without formal leave-taking, advanced with his sub-chief to a position in front of the column and rode away to the eastward.

After the departure of Moses, Splawn ordered his command to the saddle and pushed on down the river to Smohollah's camp, twelve miles below. Arriving there early in the evening, the whites surrounded the seventy-five or eighty lodges constituting the village and sent in a searching squad to look for the murderers. The quest proved vain. Smohollah and his warriors had joined Moses, leaving none in the encampment but the women, children and old men. The squad, however, gained the information that Moses was camped among the rocks at the mouth of Crab creek. Next day Splawn's company came to a halt at White Bluffs, whence they sent George Goodwin back to Yakima City for reinforcements. In three days he was again on the river with some fifty or sixty recruits, also additional supplies. Leaving a force to protect the boats and baggage, Captain Splawn set out with the rest of the citizens and Indian allies for a search of the interior country. As Crab creek is the principal stream in the immediate neighborhood of the bluffs, and as Moses was upon its banks according to last reports, it was natural that it should be first explored.

The company had not proceeded far when it fell in with Dorsey Schnebly, of Ellensburg, and a small company of men. Mr. Schnebly had been elected sheriff during the fall of 1878 and was, of course, notified of the Moses meeting in Yakima and of the arrangement entered into there by which the chieftain was to co-operate with the whites and agency police in an effort to capture the murderers. As requested, the sheriff collected a small company and proceeded to Moses' camp on the Columbia near Crab creek. Those with him were Charles Kenneth, Charles Schnebly, Charles B. Reed, John Catlin and Willie Baker. The last named, who was only a boy, returned home as soon as they reached the Columbia, while Schnebly, Reed and Catlin crossed over and entered the camp of Moses. The chief received them in an apathetic manner, told them of his meeting with Splawn and that he had frightened the Yakima party so thoroughly that they had crossed the Columbia and gone home, and advised them against going any farther without an Indian escort. When Schnebly refused the proffered guard, Moses said that he could render him no further assistance than to put him over the Columbia again. This the Indian canoemen did. Schnebly and party then proceeded down the river to Nick McCoy's ferry, crossed the river there and proceeded thence to Crab creek, camping where the White Bluffs road crosses that stream. By reconnoitering, Schnebly and Catlin found a trail which they followed five or six miles. They then turned back to camp, however, as they had become apprehensive of an ambushade. At dark the party decided to go to White Bluffs and find out whether or not the Yakima men had returned, as Moses said. About ten o'clock they met and joined Splawn's company, and from that time on they shared its adventures.

Meanwhile, a scouting detachment had ascended to the summit of the divide between Crab creek and the Columbia river, and had thence descried a fire near the upper crossing of the creek. Believing this to be in the camp of the murderers, who were supposed to be dressing a beef, the entire party approached the spot rapidly, but with great caution. A little before reaching the scene the company separated into two divisions, one of which was led by Captain Splawn, the other by Lieutenant Taylor. The former dashed in above the encampment, while the latter threw his force below, so as to cut off retreat. Great was the surprise of the besiegers when they heard the familiar voice of Chief Moses calling to them not to shoot. Immediately Splawn ordered his men to make no attack, but to surround the camp; which done, Moses and the nine or ten warriors with him were quickly disarmed. It is stated that some of the whites were so furious that it was with difficulty they restrained themselves from ending the life of the wily chieftain. Moses offered as an explanation of his presence so far away from camp that he was searching for the volunteers with intent to join them. He also stated that he had located the murderers and was willing to guide the whites to them.

About daylight, the party started for Crab creek, and by seven o'clock they reached a deserted camping ground. Thereupon, according to Captain Splawn's statement, Moses suggested that it would be well for himself and Splawn to make a preliminary reconnoissance, that the exact location of the murderers might be ascertained before a general assault should be attempted. Accordingly, the two men, accompanied by Indian Jim, went out on a scouting expedition. They found by the trail made in the fresh snow (for there had been a light snowfall during the night) that the fugitives had gone away to the northward. Some of those who were present fail to remember this reconnoissance of Moses and Splawn and contend that Moses, after his capture, never left the main body of volunteers and police, but it is possible that the two men and their Indian companion may have slipped out while the rest of the men were busy preparing breakfast.

Upon returning to camp, Splawn communicated to Ennis the information he had obtained on his reconnoissance. He found his Indian ally as suspicious of Moses as ever, and firm in the belief that the men who had left the smouldering camp fire and made the track were acting as a decoy to lead the whites into a trap; indeed, he was so certain of this that he threatened to withdraw his entire force, should Splawn carry out his determination to follow the trail. Moses' actions had certainly been such as to furnish grounds for suspicion, and the white leader, thinking that one Indian's views regarding the intentions of another were worthy of due consideration, determined to change his plan of action somewhat. So, instead of taking up the trail with all his force, he sent several of Moses' men in pursuit, holding Moses himself as a hostage for their correct behavior. The pursuers acted in good faith, overtaking the fugitives fifty miles up the Columbia, capturing one and pressing the other so hard that he had to kill himself to avoid being taken. The name of their captive was Tommy Hop-Towne and of the suicide Chuck Chuck.

Meanwhile the volunteers and agency police had returned to White Bluffs. There they found Moosetonic, who surrendered himself to them, realizing that he could not hope to permanently retain his freedom and that he might as well give up the effort first as last. At this point, also, they received a request from Agent Wilbur that they assist in putting all the Columbia river tribes, except Moses' Indians, upon the reservation. To this they assented, so that several days were devoted to ranging the shores of the river and sending the scattered bands to the home the government had provided for them. A portion of the command under Lieutenant Taylor had been sent to Yakima City with the prisoners, and these on returning reported that the reservation police had captured the remaining members of the murderous band, or part of them, so the volunteers, their mission accomplished, returned to their homes after a lively campaign of two weeks' duration.

The Yakima people, alarmed at Chief Moses' hostile attitude, had despatched a runner for aid to Goldendale, where was stationed the only militia company in the territory at that time. When the country was threatened by the Bannock and Piute Indians, this company had been organized and armed for home defense, with Enoch W. Pike as its captain, George Latimer its first lieutenant, and C. J. Google its second lieutenant. It had on its muster roll sixty-six names. The messenger arrived on Christmas eve and reported immediately to R. O. Dunbar, who in turn referred him to Captain Pike. The captain issued an immediate call to his company, and that very day as many of them as could be gathered together set out to the assistance of their neighboring county. Many of the men were unable to procure horses on such short notice, so they loaded their saddles on the supply wagons and set out on foot. Arriving at the Yakima reservation, they appropriated as many horses as were necessary to mount the command and pushed with all possible speed to the assistance of Captain Splawn.

Before they arrived at Yakima City, however, the Indian murderers had already been apprehended and brought to that place. The services of the Klickitat men were nevertheless called into requisition in guarding the jail, for it was feared that some of the enraged white population might take the Indian murderers from the authorities and hang them without waiting for due process of law. All night long the Klickitat Rangers, as they came to be called, stood guard around the jail. At the request of Rev. J. H. Wilbur, they also escorted Chief Moses from Yakima City to the reservation. The feeling against the murderous Indians was strong, but the vigilance of the Klickitat company and the precautions of its captain, who lacked neither the experience nor the soldierly qualities necessary to a successful military commander, prevented an attack from without, if any such was indeed designed. To guard against possible shots from ambush, Captain Pike formed his company into a hollow square about the chief, wherever the natural features of the country were favorable to such an attack. Indeed, one member of the Klickitat Rangers proved that he was not above treachery by making an attempt on the life of the old chieftain, but the attention of the commander was attracted by the click of the gun as he cocked it to shoot Moses. Captain Pike was upon him in an instant, and he was easily overpowered and rendered harmless.

There has been much discussion over Moses' actions in this whole affair, some contending that the white men must bear the blame for his unfriendly demonstrations at the first meeting on the Columbia. These critics aver that the unwarranted suspicion of the whites and their failure to meet Moses at the place appointed were sufficient provocation to justify his manifestations of hostile feeling. Those members of the expedition who have been interviewed are nearly unanimous in declaring their belief that Moses was in league with the murderers and did his best to shield them; that his actions at the first meeting were dictated by a policy of hostility to the enforcement of the law, and that his appearance on upper Crab creek when he was supposed to be at its mouth was due to his efforts to warn the murderers of their peril. His failure to so warn them, they claim, was owing to his inability to find them in the dark. Mr. Schnebly thinks he was searching for the Kittitas valley party to murder them. Whether or not the chieftain acted in good faith is a question upon which there will always be two opinions.

Moses remained on the Yakima reservation until called to Washington, February 12, 1879, when he was permitted to return to the Columbia, that he might make necessary preparations for the trip. F. Dorsey Schnebly, who was then sheriff of Yakima county, states that he and his deputy, Conrad, arrested Moses on the Yakima river on a warrant charging him with being accessory to the Perkins murder, that he was given a preliminary hearing at Yakima City, was finally released on bonds furnished by Agent Wilbur, conditioned on his appearance at the next term of court, and allowed to proceed to Washington. There he succeeded in securing a reservation, adjoining the Colville reservation on the west.

"As a matter of fact," says Mr. Schnebly, "several of the murderers were still at large when the Yakima expedition returned from its labors. A little later I was informed by Willis Thorp that he was certain that some of them were in the Okanogan region. I learned that Thorp was ready to return to his works in those parts, so deputized him to arrest any of the murderers he might find."

Upon reaching the Okanogan country, Thorp and two companions, Martin Rozelle and Pleasant Bounds, entered an Indian camp for the purpose of arresting some of the red men, Bounds says for cattle stealing. They succeeded in taking a number into custody, but a rescue was attempted by friends of the prisoners and a fierce fight ensued, in the course of which shots were fired. Two or three Indians were killed, and one white man, Rozelle, had an arm shattered. The Indian prisoners escaped. Mr. Schnebly thinks it might have gone hard with the whites in this fight, were it not for the timely arrival upon the scene of William Condon, a squaw man, who joined forces with the other whites and helped them to put the redskins to rout. Whether or not any of the arrested Indians were members of the gang that murdered the Perkins family may not be certainly known. Mr. Bounds thinks that some of them were probably of the gang that chased the Burbanks boys.

One of the Perkins murderers committed suicide, was captured through the efforts of the Yakima expedition, one surrendered, two were captured by agency police, and two were captured at Colville and brought thence, one at a time, by Sheriff Schnebly, who made the two trips for them without incident, though in doing so he had to pass through a country occupied by Indians, well known to be disaffected and ugly.

All the Indians accused of actually killing Mr. and Mrs. Perkins, except Moosetonic, who turned state's evidence and thereby saved his worthless neck, were held to appear before the district court, which met in October, 1879. Samuel G. Wingard, federal judge for the eastern district of Washington territory, presided at the trial. T. J. Anders prosecuted the case, while J. W. Hamilton and Edward Whitson appeared for the defense. Wyantcat, Salusakin, Tewowney, Tommy Hop-Towne and Kipe were convicted and sentenced to the death penalty.

But a series of stirring events were to transpire before the last of the condemned murderers should render up his life in expiation of his awful crime. A very few days after the close of the trial all of the Indians escaped from the jail yard and got as far as Union gap before being recaptured. A little later a second escape was effected. This time they were gone several days before their whereabouts could be learned by the authorities, but at length a message came to Yakima City from Deputy Sheriff York saying that the fugitives had been discovered in the river bottom near the Toppenish, and asking assistance.

The request brought an immediate response from John and William Splawn and Deputy Sheriff James H. Conrad, who were joined on the road by William Nash. As the four men were alighting from their rig at an Indian house in the neighborhood in which the fugitives were supposed to be hiding, two dripping and mud-be-daubed Indians were brought there by the reservation police and turned over to Conrad. A little sweating drew from these Indians the information that they had visited and taken food to the refugees and had jumped into the river to escape the officers.

A consultation as to the best mode of procedure was now had, in the course of which Deputy Sheriff Conrad turned the management of the proposed night expedition to the haunts of the fugitives over to William Splawn, believing that the former experience of that gentleman across the Columbia had made him the fittest man for this undertaking. When darkness came on the party set out. With the white men went the younger of the two captured Indians, who was compelled by his captors to act as a guide and decoy, and was instructed to stop just before reaching the spot where the refugees were concealed. Cautiously and with as little noise as possible, the little squad followed their guide through the tall grass and brush, their indistinct trail lighted only by the silver rays of the moon. At length the Indian gave the signal agreed upon, and the party came to a halt to arrange the details of the final coup. When all was in readiness, the leader and the decoy led on to the edge of an opening, where the Indian built a small fire, John Splawn and Conrad meanwhile taking convenient positions in the company. Then the young Indian (any hesitancy he may have had about betraying his friends being overcome by the three ugly-looking rifles that were pointed in his direction, and all thoughts of warning the fugitives being banished by the same dire instruments of death) hallooed several times in a subdued voice. The reply was long in coming, but it came at last. A request by the decoy to come out by the fire was followed by another long silence, but eventually Tommy Hop-Towne emerged from the dense shadows and cautiously approached the fire.

Wyantcat joined him presently; then two others arose from behind a nearby knoll, with intent to join their companions, but at this juncture came a turn in events which interfered with the success of the expedition. Voices of an approaching party of white men broke in upon the stillness of the evening air and soon the tones of Deputy Sheriff York were recognized by Splawn. Though the Indians were slow to take alarm, Splawn well knew that his birds would escape him unless immediate action were taken, so he shouted a summons to the Indians to surrender, at the same time rising from his hiding-place in the grass. With a cry like that of a fell beast startled by the huntsman Wyantcat made a break for liberty, but his flight was cut short by a bullet from the rifle of Captain Splawn, and a second shot brought to a close his earthly career. Tommy Hop-Towne and the other refugees gained the denser brush and tules, the former escaping the rifles of the whites by shaping his course so as to keep Captain Splawn between himself and them.

Diligent search failed to discover the fugitives that night, but the next morning Kipe and Salusakin were apprehended, and later Tewowney was captured on the reservation. Again they were placed in custody and again they attempted to regain their freedom, this time just a few days before the date set for their execution. This final struggle against fate was made by means of a moccasin containing a stone handed them by confederates on the outside. At the time chosen for the desperate undertaking, Jailer York, as soon as he got within the prisoners' cell, was struck over the head with the weapon. The blow knocked him down; indeed, inflicted such injury as to almost cost him his life at a later date, but he quickly rallied from its first effects and began shooting at his assailants. Captain Brooks, the probate judge, who was at the time in the sheriff's office reading a paper, heard the commotion, divined its cause, snatched up a loaded Winchester, hastened to the scene and began taking a hand in the fight. The Indians secured guns from the sheriff's office, into which the jail door opened, but were overpowered before they could do any damage with them, a considerable force of white men having quickly gathered. In the fracas Tewowney was wounded, so that he died before the day set for the execution, and Salusakin's arm was shattered. No later attempts were made to escape, and the two remaining prisoners, Kipe and Salusakin, died the murderer's shameful death.

All the seven except Hop-Towne had now been disposed of; one having been allowed his liberty on account of having turned state's witness; one having committed suicide; one having been killed in an effort to escape arrest, and one in an attempt to break jail, two having been hanged. The seventh miscreant was still at liberty, but the avenger of blood was on his track.

In July, 1880, James Taggart and Robert Bunting, the latter a brother of Mrs. Perkins, succeeded in getting Tommy Hop-Towne into custody, though in order to do so they found it necessary to disable the Indian and his squaw. The following November the death sentence pronounced upon him so long before was carried into execution and the curtain dropped on the last act of this sanguinary tragedy.

The foregoing narrative is the result of not a little interviewing and research. Captain William Splawn, John Edwards, Mrs. Cheney, A. J. Chambers, J. H. Conrad, F. Dorsey Schnebly, Mrs. J. P. Beck, Edward Whitson, Mrs. Louisa H. Cary and others have been seen for information, and have very kindly related to us the details, as nearly as they could recall them, of the unfortunate Perkins murder and the trial growing out of it. It is believed that the statements hereinbefore made are substantially correct, though the dearth of printed contemporaneous accounts and official records has made it impossible to be as accurate in statement, as certain of the correct sequence of events, as definite in fixing dates and as full in other minutiae as could be informed.

CHAPTER III.

CURRENT HISTORY—1878-1889.

While the stirring events narrated in the last chapter naturally awakened deep interest among the people of the county, they cannot be said to have given pause to the progress of internal development, though they could not fail to check the speed of such development in at least a limited degree. It is possible that the Indian troubles of 1877 and 1878, coming as the culmination of a long series of disturbances and annoyances from disaffected Indians, may have frightened away from our territory some who might otherwise have sought homes within it. The same cause, combined with the fact that much damage was done to fruit trees, growing wheat and other crops by heavy frosts in May, 1878, induced a few to remove from the county who had intended to make permanent settlement therein, but forces were at work to more than neutralize these disadvantages and to cause the settlement of the valley at a more rapid rate than ever before. The effect of the Indian war upon some of the oldest residents was rather to confirm them in their determination to commit their fortunes unreservedly and for all time to the section in which they had cast their lot. They perceived that the failure of the Bannock confederacy meant the overthrow of the last Indian hope that the Northwest could be reduced to its primitive condition of barbarism, and they reasoned that the vigorous pursuit and final punishment of the Perkins murderers would tend to put a quietus upon attempts at such depredations in future. Indeed, it was an earnest desire to teach the savages a lesson never to be forgotten that lent energy to their efforts to bring the miscreants to justice. The correctness of their reasoning has been abundantly manifested by their subsequent peaceful and friendly relations with the Indian tribes in their midst.

As we learn from the Spokane Times of November 27, 1879, the hay crop that season was unusually large and the cattlemen were happy in the certainty that, whether the coming winter should be long or short, severe or mild, their herds were secure. The same paper states on the authority of the Yakima paper that there were abundant data upon which to base the statement that the wheat crop of the county would aggregate two hundred and twenty-five thousand bushels. This estimate, if accurate, gives a very fair idea of the progress agriculture had made at the close of the seventies.

An event of the year 1880 of considerable importance was the establishment of the United States land district of Yakima by order of President Hayes. It embraced the counties of Yakima, Klickitat, Okanogan and Douglas, extending from the Columbia river on the south to the British line on the north. It was set off from the Walla Walla district. R. B. Kinne was the first register and J. M. Adams the first receiver. The office opened its doors for business October 18, 1880, in Yakima City, and the first homestead filing recorded is that of John Blomquist, on the north half of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section eight, township eighteen north, range nineteen east. Next day Isaac M. Thomas filed a homestead claim, and during the month of October sixteen entries were made, ten of which were later annulled. May 1, 1885, the office was removed from Yakima City to North Yakima, and in that year also Captain J. H. Thomas became register and Luther S. Howlett succeeded to the receivership. The district was later cut down in area by the formation of the Waterville land district, and at present it includes only portions of Yakima, Kittitas and Douglas counties.

The winter of 1880-81 was, next to that of 1861-62, the most severe ever witnessed by white people in Yakima county, and, for the percentage of stock loss, it enjoys a bad eminence over all seasons since settlement began. It is stated that fully eighty per cent. of the cattle perished, while the death rate of horses was between ten and twenty per cent. The severe cold was not confined to the Yakima country, but extended widely over the entire Northwest. William Splawn, who was that year wintering twelve hundred head on the Crab creek range in Douglas county, found himself with only two hundred and fifty extremely weak and thin animals in the spring. The cattle of Snipes & Allen died by thousands, and Wesley C. Jones states that his own loss aggregated twenty thousand dollars. Many stockmen were compelled to go out of business entirely, and of these a large percentage turned their attention to other industries and never again ventured into cattle raising. The official report of Father Wilbur gives us an idea of the effect of the severe cold upon the reservation. Referring to the climatic conditions and their results, he says:

"The unusual severity of the past winter proved a severe blow to our Indians. In obedience to my instructions they have been in the habit of providing forage for the stock during the winter, which has usually proved more than sufficient. But last winter was one of unusual severity. From December 1st till nearly the 31st of March the earth was covered with a depth of from eight to thirty-six inches of snow, with a heavy crust most of the time, so that animals were unable to move outside the beaten paths; consequently, when the supply of forage was exhausted, cattle and horses were unable to reach the creek bottoms, where they might browse on bushes, but for the most part perished where they were. Nor did much success attend the efforts of many of the Indians who tried to save a portion of their stock by breaking roads to the creek bottoms, though some were saved in that way. Probably ninety per cent. of the Indian horses perished and eighty per cent. of their cattle. Many families formerly in comparatively good circumstances were reduced to poverty and the means of all seriously impaired. The effect has been that some have been stimulated to greater effort and now look to the cultivation of the soil for a support instead of depending, as formerly, on the sale of ponies."

"In the Yakima valley," says Wesley C. Jones, "snow commenced falling just before Christmas, and it continued to fall until the entire country had a blanket eighteen inches thick. Then came a chinook. After it had melted part of the snow and caused the rest to pack closely, it ceased and the temperature fell rapidly, resulting in the formation of a hard crust. About Christmas there came another snow storm, which increased the depth of the hoary covering to three feet. Another chinook succeeded, then another freeze; then came another large snow fall, another chinook and more cold weather. The result was that the succulent bunch grass was placed beyond reach of cattle by three hard crusts, the top one being in many places strong enough to bear up the weight of a horse.

"By pawing through the successive crusts wherever they were soft enough, many horses succeeded in getting sufficient grass to preserve their lives, but the cattle, not being gifted with as much intelligence and energy, lay down on the frozen snow and perished in large numbers. The cold was intense at times, the mercury falling to thirty-two degrees below zero."

On the Cowiche, the severe winter caused the loss of one human life. The snow on the north and south fork bottom lands lay four feet deep and was crusted from the six-inch level upward, the top crust being more like ice than snow. The result was that even the horses perished in large numbers. John Polly had about two hundred head on the north and south forks of the Cowiche, half of which were imprisoned among the hills of the north fork and could not get to the camp. In February, Mr. Polly offered to Philander Kelly, a bachelor about thirty-five years old, a reward of five dollars for each animal he would bring in in safety. After a short search Kelly found a band of forty confined to a small sheltered spot by the deep snow of the surrounding hills. As appeared from subsequent observation, he tried many times to drive them out, but was unable to overcome the obstacles to their escape or force the horses to do so.

Perceiving at length that he could accomplish nothing, he started back to the settlements, presumably for assistance. At a point four miles above Mr. Polly's horse camp he abandoned his snow shoes, no one can guess why, and started on. Days and weeks passed and no word of Kelly reached the settlements. At last a search party was organized consisting of William Oneal and three or four others. These set out about the last of February. They patiently trailed Kelly by his camping places to the place on the divide between the north and south forks where the horses were; then back to the abandoned snow shoes and beyond until eventually they discovered his frozen body half buried in the snow. They interred him near the scene of his unhappy fate.

The horses were found in an exceedingly pitiable condition. They had eaten off each others' tails and manes and were in the last extremities of starvation when help reached them, but strange to say, were all alive. They were driven to the camp, where food and shelter could be provided for them.

John Oneal, who is our informant regarding the melancholy fate of the unfortunate Philander Kelly, tells also of a sorrowful sight witnessed in the spring of 1881 by some stockmen who were riding over the range. They found five dead horses near a small stand of scrub brush on the opposite side of the creek from the place where the ill-starred Kelly had discovered the forty. The tails and manes were all eaten off; the bark was gnawed from the rank sage brush and all the surroundings told a plain story of how the animals had suffered from the pangs of hunger and how they had succumbed one by one until the last of the little band had fallen a victim to starvation.

It has been estimated that the loss in cattle and horses in this dread winter aggregated one million five hundred thousand dollars. Snipes & Allen are said to have owned between twenty thousand and thirty thousand head and G. B. Huntington ten thousand, a very large per cent. of which perished. It is interesting to note how the genius of Ben Snipes enabled him to rise superior to misfortune and by taking advantage of the conditions resulting from the general collapse of the cattle business to lay the foundation for a speedy recovery. When spring at last came, the cattlemen were all depressed and anxious to dispose of their herds. There were many venders and few purchasers, so the price dropped until a steer of large size could be bought for sixteen dollars and a cow and calf for six. Realizing the opportunity, Mr. Snipes hurried to Portland, laid the situation before W. S. Ladd and negotiated with him for an ample credit. He then returned and bought up all the stock on the market. Now, a hard winter with plenty of snow is sure to be followed by an abundant growth of nutritious grass, so Snipes soon had large herds of fat and thrifty cattle and in a comparatively short time he was again the richest man in central Washington.

At about this period in Yakima county's history an agitation arose for the relief of persons resident in the Kittitas valley. The settlement and development of this region have been reserved for treatment in later chapters. It is sufficient for our present purpose that the country had been settled and its resources pre-empted by a progressive population and that these, in the year 1883, succeeded in getting their territory segregated from the mother county and formed into a new political organization.

March 31, 1882, while the agitation was still in progress, fire destroyed the county buildings and records at Yakima City. Friends of the new county movement charged that the county commissioners acted with undue haste in the matter of erecting a new courthouse and jail and that they did so for the direct purpose of defeating any attempt to move the county seat to Ellensburg, as some advocated, or to delay the erection of the new county. At any rate, the board consisting of David Longmire, J. P. Sharp and A. McDaniel, in special session assembled, passed on the 4th day of April following the fire, the ensuing order:

"In the matter of building a court house for Yakima county.

"Whereas, by reason of the fire of the 31st of March, 1882, the auditor's office of Yakima county and the county records were destroyed; and whereas, the best interests of the county require a safe and commodious place for the safe keeping of all records and for court and other purposes:

"It is therefore ordered by the board that the county auditor advertise in the Yakima Record, a weekly newspaper published in Yakima City, for sealed proposals to furnish the lumber and material necessary to construct a building suitable for a courthouse, the plans and specifications of which may be seen at the auditor's office on application. Also for proposals to erect the said building, all bids to be presented and filed with the auditor on or before the first Monday in May, the board reserving the right to reject any and all bids."

The erection of the courthouse was delayed somewhat by hostile litigation, but after the creation of Kittitas county there was no further reason for opposition, and by consent of the parties this litigation was dropped.

One of the first acts of the board of county commissioners at its regular session for the year 1882 was to establish toll rates as follows: For crossing the Yakima river, wagon and six-horse team, $1.25; wagon and four-horse team, $1.00; wagon and two-horse team, 75 cents; man and horse, 37½ cents; pack and horse, 12½ cents; loose cattle and horses, 12½ cents each; footman, 25 cents; sheep and hogs, 5 cents each; for crossing toll bridges, wagon and six-horse team, $1.25; wagon and four-horse team, $1.00; wagon and two-horse team, 75 cents; man and horse, 25 cents; footman, 12½ cents; packhorse, 12½ cents; loose horses and cattle, 10 cents; swine and sheep, 3 cents. At the same session the county was divided into twenty-two road districts; also into the following election precincts: Horn, Parker, Yakima City, Antanum, Cowiche, Wenas, West Kittitas, East Kittitas, Alder and Simcoe.

The early eighties were very important years for Yakima and Kittitas counties, as for all other parts of Washington territory. It was then that the light of another day began to illuminate the horizon, the day of the railway, the telegraph, rapid transportation, rapid communication and modern civilization. The wealth of pasturage of the broad valleys and wide expanse of undulating uplands had drawn the first scattering population to central Washington; experimentation had proved its agricultural possibilities when artificially supplied with water, and it needed now naught but the stimulus which could come only with the railway and its concomitants to inaugurate a period of intensive development; a period in which large things should be attempted and accomplished; a period when, by the magic of well directed industry, the dry ground should be made to blossom as the rose.

The history of the Northern Pacific Railway Company, its inception, organization, its struggles before congress, its financial embarrassments and its operations in the mammoth undertaking of spanning a continent, developing a vast wilderness and securing to itself a mammoth grant of public land—would form the theme for a work of more than one ponderous volume. For more than a quarter of a century this company was conspicuous in the public eye. Though it began its efforts before the close of the Civil war, and though its survivors were making reconnoissances of the Yakima country as early as 1867, not until 1883 was any construction work done within the limits of the territory constituting Yakima county. In the fall of that year, however, the first twenty-five miles of the Cascade division were built, extending from the banks of the Columbia to a point about three miles to the westward of Kiona. Late in the year 1884, it had been extended to Yakima City and shortly afterward the steel rails were laid into North Yakima. Here the march of the giant was stayed for nearly two years, owing to difficulties presented by the canyon of the Yakima river and to the still greater difficulties arising out of the Villard crash and the subsequent financial stringency.

The period of railroad building was one of great intellectual as well as industrial activity for the people of the Yakima and Kittitas valleys, in common with other residents of the territory of Washington. Many problems of great moment were engaging the attention of the general public, and certain questions arising out of the land grant had a personal interest for not a few, in addition to the interests which such persons felt as citizens. It is hard to realize at this time the anxiety of men who had settled in good faith upon land which was afterward claimed by the Northern Pacific Company, they of course, being in doubt as to how the company would deal with them in the adjustment of conflicting claims. The members of the United States congress were also perplexed, and on the whole the period was one of uncertainty, political discussion, bitter denunciations and general excitement and unrest. The railroad company was persistent in its protestations of an intention to deal fairly by all bona fide settlers, and it may be asserted with assurance that it was as liberal and just as a corporation could be reasonably expected to be under the circumstances. Early in 1883, President Villard made the following statement regarding the purposes and intentions of his company:

"In cases where in past years a settler has gone on railroad land and in good faith resided on and improved it for a home, the company proposes to allow such actual settler the privilege of purchasing the quarter section of land on which his buildings and improvements have been made at the minimum price of two dollars and sixty cents per acre cash, or four dollars per acre on time. It is intended that the privilege to make purchase at these minimum prices shall so far as practicable be confirmed by the company to the actual settler whether any application for the purchase of the land may have been made by him or not."

It is hardly possible in a reasonable space to adequately represent the spirit of this interesting epoch in local and territorial history. The company was busy not alone in a tremendous effort to conserve its interests in congress and to keep public opinion as favorable toward it as possible, but to overcome its financial difficulties and to solve perplexing problems about the best routes, the means of surmounting natural obstacles and the like. One of the questions at issue was how to get over the Cascade range of mountains. Concerning this problem President Harris, in October, 1884, said:

Until the most careful examination of the several passes through the Cascade range has been made, it was thought not desirable to file in the Interior Department the map of definite location of that part of the Cascade division from Tacoma eastward, although the road was completed to Wilkeson in November, 1877, because the precise point at which the second section would commence could not be determined until the best mountain pass had been found.

The search for this pass has been one of great difficulty, requiring the highest skill and perseverance. That known as the "Stampede," about midway between Natcheez and Snoqualmie passes, has been adopted by the company as the place for crossing the range.

This selection determined the point of connection with the first section east from Tacoma and the map of definite line of location from Tacoma to South Prairie was filed in the Interior Department and the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to examine this section have recommended its acceptance.

The line of definite location from South Prairie twenty-five miles to a point in the canyon of the Green river has been determined, and the grading has been let; and on the east side of the Cascade range, from Yakima City to a point twenty-five miles west of the Columbia river has been adopted and maps of the same have been filed in the Interior Department.

Surveys are in progress for the definite location of the rest of the line across the summit of the Cascade mountains, a distance of about seventy-four and one-half miles. A tunnel two miles long will be required. The highest elevation of the tunnel above sea level will be two thousand eight hundred and eighty-five feet. The summit of the pass is three thousand six hundred and ninety-three feet above the sea. The mountain is supposed to be hard basaltic rock, and the construction of the tunnel may require from two to three years.

It was the necessity for this tunnel, the difficulties of the Yakima canyon and the financial stringency which caused the long delay in building westward from Yakima. The company had already exceeded the time in which the road should have been completed in order to secure the benefit of the land grant, and in all parts a considerable proportion of the people were demanding that congress should declare the grant forfeited. There was, however, a large class of people who, while recognizing the fact that the company had failed to comply with the terms of the grant and had no legal rights in the premises, argued that the best interests of the country required that the government should be lenient with the railway company and should allow a reasonable extension of the time limit. In Yakima and Kittitas counties the discussion waxed warm, and bitter personalities were at times made use of. In no way can an idea of the opinions and reasoning of the two parties be better conveyed than by quoting in extenso resolutions passed by two different popular assemblies within the territory of the counties named.

On March 22, 1884, at Elliott's hall in Ellensburg, a mass meeting of citizens adopted the following as the sentiments of the majority:

Whereas, By an act of congress in 1864 half of a strip of land eighty miles in width was granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound; and

Whereas, The original grant was large and valuable enough in itself to build the road within the time specified in the granting act without further aid, and now that eight years have elapsed since the grant has expired; and

Whereas, The original intent of the granting act was to open up what was then a wild and uninhabited region of our country—to act as the forerunner of civilization—whilst now thrifty and intelligent communities have sprung up in advance of construction, making the traffic alone highly remunerative for a railroad, consequently the original intent has ceased and become null and void; and

Whereas, By subsidizing newspapers, sending agents out to misrepresent the true sentiments of the people by making a show of work before the assembling of each session of congress; and

Whereas, By forming the blind pool and buying the Seattle & Walla Walla railroad, with their grant in the way, they have forestalled action on the part of other companies; and

Whereas, By one-half of the land being withdrawn from settlement, the growth of the country has been retarded, immigration checked, business stagnated, lands from which no revenue could be collected and settlers on such lands handicapped; therefore

Resolved, That the lands lying along the Cascade division of the Northern Pacific Railroad have unjustly been withheld from settlement for a period of twenty years, thereby filling the coffers of a predeceous monopoly at the expense of the poor frontiersman.

Resolved, That these lands belong, and of right ought to belong, to the people, and that we most emphatically condemn the policy of congress in taking away the poor man's heritage and giving it to stock gamblers and railroad sharks.

Resolved, That the actions of the several boards of trade of Seattle, Walla Walla and Tacoma, praying for congress to extend the grant, would shine out far more brilliantly had they shown their zeal for their masters in giving something they had a shadow of right to give. These boards of trade have already a railroad and they can well be magnanimous in giving away other people's property.

Resolved, That we are opposed to any further time being extended to the Northern Pacific Railroad or to congress' fixing any price per acre on railroad lands.

Resolved, That we, the settlers of Kittitas county, in mass meeting assembled, are in favor of an unconditional and absolute forfeiture of all the lands along the Cascade division of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Resolved, That we learn from our present delegate in congress that the only knowledge he has of our present situation is through the action of our late legislative assembly. Therefore, we view with surprise and indignation the action of our late representative, John A. Shoudy, in refusing to memorialize congress to forfeit the land grant of the Cascade division of the Northern Pacific Railroad and in exempting their property from taxation.

Resolved, That we heartily and unequivocally endorse the course of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Adams, of the Yakima Signal, in advocating and championing the cause of the poor man and in standing by the rights of the people in their fight with a vast corporate power, in refusing all their overtures of place and preferment, and that we recommend the Signal as the best family paper in our midst and that we will do all in our power to sustain the Signal in its efforts for right.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the chairman of each committee on public lands of both houses of congress; also Judge Payson, Hons. William S. Holman, Cobb, Slater, Scales and Henley, and be published in both county newspapers, the Yakima Signal and Klickitat Sentinel, the Dallas Mountaineer and the Post Intelligencer.

held at Yakima City, called on account of the fact that certain persons, under the influence of powerful excitement and bitter prejudice, had expressed indignation against their opponents in a too forceful manner. This assemblage adopted (it is claimed with few dissenting votes) resolutions very different from those adopted by the Ellensburg meeting. As reported to the Kittitas Standard by one of its correspondents, they were:

We, the citizens of Yakima county, would most respectfully represent that:

Whereas, congress did grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company a certain piece of land along either side of said proposed railway from Duluth to Puget Sound, in aid of the construction of said road, and

Whereas, Said railway company was organized upon the basis of said grant, and

Whereas, Said company did in 1869 in good faith commence and prosecute the survey of said road and commence construction thereof in good faith, and with the intent of completing the same at the earliest practicable time, as their work will show as follows: From the year 1869 to 1873 they made continued surveys from the eastern end to the point designated by congress as the western end, through a wilderness and desert entirely unknown to either railway engineers or other intelligent people, but a country given up to savages from whom it was impossible to procure information of a valuable nature. The results of said surveys were compiled at great expense and time, and the maps and profiles filed and the withdrawals made. The company also prior to 1873 constructed what is known as the Pacific division from Kalama to Tacoma, also about five hundred miles of the eastern end of said road, and were at the time of the great panic of 1873 pushing their work to the utmost, and

Whereas, At or about this time our government did resolve to or agitate the question of a return to specie payment, and by its action threw the country into a financial panic which extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast and from Maine to the gulf of Mexico, thereby at once putting an end to the prosecution of all public works, and more particularly the Northern Pacific Railroad, then in its infancy, and

Whereas, By said action they forced said company to suspend work and into insolvency, and

Whereas, It was not until the year 1879 that confidence was so restored in the finances of the country that the railway construction of the country could be resumed, and

Whereas, The said Northern Pacific Railroad did in that year reorganize and get into working condition and did immediately commence work and have prosecuted the same from that time to the present with the greatest energy, at an enormous expense and under the greatest difficulties, working through snow and ice, heat and cold, and have succeeded in giving us a continental line of railroad from a point on the Columbia river to the Atlantic coast, and

Whereas, There remains an uncompleted portion of said road from the Columbia river to Puget sound, the western terminus, which was contemplated by the grant and which is of the greatest importance to Washington territory, and more particularly to the citizens of Yakima county and others settled along the line, as well as to said company, who cannot have a continuous line as intended by the grant unless said line is constructed, and

Whereas, There seem to be rival interests which are favoring the forfeiture of said land grant, to the great detriment of the whole of Washington territory, and more particularly to Yakima county and the sections of country said Cascade division of the Northern Pacific Railroad traverses, be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Yakima and vicinity, assembled, do most respectfully petition congress to take such action as will insure to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company their land grant and to the people the speedy completion of said road; and be it further

Resolved, That we cordially endorse the bill introduced by our delegate in congress, the Hon. Thomas H. Brents, in reference to the Cascade division, to-wit: That the time for construction be extended two years from January 1, 1884; that the odd sections granted them be sold at the rate of $2.60 per acre ($4 on time), and we earnestly request our delegate to use all means in his power to have said bill passed by congress.

Congress, it appears, was disposed to shape its course in accord with the latter set of resolutions. It bore with the Northern Pacific very patiently in all its delays and failures, showing no disposition to forfeit the grant on technical grounds, and the result was that in the course of a long time, after many tedious and vexatious lapses into comparative inactivity, the company was enabled to complete the Cascade division, tunnel and all. Whether the advantages accruing from the road are or are not sufficient to justify the enormous subsidy which the government bestowed upon the company is a matter of opinion, but certain it is that the Northern Pacific Railroad has been a most potent factor in the development of Washington, and that to its construction so early in the history of the territory must be largely attributed the phenomenal progress of this now prosperous state.

The tariffs exacted on the uncompleted Cascade division were very high compared with what they are over the same road to-day. From a schedule issued in February, 1885, we learn that the fares then exacted were as follows: Pasco to Melton, 1½ miles, 10 cents; Pasco to Kennewick, 2.3 miles, 55 cents; Paso to Badger, 17½ miles, $1.65; Pasco to Kiona, 27 miles, $2.30; Pasco to Prosser, 41 miles, $3.15; Pasco to North Yakima, 86½ miles, $6.10.

An incident of the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad through Yakima county was the inception of the important town of North Yakima. Prior to the advent of the steel rails, Yakima City was the metropolis of the valley, but its youthful rival, under the patronage of the railway company, gained prestige very rapidly. Many of the old town residents and business men, realizing the hopelessness of maintaining two prosperous and thrifty towns so close together, and believing it good policy to accept the liberal offers of the new town's promoters, moved their establishments over. In a very short time North Yakima had a thousand inhabitants. It was laid out on a plan similar to that of Salt Lake City, with wide streets and alleys, artificial streams of water, rows of shade trees, and abundant provision for parks and public buildings. Its promoters were evidently persuaded that it would one day be the capital of the commonwealth and kept the possibility of its securing this honor in mind while making the original plans. By an act approved by Governor Squire January 9, 1886, it was provided that North Yakima should thenceforth be the county seat instead of Yakima City, and ordered that the county commissioners should remove the courthouse and all other county buildings or property by them considered of sufficient value to justify the expense. The courthouse was moved in due time; a jail was built under it, and all the machinery of local government properly installed in fitting quarters at North Yakima, where it has ever since remained.

During the period that the western terminus of the railway remained at North Yakima, important developments took place in the surrounding country. Naturally, the products of the region found a market to the eastward, that being at the time the path of least resistance. It is stated that during the season of 1885, "from April to October 31st, there were shipped by rail out of the Yakima valley to Montana and Chicago 37,477 head of cattle. There were also in the same period shipped out of the Yakima valley 4,228 head of horses and 29,823 sheep. This necessitated the use for cattle of 1,647 cars; for horses, of 235 cars, and for sheep, of 397 cars. This was bone, muscle, fat, wool and hide of bunch-grass."

But the completion of the Cascade division through to the coast was destined to exert a much more powerful influence upon the course and momentum of development in central Washington. It rendered easily accessible the markets of the sound country and the ocean, and even before the Cascade tunnel was in use there had begun the decline of the cattle industry, which must needs give way before the advance of an army of settlement. A. J. Splawn fixes the date at which the business of stockraising commenced to contract rapidly as the year 1887. It had long been apparent that the higher development for Yakima county must take the direction of canal construction and the irrigation of arid lands. Experiment had proven the practicability of making the desert to bloom and bring forth; the railway furnished the incentive, and very soon a progressive people was actively engaged in multiplying by this means the productive capability of the central Washington valleys.

Some of the earlier irrigation enterprises have already been mentioned in these chapters. A summary of the later ones undertaken prior to or during 1888 was furnished by the Seattle Post Intelligencer early in 1889 in the following language:

A short account of some of the principal irrigation schemes in Yakima may be of interest, which we attempt, giving them not chronologically, but topographically.

The city of North Yakima is situated at the confluence of the Naches and Yakima rivers. There are several minor irrigation ditches taken out of the Naches. The only extensive one is the canal of the Selah Valley Ditch Company, of which B. F. Young, of Pierce county, is the able superintendent. This company, going up the Naches river some thirty miles, posted their notices of appropriation and took out a canal twenty-four feet on the bottom, carrying three feet and a half of water in depth. Excavating around the foothills on the north of the Naches valley, they have conducted their canal over into the Selah valley just north of the city of North Yakima. This valley contains about twenty thousand acres of beautiful land, which, now under the impetus given by the Selah company, is being rapidly settled and brought under the dominion of the plow and harrow. This same company, branching off with a side cut, where their main line crosses the divide between the Naches and the Selah by means of flumes and conduits, are conveying a portion of this pure, fresh, ice-cold water to the top of the high bluff just north of the city of North Yakima, and here is being constructed a reservoir forty feet in depth and with a surface of five acres, in the head of a ravine. From this point the company purposes conducting the water down the bluff, across the Naches in iron pipes, to supply their mains in the city, thus affording the inhabitants of that favored place a sufficiency of pure, fresh water under a four-hundred-and-twenty-foot pressure.

Just across the Yakima river from the city are the head-gates of the Moxee Company's ditch. This company, of which Gardiner G. Hubbard, of Washington, D. C., and William Ker, Esq., of Moxee, are the principal owners, under the intelligent supervision of President Ker, has carried the science of irrigation to a higher degree of perfection than any other canal company in the country. This company's main ditch is eighteen feet on the bottom and calculated to carry a depth of three feet of water, winds around the foothills of the beautiful Moxee valley, and supplies all of those thousands of broad acres with a sufficiency of water for irrigation, domestic and stock purposes. The Moxee Company uses a portion of this supply on two thousand acres of its own land. * * *

On the west and around North Yakima, the Union, Hubbard, Schanno, City and different Athanum ditches, all small, supply the farmers and city with an abundance of water. Just opposite the site of old Yakima is the initial point of the proposed canal of the Sunnyside Ditch Company which will be constructed next spring. The waters will be conducted on to the rich plains back of Prosser. If done, eighty thousand acres of good farming land will thus be thrown open. The Sears Brothers, of Tacoma, and St. Paul capitalists are backing the scheme. Thus far nothing has been done other than the preliminary surveys, which have demonstrated the feasibility of the scheme.

Just above Kiona, still lower down the Yakima, the Yakima Improvement and Irrigation Company are going right ahead constructing a canal for irrigation and commercial purposes. This canal is intended to cover some nineteen thousand acres of the company's own lands and twice as much more open to the pre-emptor and homesteader. The location surveys have been made and the company is going ahead with the construction work. This canal is to be built of sufficient size and depth for canal boats to transfer freight to and from the shipping point at Kiona on the Northern Pacific Railroad, and when completed will be a large addition to the constantly increasing resources of Yakima county.

An idea of the rapidity with which the central Washington country was being appropriated by the settler at this period may be gained from the following from the pen of Luther S. Howlett, receiver of the United States land office:

"During the year 1888, 207,360 acres of land have been filed upon at the United States land office in North Yakima (including Yakima, Kittitas, Douglas and Okanogan counties). This has been taken under the various acts of congress giving away lands, as follows: Pre-emption, 644 entries; homesteads, 305; timber cultures, 290; desert land, 19; coal pre-emptions, 5; coal land purchases, 3; mineral land, 2.

"Besides this showing there have been applications to enter under the desert land act, which are now before the secretary of the interior on the question of price per acre—whether it shall be $1.25, as formerly held, or $2.50, as required under the Sparks ruling. These applications cover some 50,000 acres along the left bank of the Yakima river. One hundred pre-emptors have proven up, fifty-one homesteaders and eleven desert land claimants.

"The best and most extensive agricultural region in the district (and in the territory) lies around the city of North Yakima and is known as the Yakima valley, though it really includes several valleys. Here you will find fruits and vegetables in abundance. The land is too valuable to be given up to grain, which should be left to the Big Bend, Walla Walla and Klickittat regions. The railroads take the garden stuff raised in the Yakima valley to the coast cities in a day, and there is never a time from the middle of June to the end of October when the market is slow. In fact, the sound cities are coming to rely more and more upon the Yakima valley for those fruits and vegetables which formerly came from California. Many of the new-comers prefer to stop in this valley and take land rather than go farther away from the railroads and city schools. Here ten acres will give a family as good support as a market garden near an eastern city, with a surer thing of it year in and year out on account of the irrigation. While all this is true, it is also true that the resources of the valley are not yet one-twentieth part developed. The 160-acre ranches are gradually subsiding into small farms as the original owners prove up."

The general condition of Yakima county at the close of 1888 was excellent. Its total indebtedness was only one hundred thousand dollars, contracted, it is said, chiefly for the construction of bridges to replace those carried away by the oft-recurring freshets. The total taxation was thirteen and three-fifths mills, claimed to be the lowest from Minnesota to California, both inclusive; not over half the average taxation of Dakota; five mills less than the average of Washington territory, and seven less than that of Montana. The total assessed valuation of the property was two millions, very much less than the real value, and the population was estimated all the way from four thousand eight hundred and fifty to six thousand.

One of the most important movements before the people of Washington territory at this period was that for admission to the Federal Union. It was not a new movement. A Walla Walla student of local history is quoted as stating that "the proposition for calling a convention to frame a state constitution, preliminary to asking for the admission of Washington territory to the Union, was first submitted to the voters by an act of the legislature, session of 1868-9, providing for a ballot upon the question at the June election of 1869. Failing to meet the favorable consideration of the people at that time, it was again submitted at the general elections of 1872 and 1874 and each time defeated. In 1876 the question was again submitted, and, the people declaring in favor of such action, delegates were chosen and the convention met at Walla Walla the second Tuesday of June, 1878. After a session of forty days, a constitution was framed, which received the indorsement of the people at the general election of that year, the vote being 6,462 for and 3,231 against—a total of nearly 3,000 less than the vote cast for delegate."

From the year 1878 until the year 1889 the admission of Washington to the Union never wholly ceased to be a living issue. At one time a bill passed both houses of congress admitting the territory with the northern counties of Idaho added to the federal sisterhood, but it was pocket-vetted by President Cleveland. The measure was insisted upon, however, and on February 22, 1889, the celebrated omnibus bill, enabling North and South Dakota, Montana and Washington without the North Idaho counties to become states, was signed by the president of the United States.

Among the most important provisions of the enabling act relating to this territory were the following: That the election for the purpose of choosing delegates to a constitutional convention to be held at Olympia should be held on the Tuesday after the second Monday in May, 1889; that seventy-five delegates should be chosen, should meet on the Fourth of July, and having organized and adopted the constitution of the United States, should proceed to form a state government republican in form and to frame a constitution which should make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and should be in consonance with the constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. The constitution must also provide for perfect toleration of religious sentiment, disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries of the state and to all Indian tribal lands; provide for the assumption and payment of the debts and liabilities of the territory, also for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools open to all children of the state and free from sectarian control. The act also provided that the constitution should be submitted to the qualified electors of said state for their approval or rejection at an election to be held on the first Tuesday in October; that if said constitution should be in compliance with the form provided and be adopted, the same, together with the vote thereon, should be forwarded to the president of the United States, who should issue a proclamation announcing the result of the election and thereupon the said state should be deemed admitted into the Union; that until the next general election, or until otherwise provided by law, the state should be entitled to one representative in the national house of representatives; that the representatives to the fifty-first congress, together with the governor and other officers provided for in the constitution, might be elected on the day of the election for the ratification or rejection of the constitution, and until the said state officers were elected and qualified and the state admitted into the Union the territorial officers should continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices in the said territory; it provided for the customary gift of sections sixteen and thirty-six in each township of all unappropriated public lands to the state for common-school purposes; gave fifty sections of unappropriated lands for erecting public buildings at the capital for legislative, executive and judicial purposes; provided that five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the state, which should be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of the state into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, should be paid to the state for use as a permanent fund, the interest of which only should be expended for the support of the common schools within the state; reserved such quantity of lands authorized by the fourth section of the act of July 17, 1854, for university purposes, as, together with the lands confirmed to the vendees of the territory by the act of March 14, 1864, should make the full quantity seventy-two entire sections; provided that all lands granted the state for educational purposes should be disposed of only at public sale at a price of not less than ten dollars per acre, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest on which only should be expended in the support of said schools; that said school lands might, however, under such regulations as the legislature might prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than five years in quantities not exceeding one section to any one person or company; granted Washington lands equal in quantity to those granted Dakota, March 2, 1881, for penitentiary purposes; gave the state ninety thousand acres for the use and support of agricultural colleges in said state, and in lieu of land grants for internal improvements made to new states by an act passed September 4, 1841, and of swamp and overflowed lands under the act of September 28, 1850, the following grants: for the establishment and maintenance of a scientific school, one hundred thousand acres; state normal school, one hundred thousand acres; for public buildings at the state capital, in addition to the grant hereinbefore made for that purpose, one hundred thousand acres; state charitable, educational, penal and reformatory institutions, two hundred thousand acres; it also provided that all mineral lands should be exempted from grants made by the admission act, mineral school lands to be exchanged for lieu land; allowed the state an appropriation from the national treasury of twenty thousand dollars for defraying the expenses of the constitutional convention; made the state a separate judicial district; arranged for the regular and easy transfer of all territorial judicial matters from the territorial courts into the state courts, etc.

The constitutional convention met as provided by the enabling act. Those chosen to represent Yakima and Klickitat counties were Colonel William F. Prosser, of North Yakima, and R. O. Dunbar, of Goldendale, republicans, and J. T. Eshelman, of North Yakima, democrat; while the fifth district, consisting of Kittitas and a part of Douglas counties, was represented in the convention by J. A. Shoudy and A. Mires, of Ellensburg, republicans, and J. T. McDonald, of Ellensburg, democrat. These gentlemen and sixty-nine others continued their labors until the 22d of August, by which time they had completed a document of not a little merit and containing a considerable number of progressive features. Two separate articles, one providing for female suffrage and one prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental or scientific uses, were submitted to the people to become a part of the state constitution, provided a majority of the male voters should favor them. The election for the adoption or rejection of the constitution was held on the first Tuesday in October, as provided by the enabling act. It resulted in the adoption of the constitution as prepared by the convention, the vote being 38,394 for and 11,895 against. The vote in Yakima county was 845 for and 115 against. Both the separate articles were defeated.

At 5:27 o'clock p. m., on the 11th day of November, 1889, President Harrison signed and issued his proclamation declaring the territory of Washington a state of the Federal Union. His name and that of Secretary James G. Blaine were affixed with a pen of gold from Washington mines in a holder of ebony laurel, from the same section, both made specially within the limits of Washington, for this purpose. Thus the new ship of state was fairly launched for what we may hope will prove a long and prosperous voyage in the peerless federal fleet.

CHAPTER IV.

CURRENT HISTORY.—1889-1904.

Unfortunately, the first months of Yakima county's history as a political division of the state were not entirely free from disaster. The opening of the winter was somewhat unpropitious, the cattle being poor and ill prepared to withstand the rigors of a possible cold season. This was owing to the fact that the previous winter had brought but little snow, causing the grass of the ensuing summer and fall to be short and lacking in succulence. So it happened that when the weather became severe, as it did January 2d, the death rate among range stock ran up to an unusual height. In its issue of January 30th, the Yakima Herald said:

"There is no question but that the cattle have suffered greatly this winter and that the loss is heavy. It was not the cold nor the snow but the poor condition in which they had entered upon the winter. Had the grass been good during the summer the loss would have been light, but with no snow during the winter of 1888-9, the range has never been known to be so poor before. The chinook which has been blowing most of the week cleared away much of the snow but still left a coating sufficient to make feeding necessary. Joseph Baxter believes that ten per cent. have thus far been lost."

In its issue of February 27th, the same paper tells us that not only had the loss among cattle been great, but that of horses was depressingly heavy; that the range riders were still bringing in gloomy reports and that Joseph Baxter then estimated the loss of cattle in the county at fifty per cent. and of horses twenty-five per cent.

A single additional quotation from the Herald will give the reader a sufficiently clear idea of the cattle losses of the winter of 1889-90. In its issue of March 6th, it said:

"The backbone of the winter has at last been broken. The winter has been a hard one on stock, and many of the largest cattlemen have received a blow from which it will take a number of seasons to recover. To estimate the percentage of loss is difficult. Snipes & Allen, P. J. Flint, Baxter & Sharkey and other large cattle raisers will lose more than fifty per cent. of their bands, while the loss of the Moxee Company and many of those with a few hundred head, who had plenty of feed, will be comparatively light. The loss on different ranges varied. The cattle on the Moxee range doubtless suffered the least, while the mortality on the Cowiche, Lower Yakima and Horse Heaven ranges was the greatest. In the Naches, Wenas and Ahtanum valleys the cattlemen generally had sufficient feed, but had the severe weather lasted a week or ten days longer, all the hay in the country would have been exhausted. The loss falls principally on a few, as the farmers with barnyard stock or small herds of range cattle had, for the most part, ample provision for caring for the stock, and their losses are slight. At the commencement of winter the estimate of range cattle in the county was twenty thousand. Roughly stated, half of these are now dead, and two-thirds of this loss will fall on less than a dozen men. It was the longest and most trying winter since the memorable one of 1880-81."

But the time had gone by when a blow to the cattle industry was sufficient to paralyze even temporarily the entire progressiveness of the county, and the loss of the winter of 1889-90, though severe on those whom it directly affected, caused no halt in the march of the county's industrial development. Besides the stimulus which its admission to the Union had given to the state at large, a stimulus which could not fail to make itself felt in every part of the commonwealth, there were progressive forces specially affecting central Washington at this time. The reasonable contention of both Ellensburg and North Yakima for the honors and benefits of becoming the state capital was advertising the resources of the county contiguous to each and directing public attention thither. The attention of capital had been at length attracted by the splendid opportunities for profitable investment the Yakima and Kittitas valleys offered, and large irrigation enterprises were being inaugurated. Furthermore, there was much activity among railway companies and many reasons were given the people to hope that their section would soon be traversed by more than one iron pathway of commerce. Were it not for the panic of 1893, which prevented the consummation of some of these schemes, the development of Yakima and Kittitas counties would have been marvelously rapid. As it was, the railways failed to materialize, though the oldest irrigation scheme has since eventuated in the mammoth Sunnyside canal, and some of the less pretentious projects have been carried to a successful consummation.

Notwithstanding their failure, a short discussion of the railway projects of the time may throw an important side-light upon this period of the country's history. One of these was a road from Portland, Oregon, across the Cascades to tap the wheat fields, mining districts and gardens of central and eastern Washington. The aggregation of New York and English capitalists which projected the road styled themselves the Portland, Lower Columbia and Eastern Washington Railroad Company. A committee of this corporation was met at Portland in December, 1880, by Hon. J. B. Reavis, George W. Jones and Edward Whitson, from North Yakima, to whom through its committee, the company stated in writing the following proposals: In consideration of Yakima's subscribing a bonus of one hundred thousand dollars, the company agreed to build a road from some point on the Columbia river in Clarke county to North Yakima and have the same equipped and in operation within two years. The bonus was not to be paid until the completion of the road but was to draw interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum. North Yakima was to be given depot facilities within the corporate limits and for a time at least was to be made the terminus of the road, although the plans contemplated its extension to a connection with the Canadian Pacific, which would give North Yakima another transcontinental road.

On December 20th, an enthusiastic meeting was held at the council chambers. It resulted in the appointment of G. W. Jones, Captain J. H. Thomas, William Ker, J. C. MacCrimmon, John Bartholet, S. J. Lowe and W. A. Cox a committee to canvass the town for the purpose of receiving the subscriptions. These gentlemen began at once their herculean labors and continued them with such success that by January 16, 1890, more than the required sum was subscribed, as appears from the following peal of triumph in the Herald of that date:

"Yakima aspired to raise one hundred thousand dollars bonus. She has not only raised that amount but three thousand dollars over. She has done that which Walla Walla and Ellensburg failed in, and which has only been equaled in this great state by rich and prosperous Spokane Falls. The latter raised one hundred thousand dollars as a bonus to secure the building of the Spokane and Northern railroad, and now plucky Yakima, which claims a population only one-eighth as great as that of the Empire City, comes proudly to the front with a like amount for the Portland, Lower Columbia and Eastern Washington Railroad Company. * * * Edward Whitson heads the list with six thousand dollars; J. H. Thomas and

The central Washington country also had another railway prospect at this time. It was furnished by the Illinois Central, one of the richest railroad corporations, which sent in May, 1889, a party of engineers from Sioux Falls to seek out a feasible route to the sound. The party arrived at North Yakima September 16th ensuing. From their leader, George M. Nix, who was the general manager of the Midland Pacific Railroad Company, it was learned that the party had traveled westerly up the Lugenbee river, thence through the Big Horn and Wind River mountains; thence across the Rocky mountains and down the Salmon and Snake rivers to Lewiston; thence down the Snake, crossing the Northern Pacific at Palouse Junction, thence westerly via Crab creek coulee to Priest Rapids of the Columbia, from which point they proceeded through the Moxee coulee to North Yakima. To a press reporter Mr. Nix made the statement that the line was not only feasible but that its grades were economic, that the road would traverse a splendid country yet untapped by railroads and that fewer difficulties would be encountered in its construction than have been surmounted by the other transcontinental lines. He also claimed the route was three hundred miles shorter from Chicago to Puget Sound than that of the Northern Pacific, and advanced the opinion that if the rest of the country presented no greater obstacles than had that already traversed, engineering parties would be in the field in the early months of 1890 permanently locating the road.

All these projects naturally had the effect of encouraging home-seekers to come to the country, even though there was no assurance that they would ever materialize; but the local project, that of constructing the large irrigating ditch, was much more direct and immediate in its effects. The history of the Sunnyside canal scheme takes us back to about 1885, when the first survey was made. However, the enterprise was not taken up in good earnest until 1889, when a number of persons experienced in irrigation conceived the idea of buying up the lands of the Northern Pacific Company to the southward of North Yakima and constructing a canal to water them and alternate sections belonging to the government. With this end in view they began again the work of surveying for a practicable route. The result of the investigations of their corps of engineers is embodied in a report of Chief Engineer J. D. McIntyre, the most of which is here reproduced:

I completed the surveys of the Yakima canal November 2, 1886, after having been engaged with an assistant engineer and a force of men for about three months. Four hundred and seventy-one miles of grade line in all were run and six different routes investigated.

THE SECRET OF YAKIMA COUNTY'S COMMERCIAL GREATNESS.

The plan at first proposed was to build an irrigating canal from Union Gap onto what is known as the "Sunnyside" lands along the Yakima river in Yakima county, Washington, which lie on the easterly side of the Yakima river between Union Gap and the mouth of the Yakima river. Six other engineers had preceded me at various times during the past four years, and they had all reported that the Sunnyside line which begins at Union Gap was the only practicable route. I found this line to be a favorable one, but too low to cover more than forty-seven thousand acres of railroad land; the estimated cost for eighty miles of canal about four hundred and seventy thousand dollars, and it was decided that unless a higher line covering more land could be found it would be better to abandon the enterprise. I shall not attempt to describe in detail the various routes surveyed and abandoned, but will confine my description to the one adopted, which I call the "Natcheez line."

The Natcheez line begins at the Natcheez river, about two miles above where that stream mingles with the waters of the Yakima, and runs in a southerly direction around and to the west of the Athanum basin, crosses the Athanum creek about five miles to the west of its confluence with the Yakima river; follows along the steep hillside south of Athanum creek to Union Gap, a distance of about eighteen miles; thence across the Yakima river by a pipe line to the easterly side of the river, at which point the elevation obtained above the Yakima river and above the Sunnyside line is one hundred and ninety-nine feet; thence along the foot of the Rattlesnake range in a southeasterly direction to a point about north of the town of Prosser, a distance of about eighty miles, making in all a length of ninety-eight miles of canal. By the adoption of this route the great objection of all lines heretofore run by us or by the engineers of the Northern Pacific Land Department to cover the Sunnyside lands is fully overcome. It is one hundred and ninety-nine feet higher; its course heads many of the deep ravines encountered by the other lines and covers more than twice as much land as any of them. I estimated the water in Natcheez river in September last, at a time when great drouth was prevailing, and found twenty-nine thousand miner's inches of water in the stream. There is probably from five to ten times as much water as this in the stream during the irrigating season. It has its source in the perennial snows of the Cascade mountains, and in my opinion the water supply is abundant and permanent and the title undisputed.

I took no cross-section of slopes, and my estimate is based simply upon the grade line. The estimated cost is five hundred thousand dollars for the canal ninety-eight miles long. Storage reservoirs may be built at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars, which will double the capacity of the canal. In order to successfully irrigate the whole tract of two hundred thousand acres of land a lower line of canal should be built at some future time after the settlement will justify it, to be taken from Yakima river five miles above Union Gap and extended around Moxee valley, and thence parallel with the old Sunnyside line, a distance of about eighty miles, which, with a proper system of storage reservoirs, would cost approximately four hundred thousand dollars, making in all the total estimate of cost one million dollars. These estimates are based upon a canal twenty feet wide on the bottom, thirty feet wide on top, and capable of carrying four feet of water for one-half the length of each canal, and fourteen feet wide on the bottom and twenty-four feet wide on top, and capable of carrying three feet of water for the lower half of each canal.

By reference to the general map herewith, the locality of the lands is shown. * * * The surface or contour of the ground is rolling and broken by occasional ravines. The soil is sandy—a loam—having its origin in the sediments of a great inland lake, varying in depth from five to fifty feet and resting upon a bed of basaltic rock. No boulders or gravel channels are found in the tract. The basaltic rock comes to the surface at rare intervals, but does not reduce materially the amount of available agricultural land. The slope is generally to the south and the surface is covered with a thick growth of sage brush, varying in height from two to five feet.

The productions of the Yakima valley are very much the same as those of Fresno county, California, omitting, of course, the oranges. The cereals all do well, but the character of the products, such as fruits, hops, tobacco and alfalfa, are such as will make the lands too high-priced to be used for the production of cereals. I have made a close examination of the products of the basin with a view to finding out what kinds of fruits, vines and plants are best adapted to the soils and climate. I find that the staples are grapes, apples, pears, peaches, plums, prunes, sorghum, melons, tobacco, hops, alfalfa or lucerne, sweet potatoes, peanuts and all the small fruits. Wheat produces with irrigation about thirty-five bushels per acre, oats fifty bushels, barley forty bushels, rye thirty-five bushels. I saw eleven different kinds of shade trees growing in one yard; the butternut, walnut, maple, mountain oak, ash, weeping willow and cypress growing side by side. Those who are said to be experts in grape culture claim that the finest varieties of wine grapes are grown here. The tobacco raised from Havana seed upon the Moxee farm near North Yakima and there made into cigars is said to possess a flavor not excelled in this country. The Yakima basin must at no distant day become famous for its productions of many of the fruits, vines and plants mentioned above.

The climate may be regarded as semi-tropical about ten and half months of the year and the products are semi-tropical. Here may be found a latitude of forty-nine degrees north with a mean temperature about the same as San Francisco. This unusual feature of climate may be accounted for by the warm winds of the Japan current, which follow up the Columbia river through the rift in the Cascade mountains and deflect into the Yakima basin, so that when residents both north and south, during the months of the winter solstice, are suffering from cold, those of this region are enjoying bright suns and warm winds.

The result of this surveying was that on the 4th of December, 1889, the Yakima Canal and Land Company was organized with a capital stock of one million dollars divided into two hundred thousand shares. The officers of the company for the first three months were Walter N. Granger, of St. Paul, president; James Millisch, secretary, and Albert Kleinschmidt, of Helena, treasurer. Previous to making the surveys, this company had obtained from the Northern Pacific Company an option for the purchase of all railroad lands in the Sunnyside region. The success of McIntyre's survey and the substantial evidences presented that the enterprise was about to be consummated induced the Northern Pacific Company to make advances to the irrigation company looking toward an amalgamation of interests, with the result that the Northern Pacific took two-thirds of the stock and lent its mighty force to the undertaking. Upon the entrance of the Northern Pacific into the company, Paul Schultze, of the land department, succeeded Mr. Granger as president, the latter taking the position of vice-president and general manager, and upon his shoulders fell the greater part of the burden of making a success of this gigantic industrial scheme. The name chosen for the new corporation was the Northern Pacific, Yakima and Kittitas Irrigation Company. It purposed to construct seven reservoirs in the mountains and to build one irrigation canal in Kittitas and two in Yakima county. In order that no mistake might be made, the services of William Hamilton Hall, a famous irrigation engineer of California, were procured to verify the work of Mr. McIntyre and to make further surveys. His report on the practicability of the enterprise was favorable, and early in the year 1891 work on the great irrigation system was in progress. The company began operations on the lower of their two projected ditches in Yakima county, one which "left the Yakima river just below a gap where the river pinches itself between two high hills. Nature seemed to have designed it as a place for an intake of a great canal. At once an agreement was made with the farmers by which their ditch, known as the Konnewock, was to be owned by the company and enlarged and extended, so as to carry one thousand cubic feet of water per second of time and serve sixty-eight thousand acres of land." Work was continued in the prosecution of this design until the main canal was constructed nearly to the forty-second mile-post, and many laterals were put in and land sales made. The first water was taken by the new settlers from the main canal in April, 1892. The next year operations had to be suspended, owing to the widespread financial depression, and a period of not a little distress among the settlers followed. But "they had before them what the farmers had accomplished under the Konnewock ditch, and they did not lose faith. They cleared their land of the sage brush; they leveled it; they placed water upon it; they planted fields of alfalfa, clover, timothy, corn and potatoes; they set out orchards of peaches, prunes, pears, apricots, cherries and apples," and with the advent of prosperity came also an abundant reward for their labors.

The stockmen of the Yakima valley were in no wise dismayed by the approach of winter in the year 1890, as their cattle were in good condition and they had plenty of feed. Prices, however, were very low, owing to the fact that the hard winter of 1889-90 had discouraged many stockmen, causing them to rush to the markets with their cattle. Indeed, it seems that there was a species of reaction at this time from the great prosperity which ensued upon the building of the railroad, and a stringency of money was complained of throughout the entire Northwest. The Herald informs us that in the spring of 1890 the deposits of the First National Bank of North Yakima touched the low-water mark of about thirty thousand dollars. By May, however, they rose to an aggregate of more than eighty thousand, and it was thought that with the harvesting of bountiful crops in the fall all signs of depression would disappear. They did disappear, and there was no permanent financial stringency until the total eclipse of the sun of general prosperity in 1893.

During the fall of 1890 a very successful county fair was held at North Yakima of three days' duration. It is stated that the display of fruits and vegetables was excellent and that several hundred dollars were distributed as prizes among the exhibitors of stock, garden produce, dairy products, vegetables, fruits, cereals, poultry, mechanical devices, fine art work, fancy work, etc. The executive committee in charge of this fair was composed of Captain J. H. Thomas, Edward Whitson and Joseph M. Baxter.

An incident growing out of the inception and organization of the Washington state government was the contest among several different counties of the state over the agricultural college, each county contending for the location of the institution within its own borders. As the college had an endowment of one hundred and ninety thousand acres of land and an annual appropriation of thirty thousand dollars from the general government in addition to state aid, besides an appropriation by the preceding session of the legislature of sixty thousand dollars for building purposes, it was considered a valuable acquisition and well worth striving for. Of course, Yakima county wished it, and was ready to offer any reasonable inducements to secure it. On petition of men representing more than half the taxable property of the county, the commissioners, in special session assembled, on April 7, 1891, appropriated fifteen thousand dollars out of the general fund for the purpose of buying a site for the college should it decide to come to North Yakima.

Those appointed to decide upon the location of the coveted institution were George A. Black, S. B. Conover and Andrew H. Smith. About the last of April they rendered a decision in favor of Pullman, Conover and Black voting for that town, while Smith, of Tacoma, cast his ballot for North Yakima. It was thought that certain citizens of Pullman used improper influences to secure the college; indeed, some of them intimated as much to the writer a few years ago. The residents of North Yakima felt certain that the Palouse town had not won the prize fairly, also that there were irregularities in the appointment of the three commissioners, so they instituted a suit to test the validity of the award. Messrs. Crowley, Sullivan and Snively were retained to represent North Yakima in this litigation.

The case was tried before Hon. Fremont Campbell, judge of the superior court of Pierce county, who on May 20th granted the following temporary restraining order:

In the Superior Court of Pierce County, State of Washington.

W. L. Jones, plaintiff, versus T. M. Reed, auditor of the State of Washington; A. A. Lindsey, treasurer of the State of Washington; George A. Black, S. B. Conover and Andrew H. Smith, claiming to be commissioners, and S. B. Conover, J. H. Bellingier, Eugene Fellows, Andrew H.

Smith and George W. Hoppe, claiming to be regents of the agricultural college, school of science and experimental station of the State of Washington.

In this case a temporary restraining order is granted to restrain the defendant, T. M. Reed, auditor of the State of Washington, from issuing any order or warrant upon the treasurer of the State of Washington, for any money upon the order of George A. Black, S. B. Conover and Andrew H. Smith, claiming to be commissioners appointed to locate the agricultural college, school of science and experimental station of the State of Washington, or upon any order or request made by S. B. Conover, Eugene Fellows, Andrew H. Smith, J. H. Bellinger and George W. Hoppe, claiming to be regents of the above named institution.

And the defendant, A. A. Lindsey, treasurer of the State of Washington, is hereby restrained and inhibited from paying any money upon orders drawn by said persons claiming to be commissioners, or said persons claiming to be regents aforesaid. And the said S. B. Conover, George A. Black and Andrew H. Smith are restrained from acting in any manner or attempting to act in any manner as commissioners, claiming to be appointed to locate an agricultural college, experimental station and school of science of the State of Washington.

And the said S. B. Conover, Eugene Fellows, J. H. Bellinger, Andrew H. Smith and George W. Hoppe, claiming to be regents of the agricultural college, experimental station and school of science of the State of Washington, are restrained and inhibited from doing any act whatever of any kind or character as such regents, or relating to the establishment, organization or conducting of said institution, to be in force until this application for a temporary injunction asked for by the complainant can be heard and determined, the hearing of which is set for the 29th of May, A. D. 1891, at ten o'clock a. m., before Judge Fremont Campbell at Tacoma, Washington.

The plaintiff to give an undertaking, with sufficient surety, with approval of the clerk of this court, for the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars.

Dated this 20th day of May, A. D. 1891.

FREMONT CAMPBELL,

Judge of the Superior Court of Pierce County.

June 12th Judge Campbell granted a permanent injunction against the parties named in the foregoing order. He filed a lengthy opinion holding that the agricultural college commissioners were never legally appointed, hence their proceedings were illegal and void, and any attempt on the part of the board of regents to appropriate the money of the state for the erection of buildings at Pullman, being based on the illegal and void acts of the commission, would therefore be illegal and a court of equity would have the power to restrain them from appropriating or paying out the money of the state in the carrying out of an illegal and unlawful purpose.

The case was of course appealed to the supreme court. It came on for hearing October 23d and was argued by Attorney-General Jones and Judge Turner for appellants, and D. J. Crowley and H. J. Snively for respondents. The chief questions at issue were: (1) Was the act of the commissioners in locating the college the act of an authorized body? (2) Can a taxpayer institute a suit to restrain the illegal disbursement of public money? (3) Does the allegation of the complaint stating that Acting Governor Laughton and Commissioners Black and Conover entered into a corrupt conspiracy to fraudulently locate the college at Pullman, the fact of locating being admitted, constitute a cause for canceling the findings of the commission? In due time the supreme court handed down a decision adverse to those at whose instance the restraining order was granted, and reversing the findings of Judge Campbell. Thus, Yakima county was defeated in the contest it waged with so much vigor and the erection of college buildings at Pullman was allowed to proceed.

It would appear from the local press that the summer of 1891 was an unusually rainy season. We are informed that on May 26th there was a cloudburst on the divide between the Moxee and the Konnewock, breaking the Konnewock ditch in several places, flooding a number of fields and threatening to carry away travelers, but doing no serious damage. Nearly a month later the Herald states that the rain of June 22d "from Union Gap bridge down was the hardest of the season, and above the place of M. B. Curtis and as far as the timber land of Peter Gervais it was a genuine waterspout. The road was gullied out in places, while tons of rock were piled up in others. The Konnewock ditch was broken in several places, and great quantities of mud and rock washed into the channel. At one place the ditch was completely filled up. A severe hailstorm accompanied the rain, and at one place there must have been a wagon load of hail stones washed into a heap in a canyon. The berries have been badly injured by the continued rain, and corn is also damaged."

Yet it is safe to assert that 1891 was nevertheless a prosperous year in the county. Stockmen were jubilant over excellent range and high prices, and that other producers were reaping abundant harvests is apparent from the shipments at North Yakima, one of the nine shipping points of the county, which shipments according to the statement of Agent Humphrey were as follows: Hops, 45 cars, containing 2,746 bales; mineral water, 245 packages, weighing 39,200 pounds; hay, 155 cars, weighing 3,100 tons; sheep, 86 cars, containing 16,779 head; hogs, 4 cars, containing 191 head; cattle, 128 cars, containing 2,816 head; horses, 12 cars, containing 268 head; hides, 934 packages, weighing 52,000 pounds; eggs, 92 packages, weighing 4,000 pounds; onions, 2 cars, containing 475 sacks, weighing 42,750 pounds; vegetables, 4 cars, weighing 96,000 pounds; fruit, 6,615 packages, weighing 190,300 pounds; flour, 99 cars, weighing 1,911,850 pounds; wool, 82 packages, weighing 27,000 pounds; potatoes, 92 cars, weighing 1,822,200 pounds; melons, 59 cars, weighing 1,416,000 pounds; estimated total value, $291,500.

With the opening of the year 1892 came renewed activity in the great work of redeeming the soil by irrigation. In January, arrangements were made for the construction of a canal from Horn Rapids of the Yakima river to the Columbia. The ditch was to extend along the south side of the Yakima, but it was also proposed to redeem several thousand acres on the north side, conveying the water across the river by means of conduits. This work was undertaken by a corporation known as the Yakima Irrigation and Improvement Company. Their operations made things lively in the vicinity of Kennewick throughout the whole of 1892 and a portion of the succeeding year. The ditch they constructed was, however, inadequate, but it has been recently enlarged and improved until it is now claimed to be the finest canal of its kind in the state.

The Cowiche and Wide Hollow irrigation district, on January 9, 1892, held an election at which was carried by a vote of fifty-two to fifteen the proposition to bond the district for a half million dollars for the construction of an irrigating canal. The plan was to take water out of the Tietan river by a canal ten and a half miles long and to distribute the same by three laterals, one to cover the Naches and Cowiche ridge, one the Cowiche valley and one to skirt the foothills. It was proposed to irrigate in all about forty-six thousand acres.

The interest of the people in irrigation was manifested March 26th on the occasion of the completion of the first twenty-five-mile section of the Northern Pacific, Yakima and Kittitas Irrigation Company's canal. "The announcement of the date of the ceremonies," says the Herald, "was very brief, but sufficient to attract a large throng of people, who, early in the morning, could be seen wending their way down the river road by every means of conveyance that could possibly be secured. Paul Schultze, president of the company, arrived in his special car on the eight o'clock train from Tacoma, accompanied by a number of distinguished guests, including T. B. Wallace, president of the Fidelity bank; Theodore Hosmer, president of the Tacoma Light and Water Company; George Brown, of the Tacoma Lumber Company; I. W. Anderson, president of the Tacoma Land Company; President Strong, of the Eastman Kodak Company, and Architect Pickles, who were desirous of witnessing the ceremonies and inspecting the great work, which is but the beginning of the most important system of irrigation canals in America. The intake of the canal, where the dams and head-gates are located, is seven miles from North Yakima and within sight of the Two Buttes, the historic Indian battle-ground. There a platform had been built, and at ten o'clock Hon. R. K. Nichols, as master of ceremonies, called the assembled people to order. * * * Hon. Edward Whitson, Hon. J. B. Reavis, Hon. Gardner C. Hubbard (of Washington, D. C.) and Paul Schultze made speeches appropriate to the occasion. Miss Dora Allen broke a bottle of champagne over the head-gates as the waters swirled into the new canal and the band played lively airs." The whole country celebrated, and the Herald considered the occasion sufficiently important to call for an illustrated special edition.

An event of the year 1892, which evinces the faith of the leading citizens in the present prosperity and future prospects of their county, was the incorporation on April 19th of the Yakima, Natchez and Eastern Railway Company. Its capitalization was five hundred thousand dollars, divided into five thousand shares, and the objects it purposed to accomplish were to construct, maintain and operate a system of railways, telegraph and telephone lines upon the following routes: A line commencing at North Yakima and running through the Moxee valley and the Moxee pass to a point on the Columbia river at or near Priest rapids; a line commencing at North Yakima and running thence up the Naches river to the mouth of Bumping river, thence to Bumping lake, thence to certain coal fields at or near Fish lake, known as the Yakima coal fields; a line commencing at North Yakima and running in a general southeasterly direction into and through that portion of Yakima county known as the Konnewock valley and Sunnyside; a line commencing at North Yakima and running by the most convenient route up the Ahtanum valley to the Yakima mineral springs, and thence up the north fork of the Ahtanum for a distance of twenty miles; a line commencing at North Yakima and running in a southerly direction to Satus creek, and thence by the most practicable route through Satus canyon to Goldendale; all the roads to be narrow gauge.

The company, of which George Donald was president and Edward Whitson vice-president, asked a bonus of one hundred thousand dollars and the various rights of way. This the people of North Yakima and the county were willing to furnish, but the hard times came on before all preliminary arrangements could be made and the enterprise was of necessity abandoned.

A single other event of the very busy and prosperous year 1892 can receive notice in this review. On the morning of March 2d an earthquake shock was experienced from Santa Ana, California, to North Yakima. The disturbances were felt by numerous persons in different parts of this county, but no damage resulted. At Fort Simcoe the peculiar rockings of the earth were somewhat more violent than elsewhere in central Washington, the shocks numbering three, as they did also in Portland and The Dalles. Charles Lombard, clerk at the Yakima agency, stated that a very light shock was felt there at 2:45 a. m. and two heavy ones at 3 and 3:20 respectively. "The latter," said he, "frightened the inhabitants, made the houses rock and shook down a portion of the plastering in the new boarding-house. It also wrenched the office sufficiently to tear away the light wire fencing attached to the front. Mrs. George L. Mattoon was frightened into sickness and has not yet been able to recover from the dizziness with which she was attacked."

An important point was scored for Yakima county in the state legislature during the earliest months of the year 1893. Representative Webb, of King county, introduced a bill for the organization of a state agricultural fair for the advancement of agriculture, stock raising, horticulture, mining, mechanical and industrial pursuits, etc. The bill also provided that exhibitions should be given at or near North Yakima, beginning the last Monday in September each year and continuing five days. It authorized the seven commissioners, to whom its management was to be entrusted, to purchase not less than two hundred acres of land as near North Yakima as possible, for state fair buildings and grounds, appropriating forty thousand dollars to be expended in 1893 and ten thousand dollars in 1894. The bill, amended to provide that Yakima county should donate the grounds to the state, also amended to reduce greatly the appropriation, was passed early in March. In November the county deeded the state one hundred and twenty acres near North Yakima, and the work of clearing off the sage brush and preparing it for occupancy began at once. Buildings were erected during the ensuing summer, and the next fall the first fair was held.

It may be asserted without fear of doing violence to truth that the impetus given Yakima county by the developments of the preceding two or three years rendered it in large measure immune to the deadly blight of financial stress which had attacked the rest of the country, at least for a considerable time. In its issue of June 29th, the Herald, commenting on the fact that the first half of a very unprofitable year had passed, says: "This community has probably suffered less from the general business stagnation than any other on the coast, and with the vast amount of money which will soon be available for the prosecution of work on our irrigation systems, and the flattering outlook for the crops, Yakima may confidently hope for prosperity and plenty this fall. The population of this county has increased over fifty per cent. in the last eighteen months; county warrants are being discounted again, to be sure, but this is not due to any depreciation in their value; rather to the fact that the banks are not buying securities, as they realize that it will require a vast amount of money to pick and prepare the hops for market and to harvest the other crops."

The same paper also tells us that Selah valley, where a year previous there was scarcely anything but sage brush, had witnessed a remarkable settlement during the twelvemonth; over thirty-six thousand fruit trees had been set out, and the country was green with grain, alfalfa, hops and trees; also that the whole country was rapidly settling and developing.

When hop-picking commenced, however, the results of the depression were made apparent in the army of tramps and vagabonds which entered the country and persuaded charitably disposed persons to supply them food until they could obtain employment, then began rioting and interfering with those who were more industrious than they. Their hostilities were directed more particularly against the Chinamen, who in several instances were driven from their work. In some cases also the employers of the Chinamen were threatened and their property made the object of outrageous vandalism. Some of the vagabonds attempted to turn a dishonest penny by selling liquor to the hundreds of Indian hop pickers congregated on Sundays in North Yakima, but Deputy United States Marshal Frank Maguire and his assistants were too vigilant. Twenty-two of the would-be law-breakers were arrested and twelve of them sent to Walla Walla for trial. Even this did not break up the nefarious traffic, and later in the fall the people became so incensed that some of them talked of organizing a popular tribunal to deal with the offending "bootleggers." It was said that from Yakima City to Zillah the brush and foothills were full of the dastardly law-breakers and their degraded and debauched patrons; also that the latter were becoming a menace to travelers and an annoyance to all lovers of peace and order. The United States officials were active and efficient. As a result of their labors, a novel procession filed down to the depot on December 4th. It consisted of forty-four men accused of selling liquor to Indians, about sixty witnesses and fourteen United States marshals and deputies, all bound for Walla Walla, where the trials were to be had. The departure of the forty-four supposed offenders was hailed with delight by long-suffering citizens.

Of a much more serious nature was the trouble of May, 1894, when the peaceful Yakima valley was made the scene of turmoil and violence, and even bloodshed. It will be remembered that in those troublesome times a considerable army of the unemployed were induced, by the preaching of a demagogue named Coxe, to think that they could in some way better their condition by migrating to Washington, D. C., and appearing in person before the president and members of congress. Being without means to procure transportation on the railroads or to subsist themselves while en route, they had no other alternative than to beat their way after the fashion of the tramp and to eat the bread of charity, or the booty of pillaging forays. About the first followers of Coxe to arrive in North Yakima came on May 3d, but they did not come in considerable numbers until the night of the 8th, when a large delegation entered the town and encamped by the city pound. Next morning the freight from the west brought in another delegation, and still others came afoot, on a hand car, and by a raft of ties wherewith they managed to descend the Yakima river. They said their intention was to take the eleven o'clock freight for Spokane, whither their brilliant soi disant "general" had gone before them in a Pullman car. There were also a dozen United States deputy marshals in North Yakima that morning, they having been sent to town in response to a requisition by the mayor.

The eleven o'clock freight was very reluctant to furnish free transportation to the regiment of vagabonds. It made one or two feints, but after running a couple of miles or so with the tops of the cars covered by self-styled industrials, it steamed back to the yards. The deputies and Sheriff Simmons urged the men to get off, showing them dispatches from headquarters directing that the train should be side-tracked unless they should do so, but they refused.

During the afternoon it became evident that serious trouble was to be anticipated. The Coxeyites, angered on account of an encounter between a marshal and one of their number, began arming themselves with clubs. More deputies were sent for, and about five o'clock eleven arrived from the east. Two hours later more marshals were brought from Ellensburg and put off at the mill, the freight on which they arrived passing through the city at full speed. Then the train on which the Coxeyites were backed to the place where the deputy marshals had alighted and the latter climbed aboard. Again the train backed. It is said that the real reason for this movement was to get the industrials away from the influence of their local sympathizers, but the vagabonds on the car tops thought they were to be taken back to Tacoma, and, being determined not to go westward, they rushed to the brakes. Then the fight commenced. It were vain to attempt detailed narration of what happened during the next few minutes or to try to fix responsibility for the tragedy that followed. The stories of spectators could not be harmonized, but it appears that a marshal on one of the cars attempted to force a Coxeyite away from the brake; that the other Coxeyites rushed to his assistance with clubs; that a marshal who was being overcome fired his revolver, and that several shots followed. Thereupon the train backed again and the Coxeyites jumped off or were clubbed off, leaving the train in possession of the marshals.

When the train was gone and the excitement had cooled, it was found that three "industrials" had received slight flesh wounds and that one other had broken an arm in his leap from the car, and still another an ankle; also that quite a number were battered up with clubs. The casualties suffered by the marshals were a flesh wound in Chidester's leg and a severe wound in the person of Jolly, the bullet in the case of the latter entering at the back and lodging among the intestines.

Deputy Marshal W. C. Chidester has left on record an account of the unfortunate affair indited as follows:

On the arrival of Mr. Minsch I explained matters to him, telling him the first thing we should do was to loosen the brakes which the 'wealers had set up in order to carry out our original intentions, namely, to back up the train to the bridge and there clear it. He instructed all the deputies to mount the cars and to see that the brakes were all cleared. In the meantime the citizens had congregated and were urging the men to resist the deputies in loosening the brakes. Deputy Palmer, of South Prairie, assisted by several other deputies, freed three brakes, when one was recaptured and was again set by the 'wealers. About this time fifteen of the deputies were in the midst of the 'wealers, and on releasing the fourth brake they attacked Mr. Palmer and knocked him down. At the same time they attacked Mr. Jolly by striking him a vicious blow on the shoulders. I then jumped over on the car and tried to free Mr. Palmer by pulling the men off. I finally succeeded in doing so by striking one or two of them with a cane. I was then set upon by three of them, was thrown down and struck twice on the head while they endeavored to choke me. Mr. Palmer in the meantime had gone forward to the next car. At this time I saw several hand-to-hand fights with 'wealers who were using their clubs and slung-shots. Some of the citizens were stoning the deputies on the lower end of the train. In falling I caught one of my antagonists under me. He was a big Swede. The man on top of me caught my cane, at the same time secured my left hand, which enabled the man under me to work loose. As he arose to his knees, he dropped his club and pulled his pistol, seeing which I succeeded in raising upon my right knee with these men still on me. I then drew my pistol with my left hand, knocked up my opponent's gun, but before I could recover myself he had fired. The ball passed to my left and struck Jolly who was behind me. I then tried to shoot the Swede, but as I pulled the trigger the men who were still on top of me pulled my arm, knocking my hand down, sending the bullet through my left thigh. The Swede then jumped off the top of the car and the two men who had me down jumped off on the other side. The Swede's shot was not the first fired. He was between me and the citizens who were on the ground, and before he fired I saw the flash of a gun from a party either in a buggy or standing very close to it. There were in the neighborhood of fifteen shots fired, and upon investigation afterward it was found that not more than five shots were fired by the marshals, and I have reason to believe that they followed instructions given them before the engagement, which were that "no marshal was to use his pistol under any circumstances except when attacked, and then only when he saw his life was in danger." The whole affair did not last more than five minutes. Immediately on the firing of the first gun the commonwealers commenced dropping off the train in a haphazard manner. At this juncture the train began backing up, followed by the citizens and 'wealers, who were stopping the train and firing an occasional shot. But no shots were fired by the marshals from this time on. Mr. Jolly then exclaimed: "I'm shot," and I felt for the first time the blood trickling down my own leg.

On the night of May 10th about one hundred and twenty-five "industrials" took possession of two freight cars at Ellensburg and started down the railway toward North Yakima. They were met by a large force of armed deputies, who brought them to a halt by placing a rail across the track. The "industrials" started to run. They were fired upon by the marshals (who in doing so disobeyed orders), and were soon brought to a stand. The marshals claimed that the Coxeyites also fired, a contention which was substantiated by the finding of two revolvers on the arrested men, one of which had evidently been used recently. Two of the men on the cars were wounded and had to be taken to the hospital, while the remainder, one hundred and twenty in number, were locked in the county jail.

These very regrettable encounters between the marshals and the misguided unfortunates and vagabonds who were following Coxey on his meaningless crusade caused great excitement and some bitterness of feeling in Yakima county. As a result of the first conflict forty-nine of the commonwealers were arrested and locked in the city jail, and warrants were issued for a large number of citizens who were charged with inciting the men to resist the law officers. All the accused were taken to Seattle for trial. After a tedious delay they were at length given a hearing, as a result of which the citizens, except two, were discharged. Twenty-nine of the Coxeyites were sentenced to serve sixty days each on the island.

The immediate effects of this trouble had only begun to wear off when misfortune of a radically different nature came to the people of the county. During the latter days of May the waters in the channels of river and stream rose to an unwanted height, causing much apprehension of impending damage on the part of everybody and occasioning considerable loss to those on the lowlands. Old settlers, and even the oldest Indians, claimed that the water had never been so high within the memory of living men. About fifty feet of piling at the north end of the Union Gap bridge was swept away; the Nelson bridge was damaged, and some smaller bridges and culverts were carried away.

"In the Selah valley and farther north," says the Herald, "there was much land submerged, and those living on the lowlands along the Yakima were forced to abandon their homes. Along the Naches the damage to farms and gardens was severe, although the extent cannot now be told. William Lee, Jr., with one of the prettiest market gardens in Yakima, had his hopes for the season blotted out. Some fifteen or eighteen acres of garden at Fruitvale are under water, and there is no telling what damage was done to the young orchard until the waters recede. This is the same story that can be told of all the gardens from the county bridge for some miles up the Naches. It was a hard blow to a number who have been struggling to keep their heads above water, and now to have them ruthlessly pulled under again calls forth the sympathy of the community.

"Freight train No. 54, which passed this point at six o'clock Sunday morning, May 27th, going east, met with an accident near Toppenish station which resulted in the death of Fireman Edward Morrell and injury to Engineer Charles Wirth.

About three miles west of Toppenish is a trestle crossing a slough, and while it appeared perfectly safe to the eye, the piling, which had been undermined by the backwater from the Yakima river, gave way as soon as it felt the weight of the train. Engineer Wirth was standing at the door of the cab, and when he realized that the structure was giving way, he shouted to the fireman and jumped into the slough. How Wirth escaped is a mystery, as he must have struck one of the timbers, his back being seriously injured, and after the first excitement he could not move without great pain. The engine and a couple of cars dropped a distance of fifteen feet, pinning poor Morrell against the boiler head. His death must have been almost instantaneous, but it was several hours before the body was recovered. A wrecking train was brought down from Ellensburg and is now engaged in clearing the wreck. Wirth is recovering."

During the early hours of the 31st of May it seemed that the worst from the freshets was over, but before night word reached North Yakima that the Moxee bridge was in danger. Men and teams were hastily gathered and put to work to save the structure if possible. Night and day they toiled until June 5th, seemingly fighting a losing battle, but at last the river gave up the struggle and the bridge was safe.

A memorable incident of this troublous time was the terrible storm of June 2d. It was contemporaneous with an exceedingly destructive cyclone, which swept over several counties of eastern Oregon, causing the loss of a number of lives. Upon the storm in Yakima county, the Herald commented as follows:

Yakima doesn't mind a little wind; she isn't averse to an occasional shower, and thunder and lightning are novelties which are so rarely experienced as to have an attraction; but the good Lord deliver us from the combination of them all that swept down on us Saturday evening last, June 2d. No great amount of damage was done, but how we escaped so luckily is somewhat puzzling. The day had been warm and pleasant, and the first intimation of the coming storm was an immense whirlwind at the lower end of the Moxee. It gathered up leaves, paper and weeds in its capacious maw. Next a big, black cloud seemed to force itself through Union Gap, and before we were well aware what was coming, it broke upon us in all its virulent fury. It didn't come, as is usual with such storms, in little cupfuls and puffs of wind, but it shot out with a broadside that swayed and strained everything that offered an impediment to its freedom of course. Great brick buildings staggered and shook, while some of the wooden houses took on a swaying motion and groaned as if in physical pain. Many of the balm trees, weakened by the boring of grubs, snapped in two like seasoned oat straws, while giant poplars of sturdy trunk were torn up by their roots and hurled across the streets. A couple of barns of indifferent construction were flattened to the ground, and two or three hop houses were moved from their foundations. Other damages were of a minor nature, and, best of all, no one was hurt. A little girl was blown head foremost into an irrigation ditch, but was pulled out by the feet.

After the first fury had been spent, the rain descended in sheets, the thunder sounded like heavy cannonading, and the lightning played all sorts of devilish pranks, making an electrical display as fascinating as it was fearful. Along the Northern Pacific in the vicinity of the Cascade tunnel the engineers were blinded by the almost continuous flash of empyrean flame, and every train was stopped for half an hour, not an engineer daring to move his engine, being unable to see and fearing to go sightlessly ahead. It was a grand and awful storm, but enough is as satisfying as a feast.

Any damage sustained by the crops was more than offset by the benefits of the soaking rain. Some of the fruit, mostly that which was blighted, was blown down, but the thinning process was a good thing, as there is all the fruit left that the trees can well bear up under, and the quality will be better in consequence. In the hop yards the damage was slight. Several barns in the country were blown down and the dwelling of Ross Mars, in Selah valley, was shifted from its foundation a few feet.

The storm Saturday was followed by one Sunday evening which, if not so severe or of so long duration, was certainly a hummer for a time, and it is reported to have done some damage in the orchards along the Naches. Its most disagreeable feature was the accompanying hail which pelted down in a lively manner, cutting the hop leaves and knocking off the fruit. Again, the scare was greater than the harm done. Moxee valley suffered some.

In Yakima considerable work will be required to put the bridges in condition for use. The one across the Naches is the only one that will need extensive repairs, and its safety as due to the splendid cribbing work performed by the railroad company. The smaller bridges will generally require new approaches. Under the farther span of the Union Gap bridge but two piles remain. The Moxee bridge is practically out of danger, but it vibrates lengthwise very perceptibly. The channel of the river has changed materially, and at the bridge it has shifted about two hundred feet to the east. The river is now falling rapidly. The storm was general throughout the Northwest, and millions of dollars' worth of damage has been done along the Columbia river.

One other unfortunate occurrence of the year 1894 must be chronicled in these pages. About one o'clock in the morning of June 18th a dastardly tragedy was enacted in North Yakima, the victim being Nathan S. Bagwell, a sporting man and gambler, said to have been one of the best of his class. The report of the gun and a groan from the victim brought W. S. Davidson to the scene. Davidson was soon joined by D. E. Smith, Matthew Bartholet and others, who found on investigation that Bagwell had not been robbed and that his revolver had no empty shells in it. The officers present concluded that the man had been murdered, and in this opinion the coroner's jury concurred.

Late in August, Bagwell's concubine, Mrs. Philomene Brassard, also Omar Harvey, Frank La Vergne and son Louis, J. H. King, a colored man, and L. D. Joslyn were arrested and charged with complicity in the murder either as principals or accessories. Louis La Vergne and J. H. King were discharged without trial, but the others were held without bonds to appear at the next term of the superior court.

The case came on in October, La Vergne being first placed in jeopardy. The testimony of one witness at least was quite sensational. Omar Harvey, an inoffensive-looking boy of nineteen, swore that he had himself fired the fatal shot, but had been coerced to do so by La Vergne, who threatened to kill him if he refused. A portion of this boy's direct testimony was thus outlined in a local paper of the time:

Witness continued: Prior to June 17th he had worked with La Vergne on the Moxee bridge. He had talked with La Vergne regarding the killing of Bagwell. The first conversation was about the middle of May, when he was living on the north side of Third street and the east side of the railroad track. La Vergne then said that he had a plan to make some money; that he had been watching a man for some time who carried considerable money and jewelry. Afterward at the bridge they had a further talk, and witness then learned that the man was "Tex" Bagwell. La Vergne said that Mrs. Bagwell's former husband had offered him $2,000 if he would put Tex out of the way, and that if witness would do the work he should have half that amount. La Vergne further said that he had done the same kind of work before and could get away with it all right. Afterward La Vergne and witness, with La Vergne's brother-in-law, went hunting, when the same line of conversation was continued. Witness saw La Vergne Sunday afternoon, when the latter said: "Be ready to-night." Witness told him that if he wanted any work of that kind done he had better do it himself. Afterward they talked about a hay contract. He stayed down town a while and then went home. La Vergne came after him about nine o'clock and they went down town. Spent considerable time around and took several drinks at Dooley's and Shardlow & McDaniels'. Sam Bagwell at the corner saloon; he was playing billiards; fifteen or twenty minutes afterwards witness started for home, but was stopped near Luther's store by La Vergne, who had a bottle. They took a drink and then went east in the alley by the side of the Hotel Atherton and Mason's Opera House, coming out on Second street, then going south to Coffin Brothers' store and then to the alley in the rear and entered Lee's gate. They then went to the place of concealment in the shadow next to Lee's store, and La Vergne left and brought back a gun and handed it to witness. La Vergne then left, going north. "When he placed me there in the corner of the lot he told me not to leave. Feared that if I didn't do as he told me and made a failure of the shooting, I would lose my own life." Witness waited about twenty minutes or half an hour, when Bagwell came along and he fired. Witness then ran away and hid the gun under the sidewalk near Coffin's store. Then went home. Admitted that he was intoxicated to some extent on the night of the murder. Never asked La Vergne for any money as promised and was fully aware that he had committed a crime for which he would probably hang.

Of course, the defendant flatly denied the truth of these statements, but the evidence was too strong, and La Vergne was found guilty of manslaughter. He was sentenced to twenty years, the judge in passing sentence virtually censuring the jury for not finding a verdict of murder in the first degree.

Omar Harvey remained in jail for several weeks, then pleaded guilty of manslaughter. An arrest of judgment in his case being entered, he was granted his liberty and forthwith left the town. The other accused persons were never brought to trial.

But 1894 was not a year of unmix'd disaster in Yakima county, notwithstanding hard times and floods and tragedies. A very successful state fair was held, the first of a series; the Wide Hollow ditch was completed by the Yakima Valley Canal Company, abundant crops were raised, and altogether the people were better off than those in most other parts of the Northwest. It must be admitted, however, that the exceedingly dull times obtaining everywhere put a tight brake upon the wheels of progress in the Yakima valley.

A striking illustration of the general financial depression in the state in 1895 was furnished by the action of the fair commissioners in deciding to hold no state fair that year. The appropriation was meager, only twenty-five hundred dollars, and the dates were in coincidence with those of the Oregon state and Spokane expositions. The commissioners believed that these facts, coupled with the prevailing depression, would render it impossible to hold a creditable exposition.

The sequel to this decision of the commissioners illustrates the courage of the Yakima people and their determination to conquer the tendency to stagnation then obtaining. They took up at once the matter of holding an agricultural exposition of a more local character and soon had their preparations under way. "The times are very hard," they said, "and money is scarce, but little money is required, and there is all the more reason in the depressed condition of business why we should make a mighty effort to show the people of the state that Yakima is not dead yet." Their labors were abundantly rewarded. The fair was held October 7th to 12th, inclusive, and besides its advertising effect and the pleasure and profit it furnished the people, it paid all expenses and left a balance of eight hundred and fifty dollars in the treasury. One of its principal attractions was the Indian celebration of October 9th, at which were present Okanogans, Colvilles, Umatillas, Nez Perces, Cayuses, Yakimas, Puyallups, Klickitats, British Columbia Indians, etc., in large numbers. Chiefs Moses, Peo and White Swan were in attendance. Credit for the success of this exhibition is due to all the people, but more especially to the following officers: O. A. Fechter, president; G. G. Brownell, secretary; H. K. Sinclair, treasurer; Edward Whitson, A. B. Wyckoff, J. G. Lawrence, E. F. Benson, W. H. Redman, Frank Horsley, F. E. Thompson, A. L. Aiken, M. Stanton, Nelson Rich and Robert McCook.

In the closing month of the year 1895, the North Yakima Commercial Club decided to act in the matter of endeavoring to secure the opening by congress of the Yakima Indian reservation. By a committee of its members the following memorial was prepared and forwarded to Washington, D. C. :

To the Honorable Senators and Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Your petitioner, the Yakima Commercial Club, embracing among its members over one hundred of the leading citizens and largest property holders of this county, respectfully requests that the Yakima Indian reservation may be thrown open to settlement at the earliest practicable moment, for the following reasons:

This reservation embraces 887,040 acres and lies nearly in the center of Yakima county. The lands along the river are level plains and rise gently to the mountains twenty-five miles distant. About 200,000 acres of these lower lands, having the finest of crop soils, are now desert and covered with sage brush, but can readily be put under irrigation ditches at moderate cost, when 10,000 families could make prosperous homes upon them. There are about 1,500 Indians on the reservation who have all accepted their allotment of lands in severalty from the government. They have made considerable progress in civilization, farm about 15,000 acres of sub-irrigated lands, are virtually self-supporting, and are good neighbors to the whites. If their surplus lands were purchased, 10,000 industrious white families would speedily reclaim the irrigable sage brush lands now of no use whatever to the Indians, and turn them into fruitful orchards and gardens. There is, perhaps, no other body of land in the United States of the same dimensions which will give permanent prosperity to an equal number of intelligent agriculturalists, and without working any injury to the Indians. On the contrary, they will be enabled with the proceeds of the sale of their surplus lands to build comfortable houses and develop their own farms, while the bunch-grass hilltops and forest-covered mountain sides will remain the grazing ranges for their flocks and herds.

Whatever action may be taken regarding the entire reservation, your petitioner feels assured that the wisdom of congress will prompt instant legislation to purchase the desert sage brush lands of the Indians, and offer them for sale in small tracts. In this manner the government would be reimbursed for the purchase money, the land would be reclaimed and thousands of industrious inhabitants be added to the population of this bountiful valley.

Commissioners were sent in 1897 to negotiate with the Indians for the purpose of purchasing their tribal lands. Several conferences were held, the most important of which was that of July 20th and 21st, but though the government offered unusually liberal terms, the Indians could not be induced to sell. The commissioners stated that two hundred thousand acres would be required for the allotments made and to be made, and that for the rest of the reservation, they were authorized to offer one million four hundred thousand dollars, deferred payments to bear four per cent. interest.

The year 1896 was not superior in general conditions to its predecessor, and though a state fair was held, it was not as successful as had been the citizens' fair of the year previous. The Yakima country, though it probably never experienced as much distress during the hard times as did many other parts of the Northwest, was somewhat slow in rallying, owing to local causes, and 1897 could not be classed as a prosperous year. Many of the citizens sought to better their fortunes in the Klondyke, among them R. B. Milroy, H. A. Griffin, Owen T. Stratton, Lester Coffin, Fred Jungst, Peter Norby, George Guiland, W. Cameron, Dan Simmons, Samuel Failing, Henry Fry. — Condon, William Bounds, John Bartholet, Anthony Krober and Dick McDaniels. These men started in July and August. Other parties followed, among them one on the 25th of October, which required for the transportation of its stock and baggage a special train of twelve cars. The members of this expedition purposed to pick up two hundred head of cattle at Victoria and to drive these and the horses, most of them under pack, as far inland as they could, then to slaughter all the animals and transport the best to the interior by dog-trains, using the horse flesh as food for the dogs. The Yakima men who joined in this venture were: Charles Lillie, George Weikel, C. J. Anderson, E. L. Bogart, J. H. Bogart, Herman Frank, R. Granville, A. E. Newlist, E. S. Hackley, T. P. Stubblefield, George Stubblefield, F. Willing, H. H. Fry, E. C. Elgin, Warren Walters, John Powers, Bogus Henderson and James Hanson.

By the spring of 1898, all signs of commercial stagnation and business depression had completely disappeared. When the march of progress was once more resumed, it was resumed in good earnest, and the country experienced a rapid development and increase in population. The return of prosperity, the bright prospects for good crops and the fact that the war with Spain was progressing as well as heart could wish, caused a cheerful spirit among the people, a spirit which manifested itself in rousing celebrations on the nation's birthday.

When the war with Spain was declared there was one military organization here, Troop A, First Washington Cavalry, which certainly deserved the favorable consideration of the governor for a place in the Washington regiment of volunteers. Some two years before Company E and Troop C had been abandoned by legislative enactment, and Troop A had then come into being as an independent organization. Since that time it had maintained itself without the slightest assistance from the state, and now it wished to participate in the war as an infantry company. Governor Rogers wisely decided to give it a chance. Soon it was recruited to full numbers, and at Tacoma it was mustered into the regiment as Company E, officered as follows: Captain, M. S. Scudder: first lieutenant, F. T. Briggs; second lieutenant, W. L. Lemon. The names on its muster roll, a few facts concerning some of its members, and an outline of its adventures as a part of the forces of the United States, are here given for reference:

Company E, Second Battalion, First Washington Volunteers.

Organized at North Yakima, Washington.

Captain—Marshall S. Scudder.

First Lieutenant—Fred T. Briggs, later Regimental Adjutant. Died after the war from its effects.

Second Lieutenant—William L. Lemon, later Regimental Quartermaster.

First Sergeant—E. J. Young, subsequently promoted to First Lieutenant.

Second Sergeant—J. F. Alderson, later promoted Second Lieutenant. Died in January, 1900.

Sergeants—J. H. Wright, J. N. Scott, J. L. Druse, C. K. Brown, Clyde Stewart.

Corporals—A. N. Ross, H. L. Leeper, J. M. McCleary, Harry F. Coombs, James Spahr, William Washburn, George S. Sexton, E. E. Grover, Frank Rodes, F. H. Millican, Dean D. Stair, N. G. Bunce, Walter P. Fox.

Cook—Paul W. Mathieson.

Musician—Frank E. Dillon.

Artificer—Allen Converse.

Wagoner—Horatio R. Jennings.

Privates—F. H. Aylworth, Paul K. Boyer, Henry R. Brasselle, Walter J. Brick, John Cameron, Charles C. Coombs, William T. Corder, Edwin Dane, Charles L. Dowell, Oral F. Gibson, Charles Gosling, Curtis S. Greene, Henry H. Hagendorf, Harry O. Hawley, Howard D. Hazard, Christian O. Horn, William A. Kelsay, George T. Lahar, Gerrit Leuwrick (now dead), F. B. Lippincott, Leo McDonald, Joseph J. Mitchell, George W. Nunnally, Raymond W. Orkey, George S. Palmer, John J. Sandmeyer, William G. Schaefer, William Schoenhals, Fred T. Sherwood, Cecil M. Smith, E. C. Spaulding, William C. Stephens, Herbert E. Stowe, John E. Tomberlin, James G. Triplett, Mart Troy, E. W. Waddington, A. H. Waddington, David B. Wall, Peter P. Walker, Oliver A. Westfall, C. T. Gray Wilgus, Harry A. Williams, Frank W. Woolsey.

Death Roll—Privates, Frank Smith, February 5, 1899, at Artillery Knoll; Mathias H. Cherry, February 5, 1899, at Artillery Knoll; George B. Reichert, February 5, Santa Ana; Ralph E. Shearer, February 6, 1899, Artillery Knoll; Ralph E. Van Bushkirk, March 14, Pateros; Spencer Swain, Presidio, California, October 27, 1899; John C. Baggott, Presidio, California, 1899.

Wounded—Sergeant Henry Leach, February 5th, Fortson's Knoll; privates, John Cameron, February 22, 1899, Guadalupe; Walter P. Fox, February 5, 1899, Fortson's Knoll; Oral F. Gibson, Santa Ana, February 5, 1899; Christian E. Horn, February 5, 1899, Guadalupe; Herbert L. Osborn, February 3, 1899, Guadalupe; William C. Stephens, Santa Ana, February 5, 1899; A. H. Waddington, February 22d, Guadalupe.

Company E was mustered into service May 9, 1898, at Tacoma as part of the First Battalion. With the First Washington Infantry it went to San Francisco and was there quartered in the famous Presidio garrison until the regiment departed for the Orient. During the early days at Manila it was quartered in the "tobacco factory," and on the morning of February 5th formed a part of the now famous "Fortson's Battalion," which covered itself with glory by a desperate charge on Bloody Knoll, held by a force numbering twice that of the attacking party. Immediately after this battle the company quarters were transferred to Santa Ana, while the company itself went into the trenches in front of San Pedro. It participated in the operations of the provisional brigade, March 13th to 19th, and from that time was stationed at Pasig, participating in the kirmishes about that point, including Tay-Tay and Morong, up to Calamba. This company was one of the heaviest losers in the regiment, having five men killed in action. Of the original officers, the two lieutenants became regimental officers. Pateros, San Pedro Macati, Guadaloupe, Pasig, Tay-Tay, Santa Cruz, Santa Ana and Calamba are all names of importance in the company's history.

In response to the request of Colonel Wholley to make special mention of men who had signalized themselves by bravery in the field. Captain Scudder presented the following names from Company E: First Lieutenant E. J. Young, First Sergeant Henry H. Leach, Second Lieutenant John F. Anderson, William Stephens, Sergeant John H. Wright, Corporal William Washburn, Corporal D. D. Stair, James J. Mitchell, George Palmer and Edward C. Spaulding.

The arrival of the Washington volunteers upon American soil was made the occasion of noisy demonstrations in North Yakima. By a preconcerted plan the welcoming committee had arranged that cannonading should be begun as soon as the news should be received. The news came at 11:40 a. m., October 1st, in the form of a dispatch stating that the Pennsylvania, with the First Washington aboard, had been sighted entering the Golden Gate; and forthwith guns were fired, whistles sounded, bells rang, and the entire town was thrown into a commotion. The enthusiasm was only surpassed by that of November 7th, when the boys of Company E reached North Yakima. The Herald's account of this event is as follows:

About nine o'clock Tuesday night, the home-coming of Company E was heralded by the firing of cannon and other martial noises. The famous "Terrors of Pasig" were accompanied by thirty-five of the Walla Walla company and fifty-six of the Waitsburg boys. An informal reception was held at the depot. It was a glorious sight to see the avenue ablaze with lights and gaily caparisoned with bunting. The mothers and sisters of the boys vied with each other and the sweethearts in welcoming them with the affection that passes all description. The visiting troops were banqueted in fitting style at Switzer's Opera House, but Company E fled to domestic quiet and avoided any public display. No parade was attempted, that part of the programme being deferred until the next day.

The joy of the greeting of friends of the returned volunteers was next in heartiness to the welcome by the immediate relatives of the soldiers. Lieutenant Briggs was literally crushed by the reception extended him by his old Northern Pacific associates. Lieutenant Lemon was likewise greeted. As for Captain Scudder, it is almost needless to say that he was the hero of the hour. Company E brought with it a mascot in the person of Pedro, a Filipino, the protege of Lieutenant Lemon. No untoward incident marred the general rejoicing, and taps were not sounded until at least three o'clock in the morning.

At ten o'clock Wednesday morning, under the direction of Marshal Fred Parker, a procession was formed on Yakima avenue, and Company E, marching in the lead, proceeded to the Yakima Hotel. Following them came the G. A. R., the Uniformed Rank, K. of P., and Company F, W. N. G., successor to Company E.

The band, under the leadership of Professor Nagler, rendered patriotic airs, and in the intervals eloquent speeches were made by Post Commander Druse, of the G. A. R.; H. J. Snively, E. B. Preble, L. S. Howlett and H. M. Bartlett. The benediction was pronounced by Rev. A. H. Lyons. Captain Scudder also spoke. In the afternoon a banquet was served to the soldiers at Switzer's Opera House by the ladies of the Red Cross Society and others. Everywhere business houses and private residences were ablaze with bunting and flags, and the day, in accordance with the proclamation of Mayor Fechter, was a general holiday.

A subject of considerable general comment during the year 1899, and one which excited not a little the passions of those immediately interested, was the action of the Interior Department regarding the pasturing of sheep on the Ranier forest reserve. In March, Dr. Cloes, the superintendent, received instructions regarding the boundaries of the sheep lands, and was informed that a limited number might enter the rest of the reserve provided no reservoir supply or public resort should be encroached upon, and that the grazing season should be from June 20th to September 20th.

A few months later, upon recommendation of Professor Lawson Schribner, chief of graminology of the Interior Department, Secretary Hitchcock canceled the sixty-eight permits that had been granted sheepmen within the reserve. This action took away the customary summer range from two hundred and sixty thousand sheep and dealt a severe blow to the wool-growing industry of Yakima county. Indignation meetings were held by the local sheepmen, who framed forceful protests against the order, and promptly subscribed a fund to send representatives to look after their interests in congress.

During the earliest days of 1900 the sheepmen of Yakima valley, in compliance with a request from Congressman Jones that they should furnish him with such information as would enable him to best look out for their interests, sent an open letter to congress containing some valuable data. After reciting a circular of the Interior Department, bearing date June 30, 1897, which set forth that the pasturing of sheep on the reserve would not be interfered with if it could be shown that no injury would result therefrom to young trees or to the water supply, the sheepmen's letter argued in substance "that in the counties of Klickitat, Yakima and Kittitas the lower range where sheep are pastured in the winter months are semi-arid and therefore not suited to summer pasturage. It is then necessary to drive the sheep to the mountains on the east side of the Cascades, on the higher altitudes where it is impossible for sheep to eat trees or destroy the water supply. Here the sheep have been pastured for twenty years, and their feet are golden in the way of improving and enriching the soil. There is no grazing or grass for obvious reasons where the trees and undergrowth are thick. It has been the constant effort of sheepmen to prevent forest fires, and on the range reserve there were practically no fires last season. The charge that sheepmen are nomadic, with no fixed place of abode, is combated, and it is pointed out that sheepmen pay a larger proportion of taxes than the representatives of any other branch of industry. In Yakima county there were assessed for 1899 168,745 head of sheep, valued at $299,921, or a fourth of the personal property valuation of the county. Besides owning large quantities of land, the sheepmen have leased from the Northern Pacific Company 318,550 acres. If the reservation ruling is enforced all this land will be practically valueless. '

The letter recommended that the existing system of leasing should be continued until the geological surveys could be extended on to the Ranier and Washington reserves, that the treeless areas and agricultural lands might be excluded from them; also that sheep should be grazed under the following conditions:

"Limit the sheep to the number constantly grazing there, with five-year permits, each owner to have a specified tract. Require as a condition of each permit that the owner use every effort to prevent fires and to report their causes. Secure the co-operation of the Wool Growers' Association, through a committee of three stockmen, who shall assist the government officers and the department in controlling and looking after the reservation."

The interior department issued an order allowing grazing on the eastern slope of the reserve, and the secretary authorized the granting of permits for two hundred and fifty thousand sheep to enter not earlier than July 1st and continue not later than September 25th. Cattle and horses in the same numbers that had usually grazed on the reserve were permitted to continue doing so on certain conditions.

April 25th the cattle and wool growers' associations held meetings in North Yakima to arrange for a division of the grazing lands. The following sheepmen, namely, John Cleman, S. J. Cameron, Dan Goodman, Alexander McAllister and W. H. Vessey, were appointed to confer with a committee of cattlemen consisting of Daniel Sinclair, P. A. Bounds, Elmer Marks, Milton Burge and A. J. Splawn. These men agreed with each other in the division of all the ranges except those in the Ahtanum and Klickitat districts, claims to which had to be submitted to Superintendent Sheller for adjustment.

The United States census returns for 1900 show that Yakima county has made a greater percentage of gain in population than any other in the state. In 1870 our county, which then embraced Kittitas, was credited with a population of 432; in 1880, 2,811; in 1890, 4,429, and in 1900, 13,462. It will be seen that the gain in the decade was over 200 per cent. and in the previous twenty years nearly 380 per cent. In 1850 the population of Washington was 1,201; in 1860,

A single serious crime darkened the record of the year 1900 in Yakima county. It occurred at Prosser on the afternoon of September 30th. According to the best information obtainable, the story of the tragedy is about as follows: Three men who had been picking hops boarded an empty car at Mabton, intending to beat their way east. At Prosser in came two other men who forthwith covered the three with firearms and robbed them of all their belongings, consisting of about forty-five dollars in money and a silver watch. The robbers jumped off the car at a siding beyond Prosser, and at Kiona the hop pickers also left the train. They notified the station agent at once. The latter was about to telegraph to Prosser for the arrest of the men, when W. W. Scott, formerly a telegraph operator, invited the hop pickers to go back with him on a west-bound freight to identify the robbers. Upon arriving at Prosser, they discovered five men boarding a freight car. Scott ordered these to alight; then demanded that one of the hop pickers should identify the robbers if in the crowd. The hop pickers pointed out a large and a small man as the persons wanted. When Scott took his eyes off the large man and turned his attention to the small one, the former miscreant fired twice at him. One of the bullets penetrated the body of the unfortunate Scott just above the heart, the other passed through his head, killing him instantly. The murderer fired again, seriously wounding one of the hop pickers in the side; then murderer and witnesses all fled precipitately from the spot. An arrest of the supposed guilty man was made at La Grande, Oregon, early the following November, but the accused, when brought to North Yakima, could not be satisfactorily identified, and no one was punished for the dastardly homicide.

The first matter to agitate the people of Yakima county in 1901 was a scheme for the segregation of some of their territory into a separate political organization. The proposal was not altogether a new one, but its friends had not theretofore been numerous enough to cause their opponents much apprehension. In January of that year, however, the question became one of no little concern. There seemed to be small reason to doubt that Representative Rich would introduce in the state legislature a bill creating the county of Riverside, with the dividing boundary running north and south through a point three miles west of Mabton. The opposition got to work in good earnest, circulating petitions, circular letters, etc. In its issue of February 14th, the Herald said: "It is quite probable that those agitating for a division of the county—namely, those interested in making Prosser a county seat—will meet with but poor success, for remonstrances are pouring in from all quarters and thus far Representative Rich has been persuaded not to introduce his bill. It is claimed that taxes will be increased considerably just at the time when new settlers are wanted. The new county would be obliged to assume its share of the old county indebtedness, which share will amount to $66,000; then there will be required new buildings, abstracts of books, printing and other expenses amounting to $100,000, making a total debt of $166,000 to start with. This is too much for the southern and eastern portion to swallow. Besides, Klickitat is fighting the scheme, as the plans embrace the cutting off of several precincts of the Horse Heaven country to add to Riverside county. The scheme is doomed to defeat."

Nevertheless, a bill was introduced by Representative Rich and became known as House Bill No. 120. It provided that the boundaries of the new county should be as follows: Beginning at the point of intersection of the middle of the main channel of the Columbia river with the township line which divides ranges twenty-one and twenty-two east of Willamette meridian; thence running north along said township line to the point where it intersects the township line dividing ranges twenty and twenty-one east of Willamette meridian; thence north along said last named township line to boundary line between the said counties of Yakima and Klickitat; thence west along said boundary line to where said boundary line intersects the south boundary line of the Simcoe Indian reservation; thence along the said boundary line of the Simcoe Indian reservation in a general northeasterly direction to where the boundary line intersects the township line dividing ranges twenty-one and twenty-two east of the Willamette meridian; thence north along said last named township line to where it intersects the township line which divides townships eleven and twelve north; thence east along said last named township line to where it intersects the township line dividing ranges twenty-three and twenty-four east of the Willamette meridian; thence north along said last named township line to where it intersects the middle of the main channel of the Columbia river; thence down the middle of the main channel of the Columbia river to the point of beginning." The bill was never voted upon.

As the year 1901 advanced, it brought many blessings. It witnessed the completion of the Selah-Moxee canal, the construction of which had begun in December of the preceding year. The formal dedication of this important aqueduct took place June 8th, though the water had been flowing through it for nearly a month. Those who witnessed the ceremonies were delegations of business men from Tacoma, Seattle and Spokane, besides many noted in local circles. By these gentlemen the canal and lands watered by it were inspected that afternoon, and in the evening a banquet was tendered them at the Hotel Yakima at which, it is said, J. W. Chise, W. T. Clark and G. S. Rankin were the guests of honor. The original officers of the Selah-Moxee Canal Company were: President, George S. Rankin; vice-president, Edward Whitson; treasurer, J. D. Cornett; secretary, W. T. Clark.

The year under review also witnessed a very successful state fair, one that is said to have beaten the record of all preceding exhibitions of the kind. It brought also bountiful harvests and good prices. The fruit grower, the hay raiser, the cattle man, the sheep man, the hop grower and every person whose business was the tilling of the soil was made happy by an abundant reward for his labors. The Herald tells us that, at a low and safe estimate, the productions of the county could not have been less than $3,000,000, and that of this sum over $2,000,000 represent the value of hay, potatoes, hops, fruit and grain. It distributes the production among the different crops as follows: 170,000 tons of hay at $4.50, $765,000; 2,000 cars of potatoes, $620,000; 1,400 bales of hops, $280,000; fruit, $260,000; wheat, $70,000; barley, $20,000; oats, $10,000; total, $2,025,000. The remainder of the $3,000,000 represents its estimate on the production of cattle, sheep and horses.

But the year brought also some disasters, two of which, both railway accidents, are thought worthy of being briefly set forth here. One took place Sunday morning, the 13th of January, on Selah creek, seven miles north of North Yakima. When the Northern Pacific passenger train left the last named point, it was an hour late, and of course it traveled at a high rate of speed to make up what it could. When it approached the culvert at Squaw or Selah creek, the engineer, Charles Wirth, of Ellensburg, noticed that something was wrong ahead. The culvert had been undermined and a wreck was inevitable. The engine passed over in safety, but the tender sank, and Mr. Wirth threw the throttle wide open to prevent the cars from piling one on top of another. His presence of mind doubtless saved many lives. The cars were held up and kept in motion until all were over, though without some of their trucks, except the rear sleeper, which remained safe on the track. A steel rail passed through the body of one coach and penetrated the roof. There were many narrow escapes, but no lives were lost and only three persons were wounded, the unfortunate ones being Hugh P. Ball, knee bruised; P. McEwell, mail clerk, elbow dislocated; G. W. Turner, Seattle, colored porter, knee cap broken. That the damage to passengers was not greater seems miraculous.

The second train wreck, a much more serious one, occurred at 11:30 p. m., December 8th. The scene was the gap about two miles north of North Yakima, and the cause a head-end collision of two freights, each running at a high rate of speed. The accident was the result of a misunderstanding on the part of the engineer and conductor of the east-bound train, second No. 54, which left Roza with orders to pass No. 1,302 at Wenas. The latter train was sent out of North Yakima in charge of Conductor Anderson and Engineer Dan Smith, with orders to side-track at Wenas until second No. 54 had gone by. Before this, extra No. 164 had been sent out of North Yakima and had taken the siding at Wenas. Of the existence of this special, Conductor Chase and Engineer Cooper, so the former claimed, had no knowledge whatsoever.

The second section of No. 54 consisted of two engines, and one loaded and fifty empty cars. Upon its arrival at Wenas, it slowed down to ascertain whether or not the train on the siding was No. 1,302. Both the engineer and conductor took the extra to be that train, so they resumed their journey at the usual high speed. Their mistake was discovered when at the first sharp curve north of the Naches bridge, they crashed into No. 1,302 with terrific force. The effect is more easily imagined than described. The head engine of the east-bound exploded; the engine behind plowed through its tender, converting it into a mass of splinters and twisted iron, and finally coming to rest with its nose on top of its fellow ahead; cars were piled on each other in the utmost confusion, the whole occupying a space only about three hundred feet long. The engine of the west-bound was partly telescoped and had its cab smashed into splinters.

The dead were T. R. Cooper, engineer of second No. 54; Fred L. Cantonwine, fireman; the wounded, Joseph J. Case, conductor, left wrist scalded, head cut and bruised; B. B. Stodd, brakeman, right leg broken in two places, also badly crushed and burned; John J. Peters, brakeman, right arm crushed so as to necessitate amputation; Matthew Darcy, brakeman, burned and scalded about head and hands; Alfred Schanno, fireman, cut about head and bruised; Budd Anderson, cut about head and bruised. Conductor Chase, of the east-bound, was seen by a newspaper reporter and made the following statement: "When we came to Wenas, Engineer Cooper looked out and said, 'That's 1,302; we're all right,' and then pulled open the throttle and let her go. Train No. 164 signalled us the way was clear and we did not stop. I suppose they meant the way for them was clear. Anyhow, we came on at a thirty-mile gait, and when the collision came, I felt myself going through the cab. That is all I remember until I found myself in bed here. Who's to blame, I do not know. We had not been notified that extra 164 was on the siding. If we had, no doubt the collision would have been averted." Conductor Chase died as a result of the accident while en route to Missoula, Montana. At the investigation, responsibility for the accident was fixed upon him and upon Engineer Cooper.

The question of grazing sheep and cattle on the Ranier Forest Reserve, a question which had recurred for several years with each returning season, was up again in 1902. Locally considered, this agitation might almost be styled a three-cornered fight, the cattle interests, the sheep interests and the agricultural interests being by the nature of the case more or less at variance. In the meeting of the North Yakima Commercial Club on the evening of March 4th, the agricultural interests asserted themselves. A. J. Splawn, chairman of the executive committee of the Yakima Husbandry Association, who is both a cattleman and a farmer, read a lengthy paper, in which he argued that the grazing of hundreds of thousands of sheep on the headwaters of the streams was materially affecting the water supply, and that this condition of affairs ought not to continue, as the agricultural were ten-fold greater than the stock interests. He offered a resolution asking the department to make a special investigation of the matter and to act in accordance with the report of a competent expert in such matters. But the body of the meeting was prepared for more radical action, and by a vote of eighteen to thirteen it adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the secretary of this club be instructed to address the secretary of the interior, setting forth in his letter that it is the sense of the Commercial Club of North Yakima that the watershed of the Ranier Forest Reserve is being materially and permanently injured by the grazing of sheep and other live stock in said reserve; that such injury has had and is having the effect of diminishing the flow of water in the streams which are being used for the purpose of irrigating the arid lands tributary to such streams to the permanent injury of the agricultural interests of this section, and to petition the secretary to prohibit the further grazing of sheep and other live stock in the reserve, and be it resolved that this resolution shall not apply or refer to stock grazing in said reserve for or during the year 1902, which is not protested against."

Probably before knowledge of the action of the Commercial Club reached the department of agriculture, which by act of congress had succeeded the interior department in control of some matters connected with forest reservations, that department sent out notice that the number of sheep to graze on the reserve should not exceed one hundred and seventy-two thousand. Superintendent D. B. Sheller met the sheeppmen of Yakima, Kittitas and Klickitat counties on the 15th and 16th days of May and adjusted with them the apportionment of the grazing privileges.

In the summer of 1902, the county division project once more began to be agitated. July 30th a mass-meeting was held at Rich's Hall in Prosser for the purpose of considering the new county scheme, at which were delegations from Mabton, Sunnyside, Kiona, Rattlesnake and Prosser, the entire assemblage numbering about a hundred. Hon. Nelson Rich presided. A committee, consisting of one delegate from each precinct, was appointed to define the boundary lines of the proposed new political entity, and after conference, it reported that the said boundaries should be as follows:

Beginning at a point in the middle of the Columbia river, where the range line between twenty-one and twenty-two crosses the river; thence north six miles to the first standard parallel; west on first standard parallel to the range line; thence north on range line between twenty and twenty-one to the north line of five-twenty; thence west on said line to Pine creek; thence following Pine creek for a natural boundary to a point where said Pine creek crosses the range line between nineteen and twenty; thence north on said line to the south line of the Yakima Indian reservation; thence east along said line to the range line between twenty and twenty-one; thence north twelve miles; thence east two miles; thence north eighteen miles to the northwest corner of section four, township eleven, range twenty-one; thence east on township line to section one, township eleven, range twenty-three east; thence north on said line to the Columbia river; thence down the middle of the main channel of the Columbia to the point of beginning.

The committee's report was adopted with but three dissenting votes.

December 18th another county division meeting was held at Odd Fellows Hall, Sunnyside, of which F. H. Gloyd and H. E. Perrin were elected president and secretary, respectively. Forty delegates were present, representing Sunnyside, Prosser, Zillah, Kiona, Mabton, Alder Creek, Rattlesnake, Patterson and Klickitat. A committee of attorneys was appointed to draft a bill creating a new county with boundaries as outlined at the Prosser convention, and forward the same to the legislature. A committee of five persons was also named to prepare and circulate petitions.

At the last session of the legislature, that of 1903, Representative S. A. Wells, of Spokane county, chairman of the house committee on county organization, introduced a bill whose object was the creation of McKinley county out of the eastern portion of Yakima and Klickitat counties. The western boundary line of the new county passed within three miles of Zillah, an arrangement that did not meet the universal approval of those in the Sunnyside country, who wished to see that section preserved intact. Therefore, a serious dissension among the new county builders occurred, which aided the old county in its struggle against division at this time. The bill was defeated in the house.

The year 1902 was one of unqualified prosperity and progress for all classes. The hop crop especially was excellent, the prices were high, and, on the whole, the season was more favorable for this species of agriculture than any in a great number of years. The succeeding twelvemonth has also been one freighted with blessings for the people of Yakima county, but it is not necessary to narrate its story in any detail. Already the current of this review has been followed until it has led us out of the realm of history and into that of current events, and the happenings of recent months are too fresh in the memory to require narration here. From the time when the first adventurous cattle drovers entered its broad valleys until the present moment, the county's people have moved with unresting feet in the direction of progress. Misfortunes, hard times and isolation have been encountered, but their effect has been only to retard the speed of the forward march, never to call a halt. The success of the past gives earnest of the future, and the conviction can hardly be escaped that the Yakima county historian of a quarter of a century hence will have a tale to tell immeasurably more marvelous than can be written with truth at this date. Great as have been the achievements of the irrigation promoter and "intensive" farmer, the ambitions of the people have not yet begun to be satisfied. Splendid canals, miles in length and carrying fertility and verdure to thousands of acres of the quondam sun-scorched and sage-clad desert, are already accomplished facts, but they are small compared with those which the ambitions of the people have led them to project: the railroad is here, but it has not completely overcome the primeval isolation, and schemes for networking this and neighboring counties with electric and steam railways are in the air. The people have proven that they possess the ability to perform as well as to plan, and we may reasonably expect that a sufficient number of their bold projects will materialize to insure to the most populous county of central Washington and to its neighbors on every side a development comprehensive in scope, many-sided in character and high indeed in degree.

CHAPTER V.

POLITICAL.

The early political history of Yakima county is in a great degree veiled in obscurity, owing to the total loss of the county records for the years preceding 1882 through fire in that year. Consequently a table of election returns, nearly complete, compiled at the secretary of state's office, together with a few notes relating to early political events, is all that can be here given of the political history of that period. The vote in all instances has been copied directly from the records or published official proceedings.

Yakima county was called into existence as a political body by an act of the territorial legislature approved January 21, 1865. By this act, Charles Splawn, William Parker and J. H. Wilbur were appointed county commissioners; Gilbert Pell, sheriff; William Wright, auditor, and F. M. Thorp, treasurer. The county seat was temporarily located at the home of Auditor Wright. For judicial and legislative purposes the new county was attached to Stevens county. There is hardly a precinct to-day that does not contain more voters than did the county in 1865, at the time it was organized, but so isolated was the little Yakima river settlement from its seat of local government that the formation of a new and more convenient government was imperative. So far as can be learned, the officers named in the creating act accomplished little or nothing, being succeeded almost immediately by a new set of officers appointed by the governor, who visited Yakima in person. Charles A. Splawn became sheriff; J. W. Grant, auditor; E. W. Lyons, treasurer, and F. M. Thorp, C. P. Cooke and Alfred Henson, commissioners. All were Democrats, as were in fact a majority of the population. The county was too poor to erect a courthouse, so all official business was transacted at the home of Mr. Thorp in the Moxee. When it was necessary to hold court, the judge sat in the little log schoolhouse on the Thorp place.

June 3, 1867, was the date of the first election held in the county. It is interesting to note that the highest vote cast, that for delegate, was only forty-four, while the average was much lower. John P. Mattoon, then employed at the Yakima agency at Fort Simcoe, says that in 1867 he and seven others came down from the agency to James H. Henderson's place on the Ahtanum to vote. There were only nine or ten voters in the precinct. However, at the polls the reservation men were stopped by the election officers, who refused to allow them to vote for any officer except delegate on the ground that the reservation was in Klickitat county. Subsequently, says Mr. Mattoon, the sheriff-assessor attempted to collect taxes at the agency, whereupon those who were refused the privilege of voting for county officers refused the county their assistance in a financial way.

The vote was as follows: For delegate to congress, Frank Clark, Democrat, 25, Alvin Flanders, Republican, 19; joint councilman, A. G. Tripp, Republican, 17; joint representative, with Klickitat, F. M. Thorp, Democrat, 21, William Taylor, Republican, 17; district attorney, Frank Dugan, Democrat, 21, Sheldon Fargo, Republican, 8; probate judge, John Davis, Democrat, 27; county commissioners, Alfred Henson, G. W. L. Allen and Thomas Goodwin, Democrats, 23, 24 and 26 votes respectively; auditor, J. W. Grant, Democrat, 24; sheriff, Charles A. Splawn, Democrat, 22, Joseph Bowser, Independent, 2; assessor, John Lindsey, Democrat, 24; treasurer, E. W. Lyons, Democrat, 23; school superintendent, S. C. Taylor, Democrat, 23; coroner, Henry Davis, Democrat, 23.

The Democrats retained their control at the succeeding election, placing in office whomsoever they chose. Unfortunately, not a written record concerning this election can be found in either the county or state archives, except the canvass of the votes cast for delegate, which shows that Yakima county gave M. F. Moore, Democrat, 45 votes, and S. Garfield, Republican, 25 votes.

In the spring of 1868 F. M. Thorp and his family followed C. A. Splawn into the Kittitas valley. One of the results of Mr. Thorp's change of residence was the removal of the county seat to the home of C. P. Cooke, also living in the Moxee. There it remained until the election of 1870, when it was permanently located, at least for sixteen years, at Yakima City. There were four aspirants for the honor, namely, Selah, Flint's store, Kittitas valley and a place designated in the state records as "Mount Ottawa." How this name got into the records is unknown, as the oldest pioneers do not remember that Yakima City or any other point was ever known by this appellation. Mount Ottawa, or Yakima

City, received 89 votes, Flint's store 20, Selah 18 and Kittitas valley 3. That residents of this county were not favorably disposed toward early statehood for the territory may be inferred from the fact that the proposition to hold a constitutional convention received only 5 votes, while 97 were cast against it.

The vote cast at the election held June 6, 1870, is given below:

Delegate to congress, James D. Mix, Democrat, 71, S. Garfield, Republican, 69; prosecuting attorney, N. T. Caton, Democrat, 69; joint councilman, S. B. Curtis, Republican, 64, E. S. Joslyn, Democrat, 56; joint representative, with Klickitat, H. V. Harper, Democrat, 69, Henry D. Cook, Republican, 55; probate judge, Alfred Henson, Democrat, 65, A. M. Miller, Republican, 57; county commissioners, John Beck, George Taylor, C. P. Cooke, Democrats, 57, 68 and 75 votes respectively, P. S. Flint, A. W. Bull, J. B. Nelson, Republicans, 59, 64 and 48 votes respectively; auditor, G. W. Parish, Democrat, 58, H. M. Benton, Republican, 64; sheriff, G. W. Goodwin, Democrat, 58, Thomas Pierce, Republican, 67; treasurer, E. W. Lyons, Democrat, 65, J. P. Mattoon, Republican, 52; assessor, William Lindsey, Democrat, 65, Charles Harper, Republican, 60; surveyor, C. S. Irby, Democrat, 63; school superintendent, C. P. Cooke, Democrat, 66, Charles Reed, Republican, 55; coroner, P. Crosno, Democrat, 64, David Heaton, Republican, 56.

The election records for 1872 are also incomplete, the only returns found being as follows: Delegate to congress, S. Garfield, Republican, 129, O. B. McFadden, Democrat, 122; joint councilman, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 154, B. F. Shaw, Democrat, 74, G. Wyche, 9; joint representative, with Klickitat, C. P. Cooke, Democrat, 170, R. Whitney, Republican, 73, Cooke being elected; district attorney, T. J. Anders, Republican, 139, J. D. Mix, Democrat, 108. Of the county officers elected, it is reasonably certain that Charles Eaton, George S. Taylor and A. W. Bull were chosen commissioners, Thomas Pierce, sheriff, and J. P. Marks, school superintendent.

The first campaign of more than ordinary interest in Yakima county was that of 1874. In that year the struggle centered around the office of auditor, for which there were two candidates, H. M. Benton and Edward Whitson. Both were Republicans, Benton being the regular party nominee. The other faction of the Republican party, at the county convention held at Yakima City, avowed that segregation was the only means of escaping ring domination, and accordingly nominated a partial ticket, including Edward Whitson, a rising young lawyer whose home was in the Kittitas valley, for auditor. The new party called itself the People's party, which, however, is not to be confounded with the Populist organization of later years. Many Democrats allied themselves with the People's party during this election. The vote was as follows:

For delegate to congress, Orange Jacobs, Republican, 203, B. L. Sharpstein, Democrat, 82; joint councilman, B. F. Shaw, Democrat, 127, S. P. McDonald, Republican, 84, J. V. Odell, 1; representative, C. P. Cooke, Democrat, 186, D. J. Schnebly, Republican, 100; district attorney, J. V. Odell, Democrat, 129, T. J. Anders, Republican, 109; county commissioners, J. A. Flint, R. Wallace, People's party, 24 and 72 votes respectively, James Simmons, J. B. Dickerson, Republicans, 95 and 181 respectively, Charles Walker, P. J. Flint and C. H. Eaton, Democrats, 224, 209 and 38 votes respectively; sheriff, William Lewis, Republican, 127, L. L. Thorp, Democrat, 119; assessor, J. J. Burch, Democrat, 154; treasurer, T. M. Anslan, Republican, 89, E. P. Boyls, Democrat, 199; auditor, Edward Whitson, People's party, 179, H. M. Benton, Republican, 109; school superintendent, J. O. Clark, Republican, 167, T. S. Meade, Democrat, 113; probate judge, J. R. Filkin, Democrat, 187, J. W. Stevenson, People's party, 45, J. B. Nelson, Republican, 45; coroner, J. W. Allen, Republican, 271; surveyor, C. A. Wilcox, Democrat, 195; for constitutional convention, 22; against, 41.

From the following official summary of the election returns in 1876, the date of the election being November 7th, the candidates successful in the county may be determined:

For delegate to congress, Orange Jacobs, Republican, 169, John P. Judson, Democrat, 109; joint councilman, Levi Farnsworth, Republican, 212, H. Knapp, Democrat, 21, M. R. Hathaway, 10; prosecuting attorney, T. J. Anders, Republican, 140, N. T. Caton, Democrat, 83; representative, Edward Whitson, Republican, 133, S. T. Sterling, Democrat, 114, T. B. At this election C. P. Headley, Joseph Schanno, John R. Filkin, James Bates and J. B. Brush were elected justices of the peace, and W. P. Crosno, John Tigard, G. W. McGlothlin, David Roland and J. Houser, constables.

November 5th was the date of the 1878 election, the vote being as follows:

For delegate to congress, Thomas H. Brents, Republican, 212, N. T. Caton, Democrat, 208, showing that in national politics the county's population was quite evenly divided; brigadier-general, John H. Smith, Republican, 201, George W. Hunter, Democrat, 100; adjutant-general, A. Glovah, Republican, 201, J. R. Odell, Democrat, 99; commissary-general, D. W. Smith, Republican, 198, J. S. Filkin, Republican, 131, David Longmire, Democrat, 276, second district, R. N. Cannady, Republican, 168, A. A. Meade, Democrat, 244, third district, S. Chappell, Republican, 186, A. J. McDaniel, Democrat, 215; treasurer, A. J. Pratt, Republican, 237, J. A. Splawn, Democrat, 172; school superintendent, William Caps, Republican, 198, G. W. Parish, Democrat, 205; coroner, C. J. Taft, Republican, 194, A. J. McKinsey, Democrat, 210; surveyor, Levi Farnsworth, Republican, 302, scattering, 8; for constitution, 210, against, 90. J. W. Beck was elected justice of the peace in Yakima precinct, G. W. McGlothlin in Selah precinct, George Parish in West Kittitas, and F. M. Streamer in East Kittitas.

Beginning with 1878 the growth of the county's population was very rapid, as will be seen from the votes cast. In 1878 there were 420 votes cast for delegate; in 1880 there were 595, a gain of nearly 30 per cent. in two years. No unusual incidents marked the latter election, national issues overshadowing, even though the voters were denied a voice in national government. November 5th, the election was held, the vote cast on that day being as follows:

For delegate, Thomas Burke, Democrat, 284, Thomas H. Brents, Republican, 311; brigadier-general, James McAuliff, Democrat, 274, G. W. Tibbitts, Republican, 320; quartermaster-general, J. W. Bomer, Democrat, 274, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 315; commissary-general, James W. Hunt, Democrat, 270, A. K. Bush, Republican, 317; adjutant-general, F. Guttenberg, Democrat, 281, M. R. Hathaway, Republican, 313; member board of equalization, first district, George W. Goodwin, Democrat, 326, F. C. Frary, Republican, 260; joint councilman, William Bigham, Democrat, 270, J. W. Greden, Republican, 308; representative, George S. Taylor, Democrat, 315, John A. Shoudy, Republican, 259; prosecuting attorney, E. P. Boyls, Democrat, 234, D. P. Ballard, Republican, 332; probate judge, L. H. Brooks, Democrat, 298, D. W. Stair, Republican, 288; auditor, W. M. Ross, Democrat, 238, S. T. Munson, Republican, 354; sheriff and assessor, F. D. Schnebly, Democrat, 297, David Lesh, Republican, 284; treasurer, G. J. Gervais, Democrat, 296, G. W. A. Navarre, Republican, 365; sheep commissioner, Charles Longmire, Democrat, 278, M. Beeker, Republican, 311; coroner, C. Schnebly, Democrat, 266, C. J. Taft, Republican, 318.

On March 31, 1882, the county building at Yakima City was destroyed by fire, burning the archives which had been accumulating there for a decade and a half. Except a few odd and unimportant reports, every record was devoured by the flames, entailing a loss upon the county which can never be repaired. The county immediately began work upon a new and larger courthouse, which was completed in due time and which does service to-day.

At their meeting August 9, 1882, the county commissioners laid out the county into three commissioners' districts, as follows:

No. 1.—Commencing at a point at the mouth of the Ahtanum creek; thence running up said creek to its head, thence in a westerly course to the county line, thence north along said county line to a point due west from the summit of the dividing ridge between Wenas and Umptanum creeks, thence easterly to said dividing ridge, thence along said ridge in an easterly direction to the Yakima river, thence down said river to the place of beginning.

No. 2.—Commencing at a point where the north line of district No. 1 intersects the Yakima river near Squaw creek, thence up said creek to the summit of the mountain, thence in an easterly course to the head of Priest rapids on the Columbia river, thence up said river to the north boundary of Yakima county, thence west along said boundary line to a point due west of the dividing ridge between Wenas and Umptanum creeks, thence easterly to said dividing ridge, thence along said dividing ridge in an easterly course to the place of beginning.

ROUND-UP NEAR KIONA.

No. 3.—All of the county not included in districts No. 1 and No. 2.

At this same session of the county court grand jurors and petit jurors were drawn as follows: Grand, A. D. Eglin, J. C. Ellison, Daniel Fish, Robert Fleming, P. J. Flint, S. R. Geddis, Fish Canthorn, C. P. Cooke, L. L. Thorp, William Masters, David Murray, G. S. Taylor, William Liptrap, Joseph Barthelet, Joseph Bowser, T. Haley, J. H. Carpenter, R. M. Canady, L. Pool, Charles Harper, H. M. Bryant, J. Jensen, J. P. Mattoon, W. M. Ross; petit, C. B. Reed, K. Bales, Mat. Barthelet, G. W. Cary, C. C. Coleman, C. M. Duncan, James Eglin, S. S. Foster, T. B. Goodwin, D. Heaton, A. J. Hodges, John Miller, Jock Morgan, John Nelson, Thomas Kelly, Charles McGlothlen, Charles Longmire, A. J. Burge, E. E. Burge, E. E. Butler, N. Hecox, D. Sinclair, J. P. Marks, W. L. Stabler, Josiah Wiley, J. W. Masters.

In 1882 the county was divided into twelve precincts, which, together with the name of the voting place in each, are herewith given: Horn, James Baxster's residence; Parker, schoolhouse; Yakima City, courthouse; Ahtanum, Marks' schoolhouse; Cowiche, old schoolhouse; Wenas, schoolhouse; West Kittitas, Packwood schoolhouse; East Kittitas, Ellensburg; Peshastin, Lockwood & Cooper's; Simcoe, agency; Alder creek, Beckner's schoolhouse; Moxee, Charles Splawn's house. The only record of the election of 1882 which we have found shows only the vote for territorial officers. By these returns Thomas Burke, Democratic candidate for delegate, is credited with 301 votes, Thomas H. Brents, Republican, with 478; Samuel Vinson, Democrat, for brigadier-general, 358, M. A. McPherson, Republican, 400; W. A. Wash, Democrat, for commissary-general, 350, C. B. Hopkins, Republican, 447; D. W. Bomer, Democrat, for quartermaster-general, 327, J. H. Smith, Republican, 459; L. S. Debeau, Democrat, for adjutant-general, 322, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 457; D. P. Ballard, Democrat, for district attorney, 264, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 430. The legislative campaign was waged on the issue of division, the Kittitas valley deeming itself now strong enough to support a local government and demanding segregation. John A. Shoudy, of Ellensburg, received the Republican nomination and was elected. In the fall of 1883 he carried out his pledge and succeeded in securing the creation of Kittitas county. The county officers elected to serve Yakima in 1882 were: Commissioners, J. W. Masters, David Murray, S. R. Geddis, Republicans; sheriff-assessor, J. J. Tyler, Republican; treasurer, John A. Splawn, Democrat; probate judge, I. A. Navarre, Republican; auditor, S. T. Munson, Republican; surveyor, T. H. Look, Republican; sheep commissioner, A. D. Eglin, Republican.

Commissioner Goodwin resigned his office

February 7, 1884, and S. R. Geddis was taken outside of Yakima county by the creation of Kittitas county. They were succeeded by M. M. Adams and H. H. Allen.

The whole territory was aroused in 1884 by an agitation of no small proportions which had for its purpose the cancellation of unearned Northern Pacific land grants. After a vexatious delay of many years the Northern Pacific had, in 1883, commenced work upon its Cascade branch, but there were still many hundreds of miles of unbuilt road for which an imperial domain had been granted the company. Stirred by thoughts that a monstrous wrong was being inflicted upon the people by the Northern Pacific corporation, a powerful anti-railroad party sprang up, which seriously upset party lines in 1884 and in 1886 also. In Yakima county J. M. Adams, editor of the Signal and afterwards editor of the Spokane Review, led the Anti-Monopoly party. Upon the occasion of the Republican county convention, held August 23d at Yakima City, for the purpose of nominating delegates to the territorial convention, a bloody affray was narrowly averted. One wing of the party wished to nominate Anti-Monopolist delegates; the other refused, whereupon hot words ensued. The prompt services of Sheriff Tyler prevented a physical collision, and the two factions finally agreed to occupy the hall in peace and each nominate a ticket. At the territorial convention contests were inaugurated by the two factions for seats, which resulted in the defeat of the Anti-Monopolist delegates. The Democrats nominated Voorhees upon an Anti-Monopolist ticket. Of the 41,858 votes cast for delegate that fall, Voorhees, Democrat, received 20,995, Armstrong, Republican, 20,747, scattering, 16, giving the office to Voorhees. Of this vote, fully 10,000 were cast by women. In Yakima county the vote cast was as follows:

For delegate, J. M. Armstrong, Republican, 448, C. S. Voorhees, Democrat, 582; brigadier-general, W. M. Peel, Republican, 489, J. McAuliff, Democrat, 541; adjutant-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 496, William E. Anderson, Democrat, 536; quartermaster-general, D. B. Jackson, Republican, 491, Frank Harris, Democrat, 540; commissary-general, H. W. Livingston, Republican, 488, Simon Berg, Democrat, 540; prosecuting attorney, S. Smith, Republican, 326, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 694; joint councilman, John A. Shoudy, of Kittitas, Republican, 316, J. B. Reavis, of Yakima, Democrat, 682, Reavis being elected; joint representative, W. L. Stabler, Yakima, Republican, 466, C. P. Cooke, Kittitas, Democrat, 567, Cooke being elected; sheriff, J. J. Tyler, Republican, 521, J. H. Conrad, Democrat, 485; auditor, S. T. Munson, Republican, 560, J. H. Morrison, Democrat, 461; treasurer, Charles E. McEwen, Republican, 370, J. A. Splawn, Democrat, 648; probate judge, Edward Prunyn, Republican, 455, L. H. Brooks, Democrat, 566; school superintendent, Ella S. Stair, Republican, 505, W. F. Jones, Democrat, 508; surveyor, I. A. Navarre, Republican, 389, C. F. Reardon, Democrat, 619. Mr. Munson, auditor-elect, died before taking office, and the vacancy was filled by Kate W. Feuerbach, appointed by the board of county commissioners. John Cowan was appointed sheep commissioner by the board in February, 1885. The vote for county commissioners is missing, but the records show that John M. Young, L. N. Rice and P. J. Flint were elected. Young resigned in May, 1885, and was succeeded by Ira Van Ant Werp; Rice resigned in August, 1886, and was succeeded by John W. Brice. In 1886, also, Sheriff Tyler, resigned, was succeeded by F. T. Parker, and Ross Elliot was appointed surveyor to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Navarre.

By 1886 the anti-railroad agitation had nearly died out, though the effect of it upon Yakima county politics was very noticeable for many years afterward, owing principally to the fact that it was here the movement really started and here it was the strongest. Local politics were considerably stirred by the entrance into the field of a number of independent or factional candidates; also by the hard feelings engendered by the removal of the county seat from Yakima City to North Yakima in that year. The removal was accomplished by an act of the legislature, approved by Governor Squires January 9th. The official vote was as follows:

For delegate to congress, C. M. Bradshaw, Republican, 359, C. S. Voorhees, Democrat, 667; brigadier-general, George D. Hill, Republican, 417; adjutant-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 414; quartermaster-general, D. G. Lovell, Republican, 417; commissary-general, W. C. Ellsworth, Republican, 417; joint councilman, S. A. Wells, Republican, 386, C. P. Cooke, Democrat, 633, elected; representative, T. J. V. Clarke, Republican, 405, G. W. Goodwin, Democrat, 590; prosecuting attorney, C. B. Graves, Republican, 408, H. J. Snively, Democrat, 615; sheriff, D. E. Lesh, Republican, 471, J. H. Conrad, Democrat, 418, F. T. Parker, Independent, 130; auditor, W. F. Prosser, Republican, 549, Oscar Vansyckle, Democrat, 465; treasurer, W. C. Chapman, Republican, 294, J. A. Splawn, Democrat, 675, J. C. McCrimmon, Independent, 55; probate judge, S. C. Morford, Republican, 451, J. G. Evans, Democrat, 435, J. W. Beck, Independent, 132; school superintendent, Mrs. M. B. Curtis, Republican, 547, Annie Matton, Democrat, 446; surveyor, J. A. Leach, Republican, 547, P. D. Brooke, Democrat, 474, scattering, 17; coroner, C. J. Taft, Republican, 482, Thomas McCausland, Democrat, 509; commissioners, first district, W. H. Lipstrap, Democrat, 615, J. F. Sinclair, Republican, 403, second district, Fenn B. Woodcock, Republican, 491, J. A. Stephenson, Democrat, 522; third district, F. K. Beard, Democrat, 512, A. C. Ketchum, Republican, 509.

An election held June 28, 1886, for the purpose of deciding for or against local prohibition, resulted in a large affirmative vote being given in the precincts of North Yakima, Yakima, Wenas and White. No returns from other precincts are given.

There were no local issues of importance in 1888, national issues predominating in view of the fact that early statehood was expected and the territory wished to make a strong showing for the benefit of the national parties. The territory went Republican by a large majority. The officers elected to serve Yakima county may be seen from the election returns which follow:

For delegate, John B. Allen, Republican, 461, C. S. Voorhees, Democrat, 398, Roger S. Greene, Prohibitionist, 51; brigadier-general, A. P. Curry, Republican, 442, J. J. Hunt, Democrat, 405, S. B. Voorman, Prohibitionist, 64; adjutant-general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 439, H. Butler, Democrat, 405, H. Brown, Prohibitionist, 65; prosecuting attorney, W. J. Milroy, Republican, 390, H. J. Snively, Democrat, 483; joint councilman, J. M. Snow, Republican, 439 (elected), Clay Fruit, Democrat, 408, H. C. Walters, Independent, 60; representative, I. A. Power, Republican, 398, Daniel Gabe, Democrat, 352, John W. Brice, Independent, 158; probate judge, D. W. Stair, Republican, 425, L. C. Parrish, Democrat, 397, J. W. Beck, Independent, 87; sheriff, D. E. Lesh, Republican, 472, Joseph Stephenson, Democrat, 377, F. T. Parker, Independent, 60; auditor, Mat. Bartholet, Democrat, 456, W. F. Prosser, Republican, 386, J. B. Chapman, Independent, 67; treasurer, George W. Cary, Democrat, 441, Robert Dunn, Republican, 313, James Stewart, Independent, 155; surveyor, James Hall, Republican, 483, T. H. Look, Democrat, 413; superintendent of schools, Hilda Engdahl, Democrat, 434, O. Vaughn, Republican, 429; sheep commissioner, Walter Griffith, Republican, 502, John Witzel, Democrat, 406; coroner, J. O. Clark, Republican, 432, Thomas McCausland, Democrat, 404; commissioners, first district, John Cleman, Republican, 437, E. W. R. Taylor, Democrat, 394, G. S. Taylor, Independent, 79; second district, H. D. Winchester, Republican, 425, opposition candidate and vote not given; third district, J. M. Brown, Republican, 415, H. W. Creason, Democrat, 415, M. B. Curtis, Independent, 78. Brown was awarded the office of commissioner.

With statehood in 1889 came an additional election, which was of especial interest to residents of Yakima county because of the candidacy of their metropolis for the honor of being state capital. As this matter is discussed fully elsewhere, it will not be necessary to take it up in this chapter. One of Yakima's honored citizens, Colonel L. S. Howlett, was a very prominent candidate before the Republican state convention at Walla Walla for governor. He was offered the nomination for lieutenant-governor, but declined. The state went Republican by from 9,000 to 11,000 majority. The vote in this county follows:

For congressman, J. L. Wilson, Republican, 581, Thomas Griffiths, Democrat, 494; governor, E. P. Ferry, Republican, 537, Eugene Semple, Democrat, 519; lieutenant-governor, Charles E. Laughton, Republican, 558, L. H. Plattor, Democrat, 485; secretary of state, Allen Weir, Republican, 539, W. H. Whittlesey, Democrat, 530; auditor, Thomas M. Reed, Republican, 578, J. M. Murphy, Democrat, 485; treasurer, A. A. Lindsey, Republican, 575, M. Kaufman, Democrat, 494; attorney-general, W. C. Jones, Republican, 518, H. J. Snively, Democrat, 547; superintendent of public instruction, R. B. Bryan, Republican, 558, J. H. Morgan, Democrat, 510; land commissioner, W. F. Forrest, Republican, 583, — Goodell, Democrat, 487; supreme judges, R. O. Dunbar, Republican, 584, W. D. White, Democrat, 481, T. L. Stiles, Republican, 503, J. L. Sharpstein, Democrat, 492, E. P. Hoyt, Republican, 563, J. P. Judson, Democrat, 482, T. J. Anders, Republican, 577, J. B. Reavis, Democrat, 483, E. D. Scott, Republican, 568, Frank Ganahl, Democrat, 482; superior judge, C. B. Graves, Republican, 620, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, 425; joint senator, J. M. Snow, Republican (elected), 538, R. M. Starr, Democrat, 523; representative, John Cleman, Republican, 544, David Longmire, Democrat, 523; clerk of the court, Richard Strobach, Democrat, 491, Dudley Eshelman, Republican, 552; constitution, for, 845, against, 115; woman suffrage, for, 356, against, 585; prohibition, for, 337, against, 589; state capital, North Yakima, 1,045, scattering, 27. The total state vote received by North Yakima was 14,707, by Ellensburg, 12,833, and by Olympia, 25,488. The constitution was adopted by a vote of 38,394 to 11,895. The woman suffrage article received 16,855 affirmative votes and 34,342 negative votes. Prohibition was defeated by a vote of 31,881 to 19,241.

The first political club organized in the county of which we have any record was formed at the city hall in North Yakima, August 19, 1890, the following officers being chosen: President, E. F. Young; vice-presidents, W. L. Jones, J. K. Ward, J. J. Chambers, C. W. Henry and Wallace Wiley; secretary, M. H. Ellis; treasurer, F. B. Lippincott; executive committee, F. M. Spain, R. B. Milroy and John Reed. The club was Republican in political faith.

The Republican county convention met at North Yakima, in the courthouse, September 20th following. A week later the Democrats met at the same place. In strong contrast to the platform of the Republicans, the Democrats adopted a platform favoring the making of all money issued full legal tender for all debts; favoring the proposition that the government loan money at a rate not exceeding two per centum per annum; condemning the donation of large tracts of public territory to private corporations; favoring the choosing of president, vice-president, senators and all other federal officers, where practicable, by direct vote of the people; demanding that old soldiers be paid the difference between the depreciated currency paid them and the price of gold when so paid; upholding the doctrine of government ownership of all public utilities, and asking for a readjustment of railroad rates in the state of Washington. The capital question not having been decided in 1889, the voters again voted for their favorite cities in 1890, Olympia being chosen by a vote of 37,413 as against 7,722 for Ellensburg, and 6,276 for North Yakima. The vote cast in this county in 1890 was:

For congressman, Robert Abernathy, Prohibitionist, 40, John L. Wilson, Republican, 455, Thomas Carroll, Democrat, 438; joint senator, with Klickitat, J. T. Eshelman, Democrat, 574, D. W. Pierce, Republican, 468, Eshelman being elected; representative, H. J. Snively, Democrat, 544, B. F. Young, Republican, 515; auditor, Matthew Bartholet, Democrat, 526, Myron H. Ellis, Republican, 529; sheriff, David Longmire, Democrat, 417, D. W. Simmons, Republican, 644; clerk, F. D. Eshelman, Democrat, 579, D. W. Stair, Republican, 466; treasurer, G. W. Cary, Democrat, 475, G. O. Nevin, Republican, 561; assessor, George Hull, Democrat, 495, E. A. Shannafelt, Republican, 548; attorney, L. C. Parrish, Democrat, 478, J. A. Rochford, Republican, 566; superintendent of schools, J. G. Lawrence, Republican, 647, Hilda Engdahl-Meystre, Democrat, 392; surveyor, J. T. Kingsbury, Democrat, 425, W. H. Redman, Republican, 620; coroner, J. Jay Chambers, Republican, 538, S. W. Rodman, Democrat, 490; commissioners, first district, H. W. Creason, Democrat, 494, F. Kandle, Republican, 536, second district, John McPhee, Democrat, 430, John Reed, Republican, 448, third district, Nelson Rich, Republican, 464, Joseph Stephenson, Democrat, 539; sheep commissioner, S. J. Cameron, Republican, 523, John Cowan, Democrat, 471; state capital, North Yakima, 949, Olympia, 30, Ellensburg, 14.

A state organization of the Knights of Labor was effected at North Yakima, Friday, July 17, 1891. Besides the members of this order, there had gathered in the city representatives of the Farmers' Alliance, Good Templars, trade unions and kindred associations, who assembled the following afternoon with the Knights at Switzer's Hall and organized the People's party of Washington. Forty-one delegates presented credentials. Con Lynch, of King county, was chosen chairman, and R. Bridges, secretary. The Cincinnati platform was indorsed in the platform adopted by the party. E. B. Sutton, representing the state Temperance Alliance, endeavored to secure the adoption of woman suffrage and prohibition planks, but failed. Thus was given formal birth to the powerful third party in this state—a party that was destined to give its two older rivals a battle royal for supremacy.

The People's party was formally organized in Yakima county, Wednesday, July 13th, by delegates representing the Farmers' Alliance, the Industrial Union, the Progressive Alliance and the Knights of Labor. The county convention was held at the same time. In its platform, the party indorsed and adopted the Omaha platform, and, among other things, protested against the "frivolous and false protests of the Northern Pacific Land Company in its efforts to defraud bona fide settlers out of their rights." The Republicans held their county convention Saturday, July 30th, and the Democrats theirs August 13th. The Democratic nominee for governor this year was Honorable H. J. Snively, one of Yakima's most highly respected and popular citizens, whose nomination and campaign were an honor both to his home and to himself. But the Republican majority in the state was too great to be overcome by any Democrat, and Yakima's candidate went down to defeat with his associates. The official canvass of votes in this county shows the returns to be as follows:

For president, Harrison, 630, Cleveland, 502, Weaver, 375; members of congress, John L. Wilson, William H. Doolittle, Republicans, 602 and 601 respectively, Thomas Carroll, James A. Munday, Democrats, 539 and 518 votes respectively, J. C. Van Patton, M. F. Knox, Populists, 368 and 361 votes respectively; governor, John H. McGraw, Republican, 504, Henry J. Snively, Democrat, 604, C. W. Young, Populist, 405, Roger S. Greene, Prohibitionist, 23; lieutenant-governor, Frank H. Luce, Republican, 571, Henry C. Willison, Democrat, 513, C. P. Twiss, Populist, 365, D. G. Strong, Prohibitionist, 21; secretary of state, James H. Price, Republican, 605, John McReavy, Democrat, 489, Lyman Wood, Populist, 366, W. H. Gilstrap, Prohibitionist, 16; auditor, Laban R. Grimes, Republican, 606, Samuel Bass, Democrat, 482, Charles C. Rudolph, Populist, 361, Christian Carlson, Prohibitionist, 14; treasurer, O. A. Two years later the Republicans maintained their lead in county and state politics, electing every officer in the county but two. Although the Populists made a strong fight, they failed to elect a single one of their nominees. North Yakima was honored by the holding of two state conventions at that place, the People's party convention on June 28th, and the Democratic convention September 20th. Colonel L. S. Howlett, of North Yakima, was a much-talked-of candidate for the Republican nomination for congress in the eastern district and was very strongly supported by a host of admirers. The nomination, however, went to another section, Samuel Hyde, of Spokane, capturing the prize.

The Republican county convention was held September 1st and was a harmonious gathering throughout. Nine days later the Populists assembled and placed a ticket in the field. The Democrats met September 22d. As sounding the keynote of the local campaign the following excerpt is taken from the platform adopted by the Democratic party:

"We denounce the Republican officials of Yakima county from the highest to the lowest for their lavish and profligate expenditure of the people's money. When the present Republican officials came into power there was sufficient money in the treasury to redeem all outstanding warrants, leaving a considerable surplus to be drawn on in case of emergency. That emergency soon came in the form of a Republican landslide at the last election, and with it the greatest curse that ever befell the people of Yakima county. Notwithstanding the surplus left by a Democratic board of county commissioners and notwithstanding there became delinquent on April 1, 1894, one of the most enormous tax levies ever imposed on a free people in a free country in a time of peace, there are to-day warrants outstanding against the county aggregating approximately $70,000. The county is in debt in excess of five per cent. of the assessed valuation of all its property for county purposes alone, and that debt is still increasing. When the taxpayer assumes his portion of the indebtedness of the state and of the municipality and school district in which he may reside, in all of his property he has scarcely an equity of redemption left."

The Democrats promised a reform if allowed to control the county's affairs.

The vote: For congressman, W. H. Doolittle, Republican, 860, Benjamin F. Heuston, Democrat, 484, Samuel Hyde, Republican, 849, N. T. Caton, Democrat, 487, W. P. C. Adams, Populist, 619, J. C. Van Patton, Populist, 611; supreme judges, R. O. Dunbar, M. J. Gordon, Republicans, 933 and 900 votes respectively, John L. Sharpstein, Thomas N. Allen, Democrats, 515 and 534 votes respectively, H. L. Forrest, J. M. Ready, Populists, 603 and 595 votes respectively; joint senator, Yakima and Klickitat counties, D. E. Lesh, Republican, 918, George S. Taylor, Democrat, 913, Lesh being elected; representative, Robert E. Milroy, Republican, 776, E. F. Benson, Democrat, 684, J. W. Brice, Populist, 677; prosecuting attorney, Glen G. Dudley, Republican, 885, Thomas M. Vance, Democrat, 557, C. D. Hurane, Populist, 710; clerk, J. M. Brown, Republican, 863, Henry W. Creason, Democrat, 622, A. E. Larson, Populist, 639; auditor, F. C. Hall, Republican, 838, W. J. Roaf, Democrat, 713, J. H. Needham, Populist, 508; treasurer, J. J. Carpenter, Republican, 771, Matthew Bartholet, Democrat, 895, William Lee, Sr., Populist, 513; sheriff, Lincoln Dilley, Republican, 838, H. H. Allen, Democrat, 804, James Stuart, Populist, 587; assessor, O. V. Carpenter, Republican, 989, George H. Hull, Democrat, 569, James A. Beck, Populist, 585; superintendent of schools, J. F. Brown, Republican, 799, E. P. Greene, Democrat, 677, B. Ingram, Populist, 658; surveyor, George Mills, Republican, 834, W. A. Warren, Democrat, 688; sheep commissioner, Richard Sisk, Republican, 975, Andrew Slavin, Democrat, 517, James White, Populist, 615; commissioners, second district, H. D. Winchester, Republican, 261, Joseph Stephenson, Democrat, 290, Walter Griffith, Populist, 224, third district, Nelson Rich, Republican, 363, E. W. R. Taylor, Democrat, 184, D. M. Angus, Populist, 166; coroner, Dr. E. E. Heg, Republican, 858, Dr. G. P. Wintermute, Democrat, 534, Dr. W. W. McCormick, Populist, 703.

The silver movement reached Yakima county in strong force in 1895, resulting in the organization of a bimetallic league at Mason's Opera House, North Yakima, March 23d. Fully one hundred Democrats, Republicans and Populists answered the call for a mass-meeting. O. A. Fechter was elected chairman and William Ker secretary. A set of resolutions was adopted, the principal one of which reads as follows: "Fifth, without forsaking our political convictions on subjects other than the money question, we pledge ourselves to subordinate these for the time being, to fight the battle for the remonetization of silver; and to vote for no candidate for the federal legislature who is not clearly pledged to such remonetization; and should the National Bimetallic party be formed, nominate its candidate and enter on a campaign, we pledge ourselves to support such candidates."

The brilliant campaign of 1896 took Washington from the Republican column and placed it by a majority of more than 12,000 votes in the Silver ranks, a fusion of all the white metal supporters being effected. Bryan received 51,857 votes, McKinley, 39,244, Palmer, 1,446, and Levering, 737. Rogers, Fusionist, was elected over Sullian, by a majority of 12,800, to the governorship. There is no need to go into the details of this historic campaign, as they have been impressed indelibly upon the minds of the American people. It is sufficient to say that local issues were almost entirely lost sight of, that a host of the country's most eloquent orators held vast audiences spellbound by their pleadings, that even the school children carried the great issues into schoolroom and lyceum and there debated them with the earnestness of veterans, that party affiliations were dissolved when it came to the currency question, that political literature was made use of to an extent not theretofore even approximated, and that not only all America, but the whole world, became intensely interested in the spectacle of seventy millions of free people striving to successfully solve a vexatious and momentous problem of government.

In Yakima county the Fusionists, composed of the Democrats, Silver Republicans and Populists, carried everything. Their convention was held Monday, August 10th, at North Yakima, where, in fact, the other parties held their conventions also. The Republicans met Saturday, August 22d; the Prohibitionists assembled about the same time and placed a ticket in the field. From the vote given herewith, an idea of the relative strength of the different parties may be gained:

For president, McKinley, 931, Bryan, 1,197, Palmer, 45; congressman, S. C. Hyde, W. H. Doolittle, Republicans, 925 and 918 votes respectively, James H. Lewis, William C. Jones, Fusionists, 1,236 each, C. A. Salyer, Martin Olsen, Prohibitionists, 21 and 15 votes respectively, Charles E. Mix, Nationalist, 2; governor, P. C. Sullivan, Republican, 908, John R. Rogers, Fusionist, 1,246, R. E. Dunlap, Prohibitionist, 25; lieutenant-governor, John W. Arasmith, Republican, 930, Thurston Daniels, Fusionist, 1,219, T. A. Shorthill, Prohibitionist, 24; supreme judge, John P. Hoyt, Republican, 913, James B. Reavis, Fusionist, 1,243, E. M. Livermore, Prohibitionist, 23; secretary of state, James H. Price, Republican, 946, Will D. Jenkins, Fusionist, 1,210, C. L. Haggard, Prohibitionist, 22; treasurer, J. A. Kellogg, Republican, 935, C. W. Young, Fusionist, 1,222, John Robin, Prohibitionist, 22; auditor, J. E. Frost, Republican, 942, Neal Cheetham, Fusionist, 1,215, C. C. Gridley, Prohibitionist, 19; attorney-general, E. W. Ross, Republican, 929, Patrick Henry Winston, Fusionist, 1,226, Everett Smith, Prohibitionist, 21; superintendent of public instruction, C. L. Brunton, Republican, 933, Frank J. Browne, Fusionist, 1,221, C. E. Newberry, Prohibitionist, 21; state printer, O. C. White, Republican, 940, Groin Hicks, Fusionist, 1,211, Horner L. Bull, Prohibitionist, 25; superior judge, Carroll B. Graves, Republican, 927, John B. Davidson, Fusionist, 1,234; representative, D. W. Simmons, Republican, 944, H. D. Jory, Fusionist, 1,190, Robert Perry, Prohibitionist, 29; sheriff, H. L. Tucker, Republican, 1,049, A. J. Shaw, Fusionist, 1,139, George H. Glazier, Prohibitionist, 13; clerk, William Burgess, Republican, 895, J. R. Coe, Fusionist, 1,264, Charles W. Benson, Prohibitionist, 21; auditor, F. C. Hall, Republican, 962, A. B. Flint, Fusionist, 1,214; treasurer, James J. Wiley, Republican, 930, Matthew Bartholet, Fusionist, 1,244, W. H. H. Corey, Prohibitionist 17; prosecuting attorney, Ira P. Englehart, Republican, 1,022, Vestal Snyder, Fusionist, 2,157; assessor, A. C. Walker, Republican, 939, J. L. Lasswell, Fusionist, 1,220, Prohibitionist, 14; superintendent of schools, E. M. Douglass, Republican, 986, F. H. Plumb, Fusionist, 1,184; commissioners, first district, William Rowe, Republican, 913, Charles Carpenter, Fusionist, 1,244, Charles R. Harris, Prohibitionist, 20, third district, Nelson Rich, Republican, 997, W. B. Mathews, Fusionist, 1,171; surveyor, Sydney

Arnold, Republican, 950, H. F. Marble, Fusionist, 1,193, John L. Stackhouse, Prohibitionist, 29; coroner, J. A. Taggard, Republican, 956, Lewis Ker, Fusionist, 1,193, Nathan W. Blood, Prohibitionist, 25; sheep commissioner, Charles Porter, Republican, 946, R. Marrs, Fusionist, 1,200, Myron N. Knuppenberg, Prohibitionist, 27.

Silver was again the main issue in 1898, the bimetallic forces still remaining together under the name of the People's party as in 1896. In contrast to the previous campaign, however, both state and county went strongly Republican, the Fusionists securing but one office in the county, that of superintendent of schools. The Fusion convention was held at Mason's Opera House, North Yakima, September 3d; the Republicans assembled at the courthouse a week later. The election passed off quietly, the following vote being cast:

For congressman, Wesley L. Jones, North Yakima, Francis W. Cushman, Republicans, 1,096 and 978 votes respectively, James Hamilton Lewis, William C. Jones, Fusionists, 927 and 857 votes respectively, Walter Walker, M. A. Hamilton, Socialist Labor, 9 and 12 votes respectively, A. C. Dicknison, C. L. Haggard, Prohibitionists, 25 and 22 votes respectively; justices supreme court, T. J. Anders, Mark A. Fullerton, Republicans, 1,019 and 1,005 votes respectively, Benjamin F. Heuston, Melvin M. Godman, Fusionists, 897 and 888 votes respectively, Thomas Young, Thomas Lowry, Socialists, 15 and 8 votes respectively; joint senator, with Klickitat, George H. Baker, Republican, 1,024 (elected), N. B. Brooks, Fusionist, 905; representative, Ira P. Englehart, Republican, 1,105, F. H. Colby, Fusionist, 826; sheriff, H. L. Tucker, Republican 985, A. J. Shaw, Fusionist, 913, Jock Morgan, Independent, 75; clerk, George Allen, Republican, 975, James R. Coe, Fusionist, 969; auditor, E. E. Kelson, Republican, 982, A. B. Flint, Fusionist, 970; treasurer, W. B. Dudley, Republican, 990, C. R. Donovan, Fusionist, 957; prosecuting attorney, John J. Rudkin, Republican, 1,025, Vestal Snyder, Fusionist, 910; assessor, Robert Scott, Republican, 1,054, J. L. Lasswell, Fusionist, 893; commissioners, first district, Frank Horsley, Republican, 1,075, J. P. McCafferty, Fusionist, 864, second district, A. D. Eglin, Republican, 994, Stephen Schreiner, Fusionist, 916; superintendent of schools, J. M. Richardson, Republican, 954, F. H. Plumb, Fusionist, 987; surveyor, Sydney Arnold, Republican, 902, H. F. Marble, Fusionist, 930; coroner, David Rosser, Republican, 1,069, Lewis Ker, Fusionist, 864; single tax amendment to constitution, yes, 347, no, 724; woman suffrage amendment, yes, 532, no, 542.

As will be seen from the foregoing, Wesley L. Jones, of North Yakima, was elected as one of Washington's representatives in congress. Mr

Jones' election to such an eminent position and his re-election in 1900 and 1902 may justly be considered a high testimonial to the man and a most pleasing recognition of his home county and city. In private life Mr. Jones is a successful attorney-at-law.

Although the campaign of 1900 was a most important as well as interesting one, it did not become so completely absorbing as that of 1896. The silver question was relegated to a secondary place, the first being given to our foreign policy. As is usually the case, local issues were driven into the background by national issues. The Republicans held their county convention at North Yakima August 11th. A week later the Fusionists held theirs. The vote cast on November 6th was as follows:

For president, McKinley, 1,487, Bryan, 1,051, Woolley, 37; congressmen, Wesley L. Jones, Francis W. Cushman, Republicans, 1,565 and 1,482 votes respectively, F. C. Robertson, J. T. Ronald, Fusionists, 1,036 and 1,024 votes respectively, Guy Posson, J. A. Adams, Prohibitionists, 41 and 37 votes respectively, Walter Walker, Christian F. Larsen, Socialist Laborites, 12 and 10 votes respectively, William Hogan, Hermon F. Titus, Social Democrats, 61 votes each; supreme judges, Wallace Mount, R. O. Vance, Fusionist, 1,128, Ovid A. Byers, Prohibitionist, 44, John Ellis, Socialist Laborite, 14, David W. Phipps, Social Democrat, 63; superintendent of public instruction, R. B. Bryan, Republican, 1,444, Frank J. Browne, Fusionist, 1,062, A. H. Sherwood, Prohibitionist, 51, Raymond Bland, Socialist Laborite, 17, John A. Kingsbury, Social Democrat, 86; commissioner of public lands, Stephen A. Callvert, Republican, 1,455, O. R. Holcomb, Fusionist, 1,069, J. C. McKinley, Prohibitionist, 50, W. L. Noon, Socialist Laborite, 17, Jerome S. Austin, Social Democrat, 64; representative nineteenth district, Nelson Rich, Republican, 1,400, A. J. Splawn, Fusionist, 1,216; judge superior court, Yakima, Kittitas and Franklin counties, Frank H. Rudkin, Republican, 1,474, John B. Davidson, Fusionist, 1,120; sheriff, H. L. Tucker, Republican, 1,415, A. J. Shaw, Fusionist, 1,223; clerk, G. L. Allen, Republican, 1,538, A. F. Snelling, Fusionist, 1,054; auditor, E. E. Kelso, Republican, 1,557, D. L. Druse, Fusionist, 1,057; treasurer, W. B. Dudley, Republican, 1,493, E. W. R. Taylor, Fusionist, 1,122; prosecuting attorney, W. P. Gutrie, Republican, 1,484, E. B. Preble, Fusionist, 1,130; assessor, Robert Scott, Republican, 1,521, I. B. Taylor, Fusionist, 1,086; superintendent of schools, S. A. Dickey, Republican, 1,324, Carrie S. Young, Fusionist, 1,299; commissioners, second district, W. I. Lince, Republican, 1,428, H. D. Winchester, Fusionist, 1,176, third district, W. L. Dimmick, Republican, 1,489, W. B. Mathews, Fusionist, 1,112; surveyor, J. M. Hall, Republican, 1,651, scattering, 3; coroner, David Rosser, Republican, 1,453, C. T. Dulin, Fusionist, 1,143; county bonds, for issuing, 770, against, 575.

A feature of the last campaign, that of 1902, was the strength the Socialist party developed in this county, though they neither defeated nor elected any one. The office of state senator was the center of the struggle, the Democrats concentrating their strength upon that office and the office of sheriff, with successful results in each instance. As was to be expected, the two great parties almost completely absorbed the old Populist party, whose brilliant career is now a matter of history. Although passed away in name, this party has left an impression upon the present political condition of the nation which can be easily discerned, notably in the increasing demand for public ownership and control of public utilities. Washington is considered a Republican state, and Yakima county, judging by the vote in 1902, is certainly strongly Republican where national policies are concerned.

The Republicans held their county convention August 23d at North Yakima, being followed a week later by the Socialists, who nominated a full ticket. The Democrats met September 13th at the same place. A feature of their platform was an unqualified declaration opposing the pasturage of sheep in the forest reserves situated in the watershed of the Yakima river, or the leasing of any part of said reserves to sheep men. The Prohibitionists held their convention October 1st. Below is given the official canvass of the vote cast in the county:

For congressmen, Wesley L. Jones, of North Yakima, Francis W. Cushman, William E. Humphrey, Republicans, 1,919, 1,772 and 1,748 votes respectively, George F. Cotterill, O. R. Holcomb, Frank B. Cole, Democrats, 932, 942 and 943 votes respectively, A. H. Sherwood, W. J. McKean, O. L. Fowler, Prohibitionists, 60, 61 and 64 votes respectively, J. H. C. Scurlock, D. Burgess, George W. Scott, Socialists, 173, 178 and 180 votes respectively; supreme court judges, Hiram E. Hadley, Republican, 1,705, James B. Reavis, Democrat, 1,010, Thomas Neill, Socialist, 181; state senator, Ira P. Harvey, Prohibitionist, 78, James Kesling, Socialist, 179.

CHAPTER VI.

CITIES AND TOWNS.

NORTH YAKIMA.

While there is always rejoicing when a railroad, that great adjunct to advancement in civilization and material progress, enters an isolated region, yet a period of railroad building is one of not a little anxiety, oftentimes, to citizens of towns already long established. The ability of a powerful corporation, in the enjoyment of a natural monopoly, to ruin some towns and build others is well known; indeed, it has been all too frequently manifested. Sometimes the contour of the country compels the location of the iron pathway a few miles to one side or the other of an existing town; sometimes the company attempts to use its power to extort advantages or a large bonus from the citizens, and failing in this, revenges itself by virtually taking the life of the obdurate community; sometimes it becomes even more arbitrary in its action, and wrecks a structure representing the patient labor, careful planning and fond hopes of years, to gratify the private pique or advance the interests of persons high in authority in its counsels.

This power of a railway company was strikingly manifested in the dealings of the Northern Pacific with Yakima City. The reason why this company should have administered a deadly blow to the honored old pioneer town is a matter of dispute, some claiming that it did so because it failed to secure satisfactory terms from some of the principal property holders, who, lacking in public spirit, demanded exorbitant figures for their holdings; some that the plating of a new town was the result of a deliberate purpose to advance the interests of certain railway officials and other townsite promoters at the expense of the people of Yakima City; some that the action of the company was dictated by a pure and enlightened public policy. Among those who hold the last mentioned theory is Edward Whitson. "It has been asserted," says he, "that a new city was planned by promoters without reference to the old town and its advantages, and that the quarrel which resulted when the new town was laid out was deliberately planned to obscure the real causes. The facts are that there were good and sufficient reasons for the establishment of a new town. First, there were three or four townsites at Yakima City and numerous additions without uniformity; second, the townsite proprietors refused to give the railroad company the necessary grounds and other facilities, asking heavy damages; third, the old town had not a convenient water and power supply; in short, the company recognized the immense natural resources of the territory, and desired for its metropolis a city with uniform streets, with shade trees, ditches, power, etc. It decided that conditions in the old town were against the consummation of this comprehensive plan, hence that a new town was a necessity."

When, in 1884, the Northern Pacific was building towards Yakima City, it was generally assumed that this would be the metropolis of the valley, and for several months people flocked in in considerable numbers; but before the tracks were laid through Union Gap, a suspicion arose that a new town scheme was in the air, and instability and uncertainty in business circles resulted. As time passed, suspicion gave place to certain knowledge. A month or more before the filing of the official plat, building must have commenced on the new townsite, which was near Captain W. D. Inverarity's homestead, four miles from old Yakima. The plat bears date February 4, 1885, and in its issue of January 17th preceding, the Ellensburg Standard publishes the substance of a private letter from Yakima City stating that no work was going on there and but little in the new town; that New Yakima consisted of Lillie & Schaer's two-story restaurant with a lean-to saloon; a small building adjoining; then Tucker & Cumming's livery stable, thirty by thirty, and another saloon. "Adjoining the restaurant on the other side," said the letter, "is Shull's boarding-house tent with sixteen guests. Across the tracks are the company buildings—a small office and a very good restaurant. The company has shipped a lot of lumber to New Yakima, said to be for depot purposes. * * * The sidetracks at Union Gap and Old Yakima have been taken up. Boarding cars and everything have been removed to new town. Everything and everybody is unsettled, and will be for some time to come."

After planning the new town, the Northern Pacific offered lots to all who would build and move buildings upon them. The first to move from Yakima City was David Guiland, one of the leading hotel men of that point. His hotel building was started on its four-mile journey some time in February, evidently before the 17th, as the Yakima Sun of that date, the only number ever issued, stated that while the Guiland House was being moved, Doctor C. J. Taft was making arrangements for the erection of a three-story, fifty by seventy, modern hotel building to take its place. That the people of old town were greatly incensed at what they called the North Yakima "outrage" was also evinced by this paper, which contained statements from P. J. Flint, E. W. Dixon, D. W. Stair, F. T. Parker, Hoscheid, Bartholet & Company, and others condemning the railroad company and arguing the folly of leaving beautified Yakima City for a dusty barren waste.

But Guiland paused not in the work of moving his hotel. It is stated that he had to employ two men to guard his property from destruction during the month that it was en route, and that twice he had to make a threatening flourish of weapons, but that his guests all staid with him and received their meals regularly.

Practically no printed records being available and the testimony of those who were here at the time being very confused in the matter of dates, it were vain to attempt to fix the order in which buildings were moved to or built in North Yakima. A. B. Weed tells us that he and his partner, Mr. Rowe, started shortly after the filing of the plat to erect a business building on the site of the present Yakima National Bank, and that by dint of favorable weather and energetic work, they were ready for business by April 1st. Allen & Chapman opened a drug store about the same time on the northwest corner of Yakima avenue and Second street, and there were doubtless several other business establishments in the place besides those mentioned, though Mr. Weed says that the major portion of the population prior to May 1st consisted of the railway construction crews encamped there.

But the bank at old town had agreed to move to North Yakima, and other business houses were preparing to accept a new home. On the whole, things looked bright for the new town and exceedingly dark for the old one. About the 1st of May a meeting was held at the latter point, at which the people agreed to stand by each other in a determined fight against the new town and the railroad company and all the disintegrating forces at work in their midst. A little later, however, a mass-meeting was held, apparently somewhat milder in sentiment, for it elected J. B. Reavis to join with two other men chosen at a similar meeting in North Yakima to proceed to New York city and lay the entire matter before the directors of the railway company. The representatives of the new town in this commission were A. B. Weed and J. M. Adams. The three went at once to New York as requested. Before waiting upon the board of directors of the company, they held a species of caucus among themselves, in the course of which they all stated their conviction that two towns so close together could not both flourish; that two stations were unnecessary at the time, and that the station ought to be located at North Yakima. However, they also agreed that if the company wished to make North Yakima the principal point it should bear the expense of moving the business houses and residences from the old town, else the project would fail, as Yakima City would never acquiesce and there would always be war. To accept the terms of the commission meant the expenditure on the part of the railway company of a small fortune, but, strange to say, they acquiesced cheerfully and telegraphed their decision to Paul Schulze. The meeting between the board and the commission, Mr. Weed says, took place about the middle of May.

During the stay of the commission in New York an event transpired which illustrates how bitter was the fight between the two towns at this period and how wrought up were the feelings of the people. J. M. Adams was then owner and editor of the Yakima Signal, which in his absence was left in charge of E. M. Reed. The building was on jacks preparatory to being removed to North Yakima, but some one determined that it should never swell the ranks of the adversary or increase the size of the rival town. Entering the building at night, this unknown person exploded a charge of dynamite on the forms, thereby badly damaging the type and other materials and completely wrecking the building. But whatever material was left uninjured was speedily gathered together and installed in a building on the corner of Front and Walnut streets, North Yakima, whence the next number of the paper issued on time.

No sooner was the result of the New York conference known, than the leading business men of old Yakima gave up hope of saving their town and commenced active preparations for moving. The months of May, June and July were very busy ones. Hyman Harris opened a general merchandise store; MacCrimmon, Needham & Masters, another; Schistl & Schorn, a blacksmith shop; J. S. Lowe, a hardware; T. J. V. Clark, a general merchandise store; Ward Brothers, a grocery and shoe store; Henry Ditter & Sons and W. G. Cary, general merchandise stores, all in buildings either erected for the purpose that summer or moved from the old town. Many other business enterprises were also established during the summer and fall. The Northern Pacific Company made the town a terminus throughout 1885 and a part of the succeeding year, thus giving a tremendous impetus to its growth. Mr. Weed says that by January 1, 1886, there were not fewer than twelve hundred people in the town.

North Yakima was an exceedingly lively place during the first year or so of its existence, but its site was not very attractive at first. Everything, says the Herald, was bustle and confusion. The railroad track had been built to this point, but there was no depot (that is, during the early part of the year), unless you could so denominate a box car that had been taken from its wheels. Here Agent Cooper reigned supreme. The only train by which one could go or come was of mixed character, passenger, freight and construction, with Laughlin MacLean, who was later associated with Fred R. Reed in the real estate business, officiating as conductor. The spring was one of continued and turbulent winds. They may not have been so strong as they now seem, but the streets were all new and ground into powder by the freighting and the moving of houses from the old town. A man named Payton Hatch was here from Portland with an extensive moving outfit, and when he would put twenty-four or forty-eight horses onto a building like S. J. Lowe's hardware store, the First National Bank, the Oddfellows' building or Sam Chapell's store, it would move right along over the four miles, but the way the dust would fly was a caution. There were other moving outfits, including those of A. Forbis and a man named Jones. "Add to this," continues the paper, "the din made by hundreds of carpenters, the banging of pianos and the tooting or twanging of wind and stringed instruments in the numerous saloons, the rolling of the rondo and roulette balls and the betting cries, and you have a medley of sounds that it is difficult accurately to describe."

In a town which sprang into existence so suddenly and where so many saloons maintained the open-door policy day and night, there was need for a strong government. Such could not be legally secured as speedily as the emergency demanded, and the people themselves came to the rescue by calling a mass-meeting and organizing a provisional government. The funds necessary to equip and maintain this were furnished by voluntary contributions, as appears from the following subscription list, which was discovered by Colonel L. S. Howlett among his old papers, and published by the Herald in November, 1895:

"For the support of the provisional government of North Yakima, W. T.

"We, the undersigned citizens and property holders of said town, do hereby subscribe the sums set opposite our respective names; said sum to be payable at the present and each succeeding month until the town is legally organized: Northern Pacific Land Department, $151; T. J. V. Clark, $10; Cummings & Tucker, $10; Nelson Bennett, $10; Weed & Rowe, $5; Churchill, Shardlow & Company, $5; Mitchell & Powell, $5; Barth & Wheeler, $5; William Steigler, $5; Mike Farrell, $1; Joseph Bartholet, $10; Bush & Machison, $5."

marshal and consequently the most important officer of the provisional government, was very efficient in the discharge of his duties. He maintained law and order as best he could until a charter could be secured and a town government organized in legal form. The first step in this direction was taken at a popular assembly in the fall of 1885, when Judge Graves and Edward Whitson were appointed to draft a suitable charter. The work was successfully accomplished; the instrument thus prepared was introduced into the legislature by Councilman J. B. Reavis, was passed by both houses, signed by the governor, and given the force and authority of law. It remained in operation for several years, being superseded eventually by a charter framed in accordance with the provisions of the state constitution and the laws enacted under it.

While North Yakima was the terminus of the railway and during the period of construction between it and Ellensburg, its growth was rapid and times were excellent. According to official statements, the money spent by the company at this period aggregated forty thousand dollars a day. But after the work was completed to Ellensburg, the reaction came in good earnest, threatening to overwhelm some in financial ruin. There was a reaction also against the extreme freedom of the earliest times, the people reverting to absolute prohibition of all sorts of gambling and liquor selling. Fortunately, the financial pressure did not last long. From the nature of the case it could not, for the building of the transcontinental road was bringing prosperity to the territory at large; indeed, it was causing a realty boom; and no town so favorably situated as North Yakima could long fail of a share in the general cheer. Concomitant with the passing of 1887 was the passing also of the financial depression, and with the advent of 1888 came a revival of the old-time prosperity. Mr. Weed tells us that the population jumped to twenty-five hundred during that year, causing property valuations to soar upward and numerous additions to be platted, among the latter the Syndicate and Capitol. Business establishments spread to the west side of the track and to many other parts of the town; brick buildings began to multiply and an appearance of substantiality to be assumed.

For years Yakima City had been looked upon as being especially well suited, by reason of its central location, for the seat of the state government, and no doubt the prospect that this honor would come to the Yakima valley gave vitality to the new town from its very inception, even the plat being influenced by this political ambition of its promoters.

As the Washington Farmer expressed it: "North Yakima was modeled after Salt Lake City, with wide streets, wide alleys, running streams of water and rows of shade trees on both sides of every street. Liberal reserves for public parks, walks and capitol grounds had been made and were being adorned in a manner pleasing to the eye." Nothing could be more natural, then, than that when the question of locating the state capital came up, North Yakima should enter the political ranks with a firm determination to win. It was encouraged by a strong following. All over the eastern part of the state and in some portions of the western, the newspapers were championing its cause, though some favored Ellensburg. A quotation from the Vancouver Independent will serve to illustrate the general tone of these press comments:

"At the approaching election among the most important questions to be decided is the location of the state capital. By the observant it is conceded that only three places are seriously considered. North Yakima, Ellensburg and Olympia are the only towns that will receive more than a local support. If no town receives a majority of all the votes cast, and another vote thereby becomes necessary, these three towns will then, no doubt, be the only contestants, since only the three names securing the highest vote at the first can be submitted at the second election. It therefore behooves the people of this region to consider thoughtfully which of these towns should be chosen. Thirty-five years ago, when the present capital was located, the settlements were all on the west side of the territory. At that time Olympia served at least reasonably well, though radical objections might then have been urged. But now an entirely different situation is presented. A great and growing population throngs the country east of the Cascades. These barriers have been pierced by railroads and others are coming to transport products and people over lines then unimagined. The large population on the sunny slope of the Cascades and away to the east of the great Columbia are now to be heard from on this question, and will certainly speak in unmistakable terms for some place on that side of the mountains. It is fortunate for Yakima that the most westerly town at all satisfactory to that already potent section promises in the near future to be closely allied to Vancouver by new lines of communication. We refer, of course, to North Yakima. Her natural advantages in climate, in central location, in accessibility, in healthfulness, etc., are considerations which address themselves strongly to all the voters of the state." * * * *

Sprague, Wilbur, Spokane, Spangle, Colfax, Palouse City, Garfield, Dayton, Ritzville and, in fact, all eastern Washington supported North Yakima in the campaign, as did also Puyallup and a few other points in the western part. North Yakima and its citizens did all in their power to bring the capital to themselves, and had it come, it would doubtless have received fitting gifts from the town as a corporate body and from individuals. In the Herald of September 26th there was published a receipt for a deed, of which the following is a copy:

TACOMA, September 13, 1889.

Received from Chester A. Congdon a deed from himself and wife to the state of Washington of certain lands in North Yakima, Washington, to be delivered to said state in the event that the seat of government is permanently located at North Yakima at the election held in October, 1889, and also in the event that said state accepts said land as the site of its capitol buildings, at the first session of the said legislature; otherwise said deed is to be returned to the said Chester A. Congdon.

North Yakima did not win in the contest, though it gained second place, the vote being: Olympia, 25,488; North Yakima, 14,707; Ellensburg, 12,833. No town receiving a majority of all the votes cast, the capital question was up again in the general election of 1890, and this time Olympia received a clear majority.

A general review of North Yakima's commercial development in 1889 may not be uninteresting. According to the statement of an Oregonian correspondent, there were then sixty-two business houses in the city, all usually occupied; that the range of business establishments included almost everything from a national bank to a hand laundry; that the sales for 1888, including lumber, coal and the products of the two flouring mills, aggregated about two and one-half million dollars; that a handsome, two-story, brick school-house had been erected, a modern structure, which, when all complete, would cost fifteen thousand dollars.

The Herald's directory of the city in February, 1889, was as follows: Attorneys: W. H. White, H. G. Snively, L. C. Parrish, John G. Boyle, J. B. Reavis, A. Mires, C. B. Graves, Edward Whitson and Fred Parker. Physicians: David Rosser, T. B. Gunn, —— Savage. Forwarding and commission merchant: J. M. Stout. Wood and drayage: John Reed. North Yakima nursery: E. R. Leaming, proprietor. Saloons: Joseph J. Appel, A. Churchill, Shardlow & McDaniel. Meat market: Field & Meyer. Lumber: G. O. Nevin. Candy factory and restaurant: P. J. Herke. Banks: First National, J. R. Lewis, president; Edward Whitson, vice-president; W. L. Steinweg, cashier; also the Yakima National. Harness stores: C. E. McEwen, W. F. Jones. Drug stores: C. B. Bushnell, Allen & Chapman. Real estate: Fechter & Law, Rodman & Eshelman, Goodwin, Strobach & Pugsley, McLean & Reed. Hardware: A. B. Weed, Vining & Bilger, S. J. Lowe. Hotels: Guiland, Steiner's, Bartholet, Yakima. General merchandise: I. X. L., Fawcett Brothers, J. J. Armstrong, Bartholet Brothers, G. W. Cary. Tailor: Hugo Sigmund. Gents' furnishing house: I. H. Bills & Company. Dry goods and furnishings: Henry Ditter. A board of trade.

The year 1889 was an exceedingly prosperous

one for North Yakima. Miles of sidewalk were built, thousands of shade trees planted, huge cisterns for fire purposes constructed, fire engines purchased, a movement for electric lights and waterworks started, and telephone wires strung all over the city. Besides numerous residences and small buildings, the following important structures, according to the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, were erected during the year: Hotel Yakima, two stories, estimated cost, $30,000; Bartholet Hotel, three stories, $20,000; Syndicate block, three stories, $20,000; Lewis & Ingle block, three stories, $28,000; Cadwell & Lloyd block, two stories, $18,000; Cadwell & Lloyd block, two stories, $12,000; Lowe building, three stories, $22,000; Vining Brothers' building, two stories, $9,000; Howlett block, two stories, $7,000; city hall, two stories, $10,000; Sinclair building, two stories, $5,000.

This progressive impulse continued its influence throughout 1890. On January 6th of that year, the town passed an ordinance which was signed by Mayor Reynolds seven days later, granting to Edward Whitson the privilege of installing a water system and maintaining the same for twenty-five years, providing, among other things, that not less than four miles of water mains should be laid and that the city should have the right to maintain as many hydrants as it might choose not exceeding one at each intersection, excepting on Yakima avenue, where two might be maintained at each street intersection. The same day, January 13th, the mayor also affixed his signature to an ordinance, passed by the council December 3, 1889, granting Edward Whitson the right to erect and maintain an electric light system in the city, the life of the franchise being likewise twenty-five years. The plant was to be completed by June 15, 1890. For ten years, the city was, by the terms of the ordinance, to use at least seven arc lights at a cost to it of one hundred and forty-four dollars each per annum.

Mr. Whitson organized two companies, both having the same officers, namely: Edward Whitson, president; J. B. Reavis, vice-president; W. L. Steinweg, treasurer; F. B. Woodward, secretary and superintendent. Operations were begun as speedily as possible, and by November the two plants were completed. Their combined cost was about one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. The water was taken from the Naches river, four miles and a quarter from Front street, and carried thence by ditch and flume to a reservoir three miles from the intake, where it was subjected to a process of filtration and purification. From the reservoir the water had an abrupt fall of thirty-six feet to two pair of horizontal turbine wheels, the power of which was figured at two hundred and seventy-five horse. Gravity gave a hydraulic pressure of thirty-one pounds to the square inch at North Yakima, and it was claimed that a much higher pressure could be developed. In the power houses were two pumps with a capacity of one million five hundred thousand gallons each, also two dynamos for generating electricity for the arc and incandescent lights.

Another important improvement of the year was a sewerage system, put in by the city, the ordinance providing for which passed April 2d. The district was to include "all blocks lying between E and Spruce streets and between Front street and Naches avenue; also all those blocks lying between West Chestnut street and West C street and between Moxee avenue and the Northern Pacific's right of way, at least two sides of said blocks to have sewer lines extending along them." May 17th, the proposition of issuing forty thousand dollars' worth of six percent. bonds, payable in not less than fifteen or more than thirty years, for the construction of the system was submitted to vote of the people, who authorized the issue by a vote of two hundred and eight to thirteen. The bonds found a ready sale, and before the year was over, the sewerage system was an accomplished fact.

It was in 1890 that the Yakima Club was organized, which later merged into the Commercial Club. Its first governing board consisted of William Ker, Edward Whitson, Fred R. Reed, Doctor Elmer E. Heg and T. M. Vance.

This year also Company A of North Yakima was mustered into the service of the state by Captain C. B. Johnson, of Cavalry Troop A of Sprague. The officers of this company at this time were: J. C. MacCrimmon, captain; Dudley Eshelman, first lieutenant; Matthew Barthoel, second lieutenant; F. B. Lippincott, first sergeant.

The only serious disaster of 1890, and the first of its kind to visit the town, occurred on May 25th, when all the frame buildings on Yakima avenue from Lowe's block, Front street and from the corner to the new city hall building were destroyed by fire. The fire started in the restaurant of S. Harris at about 8:30 in the evening and soon a dozen buildings were in flames.

"Fortunately," says the Herald, "the night was very quiet, there being hardly a breath of wind, and to this is largely due the fact that such a small area was burned. There were two other factors prominent in staying the spread of the flames, one being S. J. Lowe's splendid three-story brick; the other, the shade trees which lined the streets. Had it not been for the latter, there is no question but that Shardlow & McDaniel's, Steiner's and, in fact, the whole block would have gone, and it is doubtful if it could have been confined even in that space. The row of frame buildings on the south side of Yakima avenue was badly scorched and most of the window glass broken by the heat. It seemed at one time as though nothing could save that quarter, and a number of the merchants moved their goods from the stores to the street beyond. Lewis, Shardlow & McDaniel and Kirkman refused to permit the removal of their stocks.

"It is a little bit uncertain how the fire started, whether the lamp in the kitchen of Harris' restaurant exploded or was knocked from its bracket and broken. Mrs. Harris heard something pop, but paid no attention to it until she went into the kitchen and saw the burning oil on the table. She called for help and commenced beating out the flames with some towels, when her customer rushed in with a bucket of water which he dashed over the flames. That settled it. The water spread the oil everywhere and the inmates had hardly time to reach the street before the building was enveloped and the flames were forcing their way into Al. Churchill's billiard hall and saloon."

The losses by the fire were estimated at the time as follows: Carpenter Brothers, goods lost or stolen in being moved, $500 to $1,000; Lowe's block, scorched, $500; W. F. Jones, $1,200, insurance, $500; M. G. Wills, $1,200; J. T. Foster, loss, $1,300, insurance, $650; J. P. and E. Wheeler, owners of the Star Coffee House, $800; H. Keuchler, jeweler, $2,000; S. Harris, $300 or $400; A. Churchill, $9,000, insurance, $3,000; Theodore Steiner, $1,500; William Shearer, $1,100, insurance $500; J. W. Walters, $800; T. J. V. Clark, $3,500, insurance, $1,000; Shardlow & McDaniel, $300; J. A. Taggard, $200; Jacob Vernier, $150; M. B. Kirkman, $500; A. J. Kraudelt, $100; T. J. Redfield, $100. To these losses must be added buildings to the value of several thousand dollars, owned by non-residents or practically covered by insurance, which were not included in the estimate; also a number of small losses incident to the moving of goods. The newspapers of the time commend the fire company for efficient work and the militia for vigilance in guarding property.

Another fire of much less magnitude occurred in the city on the morning of November 5, 1892. It is supposed to have started in the store of Mrs. W. H. Jeffers, but the truth concerning its origin will never be definitely known. It spread rapidly to neighboring buildings, all on the corner of A and First streets, and fanned by the high wind then blowing, rapidly demolished them. The fire company were handicapped at first by the fact that only the usual household pressure from the waterworks was on when the alarm sounded and that the young man who went to telephone for greater pressure, becoming excited, snapped the bell cord, making it necessary to send word to the power house by a mounted messenger. Despite this delay, the company managed to confine the flames within reasonable bounds and prevent a general conflagration. The losses and insurance according to estimates made by the local press at the time were: H. L. Walen, dealer in boots and shoes, loss $1,200, insurance $500; Mrs. L. J. May, merchandise, $500, no insurance; Fred Drury, jewelry, $1,000, no insurance; Herke & Gammon, candies, $350, fully insured; Charles —, merchandise, $3,000, insurance $1,500; Mrs. W. H. Jeffers, millinery, $1,400, insurance $950; MacCrimmon, Needham & Masters, building, $1,000, insurance, $500; MacCrimmon, Needham & Bingswanger, building, $1,800, insurance $900; R. Strobach, building, $800, insurance $450.

Notwithstanding the losses occasioned by these two fires, North Yakima forged ahead with unresting feet, throughout all the years 1889, '90, '91, '92, nor was its march entirely stayed by the general depression commencing in 1893. At the opening of the hard times North Yakima had a fine water and electric light plant, a telephone system, a United States land office, two or three newspapers, a box factory, a flouring mill with an annual business of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, lumber yards, two banks (the First National and the Yakima National), four large hotels, four grocery stores, seven general merchandise establishments, two butcher shops, three hardware stores, a carriage factory, an agricultural implement and seed depot, two shoe stores, half a dozen blacksmith shops, a steam laundry, three livery stables, three jewelry stores, four drug stores, two millinery stores, a bakery, a gun store, two photograph galleries, two opera houses, two notion stores, a large number of restaurants, plenty of saloons, real estate and insurance firms in abundance, twelve professional firms or individuals, lodges of the Masons, Odd Fellows, A. O. U. W., Knights of Pythias, Catholic Knights of America, G. A. R., Sons of Veterans, Daughters of Rebekah and others. To these business establishments probably not many were added during the continuance of financial depression, yet the town held its own well, experiencing few important failures and little of the inconvenience that came to other towns. In September, the Herald informed its readers that "lack of confidence" had not yet closed a door in North Yakima; that the city was without an unoccupied house and was not troubled with crowds of unemployed. Later a few small houses suspended business, but it was not until March, 1895, that the first important failure took place, the unfortunate man in this instance being John C. MacCrimmon, of the Modern store. The two banks were on a firm footing, having on deposit, according to their quarterly statement published in March, $250,088.85, or an amount equal to about $62.50 per capita of the county's population.

The people of North Yakima are certainly to be congratulated on the courage with which they battled against adverse conditions, and the boldness they displayed in undertaking new enterprises despite the hard times in their midst and all around them. In 1894 they bonded their school district for twenty thousand dollars to pay off the floating indebtedness, purchase a site for a new schoolhouse and build an addition to Central school. During the winter of 1894-95 several buildings were erected, including the two-story brick residence of W. H. Kershaw and the brick block of Taft & Son. In the spring of 1895 a number of contracts for buildings were let, and even in 1896, which was probably the year of greatest financial embarrassment in North Yakima, some improvements were undertaken, among them the splendid house of worship of the Congregational society, which was dedicated, free of debt, the following year.

With a record so well maintained during a period of depression, the town might be expected to continue growing when the sun of prosperity again began to shine, and it did so. Reviewing 1897, Mrs. Hulda Kinsey said through the columns of the Herald:

"The growth of North Yakima during the past year has not been marvelous, but steady and sure. Numerous improvements have been made, and premises on every street give evidence of prosperity and thrift.

"Among the improvements worthy of note is the James creamery, a convenient establishment, equipped with the most modern machinery, and having a daily capacity of one thousand pounds of butter. Its product is not excelled by any like institution in the state.

"Another improvement has been the beautifying of the State Fair grounds, which have been leveled and seeded. The buildings have been painted, and a permanent water right has been secured for the grounds. The fruit and vegetable evaporator recently put into operation was a badly needed improvement and speaks much to the credit of those who were instrumental in securing the plant. * * *

"A number of minor improvements have been made in the building of some very neat cottages and fine residences. Other homes have been artistically improved.

"Commercial and financial conditions show a marked improvement over the years 1895 and 1896. Beneath all the confusion that prevailed and all the uncertainty as to the legislative outcome, there are numerous good indications. Our merchants have enjoyed a good trade. The bank deposits during the closing months of the year showed an increase of fifty per cent. over the previous year. The once vacant store buildings are now all occupied, and the same can be said of the residences in and about town. The prosperity of the town has depended upon the prosperity of the farmers, who have had a very encouraging year, and many of whom are living on Easy avenue, with mortgages paid and a good amount of grain, hay, potatoes and fruit on hand."

It was not, however, until the year 1899 that North Yakima experienced anything which could be properly denominated a building boom, but during that twelvemonth over one hundred buildings were erected. One of the principal of these was the new Northern Pacific depot, one hundred and twenty feet long by forty wide, an excellent building in every respect. A concrete walk seven hundred feet long was put in around it, and on each end a beautiful park, occupying an entire block, was created. The old depot was removed across the track and increased in size by the building of a sixty-foot addition so as to serve the purpose of a freight depot. Larson's ten-thousand-dollar theater was begun during the year, and the following men constructed business buildings costing the sums immediately succeeding their names: A. E. Larson, $2,500; P. Y. Heckman, $2,000; Thomas Lund, $4,000; A. B. Munchie, $4,000; the Fashion stables, $4,000; Lombard & Horsley, warehouse, $1,000.

In an interview in the Post-Intelligencer of Seattle given early in the year, Professor Getz, of the state university, said concerning North Yakima:

"I saw the most wonderful transformation through the Yakima valley. The bankers told me that the deposits in the two banks of the city amounted to five hundred thousand dollars, a vast increase over the deposits of one or two years ago. There are no vacant houses in Yakima, and it is difficult to find a residence to rent. The merchants have large stocks of goods, the cattle men are bringing in their cattle to sell at good prices and the hay grown in the valley finds a ready sale at a good price. The people are exceedingly prosperous. I think the chief explanation of it can be found in the variety of resources. Yakima has fruit, cattle, grain and other crops upon which it may depend. The same may be said of the Kittitas valley, for this condition of affairs extends on up to Ellensburg."

But there is one small disaster chargeable to 1899, that of November 9th, when at two o'clock in the morning, flames were discovered bursting from the gable ends of the old Rosenfeldt building, then occupied by the Lion clothing store. Despite heroic efforts of the fire department, the structure was soon totally consumed. Another building caught and was gutted, nothing being left but a shell; then the progress of the devouring element was stayed. The latter building was occupied on the ground floor by Samuel Arendt's novelty, toy and cigar store and by Ditter & Mechtel's grocery and crockery store, while the second story furnished quarters to M. Probach, the tailor, and to three other persons. The losses aggregated several thousands of dollars, partly covered by insurance. One lady was rendered destitute by the fire, but a generous public came to her assistance with a goodly subscription.

The year 1900 was not specially fruitful of events such as add interest to history's page, but it brought progress and development all along the line, one of the improvements to its credit being a free carrier delivery. In this year, also, Larson's theater was opened to the public. The first performance, consisting of a rendition of Charles H. Yale's play, "The Evil Eye," was given on the evening of July 11th, and the people manifested their joy and pride in the new theater by packing it from parquet to gallery.

The growth of the city of North Yakima in the past three or four years has been steady and rapid. Seven business houses were built in 1901. In 1902 there were twice as many, among them the Odd Fellows' temple, costing $15,000; the new Ditter building, costing $6,000; O. A. Fechter's building, $6,000; Frank Shardlow's, $12,000; C. P. Wilcox's, $12,000; B. F. Pickett, $4,000; T. E. Mollette, $6,000; A. D. Sloan, $14,000; N. H. Johnson, addition to hotel and improvements, $15,000; George Glazier's, $3,500; Thomas Lund's, $3,500; Andrew Johnson, $3,000; three uncompleted improvements and buildings, namely, George Wilson's building, to cost $15,000; improvements to W. B. Dudley's building, $2,000; the new Presbyterian church, $12,000. A great number of residences were also built, one, it is said, costing as high as $9,000.

The Yakima valley is favored with three substantial banking institutions, located in North Yakima. In the order of their establishment they are: The First National Bank of North Yakima, incorporated 1885; capital, $50,000; surplus and undivided profits, $51,569.17; president, W. M. Ladd; vice-president, Charles Carpenter; cashier, W. L. Steinweg. Yakima National Bank, incorporated 1888; capital, $50,000; surplus, $22,500; president, George Donald; vice-president, H. K. Sinclair; cashier, J. D. Cornett. The Yakima Valley National, incorporated 1902; capital, $75,000; president, Miles Cannon; first vice-president, A. W. Coffin; second vice-president, J. S. Baker; cashier, H. S. Coffin. The deposits in each are unusually large.

The church societies of the city may be enumerated as follows:

First Baptist, Rev. J. J. Tickner, pastor; Christian, Rev. Arthur C. Vail, pastor; Congregational, Rev. H. P. James, pastor; St. Michael's Episcopal, Rev. Hamilton M. Bartlett, rector; First Methodist Episcopal, Dr. Henry, pastor; Lutheran, St. Paul's German Evangelical, Rev. Johannes Gihring, pastor; Presbyterian, Rev. F. L. Hayden, pastor; St. Joseph's Roman Catholic, Rev. Father B. Feusi, S. J., pastor; Dunkard, Rev. G. E. Wise, elder; Mennonite, Rev. J. A. Persell, pastor; besides which the Christian Scientists have a flourishing society, and the Salvation Army has a barracks here. All of the above mentioned societies own substantial and, in many cases, unusually fine houses of worship. The Presbyterian and the Episcopalian church edifices are handsome stone buildings.

The city has four prominent clubs, organized for different purposes. The Commercial Club, which has been maintained, though at times irregularly, since the establishment of the city, is a thrifty organization whose membership embraces the leading citizens and business men of the community. At present its rooms are in the Clogg block. Its officers are: President, J. D. Cornett; first vice-president, F. C. Hall; second vice-president, W. A. Bell; treasurer, Frank Bartholet; secretary, Fred Chandler; governing board, C. E. White, Ira P. Englehart, A. E. Larson, J. J. Macdonald, C. T. Dulin, Frank Horsley; trustees, H. H. Lombard, A. Schindeler, O. A. Fechter, A. B. Weed and George Donald. The Commercial Club has done much valuable advertising of the Yakima country, and North Yakima in particular.

The Twentieth Century Club is a woman's organization, which meets at the homes of its members twice each month. Its officers are: Rebecca J. Rigg, president; Jennie Harader Bell, vice-president; Edna Haines Miller, recording secretary; Carrie Duval Krutz, corresponding secretary; Esther C. Miller, treasurer; Annie Highfill Walker, auditor; Rose B. Larson, parliamentary critic; Edith Moore Coleman, pronunciation critic. The Woman's Club of North Yakima also meets bi-monthly. Its officers are: President, Mrs. Vestal Snyder; vice-president, Sue M. Lombard; recording secretary, Mrs. Miles Cannon; corresponding secretary, Lucy Nichols; treasurer, Mrs. J. D. Cornett.

The Yakima Rod and Gun Club has the following officers: T. R. Fisher, president; W. A. Bell, secretary; George Stacy, treasurer. The club's grounds are at the south end of Third street.

North Yakima is justly proud of her schools, for they have attained a high standard of excellence. The city board of education is composed of Benjamin F. Barge, ex-superintendent of the Ellensburg Normal, president; Ralph K. Nichols, Miles Cannon; George S. Hough, clerk. A. R. Jolly, A. M., is superintendent. The district has three fine brick schoolhouses, all modern in design, construction and equipment—the High school, also known as the Lincoln school, on North Third street between D and E streets; the Central, South Second street between Walnut and Spruce streets, and the Columbia, North Kittitas avenue between B and C streets; besides which there are the Lincoln school annex and the Fairview, the last named being suburban. The corps of teachers in charge of the schools last year were: High, Mrs. Ella S. Stair, principal, Luther M. Seroggs, Eva C. May, Berdina M. Hale, Grace Shannon, M. Kate McKinney, Elizabeth Prior, Albertina Rodman; Central, A. W. Schwartze, principal, Clara E. Bullan, Beulah G. Gilman, Maude L. Patterson, Carrie Young, Anna Jungst, Charlotte Lum, Minnie Larsen; Columbia, Lulu Meeds, principal, Bessie M. Ballinger, Lois B.

Whittle, Mary A. Young, Bessie Aumiller, Avanelle Gans, Ethel M. Burns, Mrs. Edna Miller, Jennie J. Sherwood; High, or Lincoln, Annex, Mrs. Ella Needham, Ella Howland, Berde Moore; Fairview, Florence McWain, teacher.

Beside the public schools, North Yakima has several private ones, treated of elsewhere in this work. These are: St. Joseph's Academy, conducted by the Sisters of Providence; Miss Wright's private school, Miss Annie C. Wright, principal; private kindergarten, Miss Alice B. Scudder, principal; Burrows' musical kindergarten, Mrs. Carrie Fox, principal; and the Seventh Day Adventist school, H. Gillis, principal.

Among North Yakima's other noteworthy institutions are: St. Elizabeth's hospital, conducted by the Sisters of Charity; a public library, which is soon to occupy an elegant home donated by Andrew Carnegie, the city having bound itself to appropriate at least one thousand dollars annually for the library's support; a Deaconess Home, established in 1902, Mary Venema, deaconess and superintendent, Mary Murphy, deaconess, Matilda Anderson, nurse; four weekly newspapers, the Yakima Democrat, Yakima Herald, Yakima Republic and Northwest Farm and Home, and one daily, the Daily Republic, fully described in the press chapter; and the Washington State Fair grounds, located on the outskirts of the city. The city also supports one company of militia, Company E, First Regiment, W. N. G., of which C. T. Dulin is captain; John M. Curry, first lieutenant; J. Howard Wright, second lieutenant.

The list of secret and fraternal societies of North Yakima is a long one; it is herewith presented, together with the principal officers of each lodge:

Ancient Order of United Workmen, North Yakima Lodge No. 29—J. J. Tyler, M. W.; M. S. Liggett, foreman; E. Hamilton, overseer; F. M. Sain, recorder; George N. Tuesley, financier; Sam Arendt, receiver.

Degree of Honor, North Star Lodge No. 52—Fannie M. Scott, P. C. of H.; Daisy Wylie, L. of C.; Belle Arendt, C. of C.; J. J. Tyler, recorder; M. S. Liggett, financier; E. P. Taylor, receiver.

Brotherhood of American Yeomen, Homestead 363—J. C. Varker, honorable foreman; Mrs. Emma Allen, master of ceremonies; Miss Anna Jungst, secretary.

Independent Order of Odd Fellows, North Yakima Encampment No. 7—Herman Hagerdorn, C. P.; Frank Winchell, H. P.; J. G. Hilliard, S. W.; J. M. Kussmaul, J. W.; P. Frank, scribe; A. S. Dam, treasurer; C. E. Lum, trustee. Yakima Lodge No. 22—F. T. Liggett, N. G.; H. D. Hagedorn, V. G.; A. L. Flint, secretary; Charles Carpenter, treasurer; John Kussmaul, trustee. Isabel Rebekah No. 22—Mrs. Van Norman, N. G.; Minnie Himbaugh, V. G.; Minnie Hinman, secretary; Walter White, financial secretary; Mrs. Mariam Whitehouse, treasurer.

Knights of Pythias, North Yakima No. 53—W. T. Stewart, C. C.; W. E. Herd, V. C.; L. D. S. Patton, prelate; C. M. Houser, K. of R. and S.; B. F. Kumler, M. of W.; J. C. Liggett, M. of F.; Frank Horsley, M. of Ex.; Arthur Pierce, M. at A.

Rathbone Sisters, North Yakima Temple No. 31—Mrs. Anna R. Stewart, P. C. of T.; Mrs. Lizzie Badger, M. E. C.; Mrs. Mary L. Coe, E. S. of T.; Mrs. M. A. Murchie, E. J. of T.; Mrs. Dora Short, M. of T.; Mrs. Linna E. Kumler, M. of R. and C.; Mrs. Ruth Herd, M. of F.; Mrs. Florence Lince, P. of T.; Mrs. Mary E. Hamilton, G. of O. T.

Uniform Rank, K. of P., North Yakima Company No. 9—C. T. Dulin, captain; C. M. Houser, first lieutenant; J. M. Curry, second lieutenant.

Knights of the Maccabees, Yakima Tent No. 26—H. L. Tucker, P. C.; A. E. Knerr, commander; Charles Gleeson, lieutenant-commander; J. A. Adams, Rec. K. and Fin. K.; E. L. Sessions, chaplain; Dr. W. H. Carver, physician; W. W. Doty, sergeant.

Masonic, Yakima Chapter No. 21, Royal Arch Masons—R. K. Nichols, E. H. P.; P. Y. Heckman, K.; James Greene, scribe; Walter J. Reed, treasurer; Marcus M. Graves, secretary. Yakima Lodge No. 24, A. F. and A. M.—W. L. Lemon, W. M.; B. F. McCurdy, S. W.; H. E. Scott, J. W.; J. D. Cornett, treasurer; M. S. Scudder, secretary.

Eastern Star, Syringa Chapter No. 38, O. E. S.—Lucy Nichol, W. M.; B. F. McCurdy, W. P.; Mrs. Edna Miller, Assoc. M.; Mrs. Anna Lauderdale, secretary; Mrs. Nellie Niles, treasurer; Mrs. Mary Cleman, conductress.

Modern Woodmen of America, North Yakima Camp No. 5,550—Orlando Beck, V. C.; E. E. Knowles, banker; E. L. McComb, W. A.; F. L. Janeck, clerk; G. W. Bissell, E.; Drs. Gordon, Wells and Fletcher, physicians.

Royal Neighbors, Sunshine Camp No. 1,520—Mrs. Temah Truitt, oracle; Mrs. Jennie Lisle, V. O.; Mrs. Corranza Beck, P. O.; Mrs. Abbie E. Badger, recorder; Mrs. Emma Mattoon, receiver.

Order of Pendo, North Yakima Lodge No. 192—Mrs. Helen Van Norman, concilor; Mrs. Dora Coombs, P. C.; Mrs. Theodore Smith, secretary; Mrs. Annie J. Elmer, treasurer; Theodore Smith, chaplain; William Van Norman, V. C.

Order of Washington, Electic Union No. 80—Dr. Burns, president; Agnes C. Curry, vice-president; Mrs. S. M. Ballinger, secretary; Mrs. Kussmaul, chaplain.

Royal Tribe of Joseph, North Yakima Lodge No. 7—George Grist, W. P.; Mrs. T. Truitt, V. P.; Mrs. Alice Wilgus, president; Mrs. Gertrude Zook, scribe; Mrs. F. M. Scott, treasurer; Tom Larson, escort; Mrs. Nora Bedker, inner guard; Harry Jacobs, outer guard; May Zook, organist.

Woodmen of the World, Yakima Camp No. 89—A. A. Smith, C. C.; W. W. Pettijohn, A. L.; J. J. Sandmeyer, escort; C. Gleeson, banker; W. V. Holden, manager; F. D. Clemmer, clerk.

Women of Woodcraft, Rustle Circle No. 268—Mrs. Anna Howard, P. G. N.; Mrs. Elizabeth Chambers, G. N.; Mrs. Annie Thacker, clerk; Effie Murchie, banker; Mrs. D. Cleaver, musician; Mrs. F. Fear, advisor.

Other miscellaneous societies of the city are: Deaconess' Home Association, International Sunshine Society, Minnesota Society, North Yakima Ball Park Association, North Yakima Baseball Club (the Hop Pickers), North Yakima Horse-shoers' and Blacksmiths' Protective Association, North Yakima National Union No. 727, Northwestern Home Finding Association, State Irrigation Association, Washington State Fair Commission, Yakima Armory Association, Yakima Cattle and Husbandry Association, Yakima County Bar Association, Yakima County Horticultural Union, Yakima County Medical Society, Yakima County Teachers' Association, Willard Young Women's Christian Temperance Union, of which Mrs. B. A. Wylie is superintendent, Mrs. B. Ballinger president, Emma Parshall secretary and Miss Chambers treasurer; the North Yakima Women's Christian Temperance Union, of which Mrs. Oliver is president, Mrs. Hoffman is secretary and Mrs. Julia Wilkinson treasurer; Nagler's orchestra and band, F. X. Nagler, director; Ladies' Musical Club, Mrs. H. M. Bartlett, president, Mrs. Guy McL. Richards, vice-president, Blanche Reed, secretary, Bessie Hall, corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. E. Poole, treasurer, and Mrs. Marshall Scudder, chairman musical committee; and the Junior orchestra, Clarence Farmer, director and manager.

Four cities in the west are growing more rapidly or substantially than North Yakima. The federal census of 1900 gave the city credit for 3,154 people, but this number is now far too small. Says R. L. Polk & Company's 1903-4 city directory regarding this point:

"Based on the number of names of individual persons only contained in the Directory of North Yakima, and using the usual multiplier, two and a half, the city, at present, has a population of 6,940, and is growing rapidly. Some idea of the rapidity of its growth and its business development may be gained from the fact that during the year 1902, over $125,000 was expended in the erection of business blocks, and during the same time about $175,000 was expended in other building operations. At the present time there is scarcely a vacant store-room or residence in the city. To supply the immense demand, the four leading lumber companies shipped on 856 cars of lumber and building material during the year 1902, of the value of fully $375,000."

Speaking further of North Yakima's business enterprises and outlook, the writer says:

"North Yakima is rapidly assuming importance as an industrial center and in manufacturing and kindred industries. One of the largest and best appointed sawmills and sash, door and box factories in the west is just being completed. There is a large and well equipped flouring mill with a capacity of two hundred and fifty barrels of flour per day. Several creameries are in operation in and near the city as a result of the rapidly growing interest in dairying throughout the country. The large amount of fruit and vegetables raised nearby is attracting canning and preserving industries, and such works have already passed the experimental stage and promise to assume great importance. The wholesale and commission business is well represented, and many other interests, including a fine new ice factory, are well established. There is also a large and well equipped electric light and water-works plant. The various mercantile establishments would do credit to a much larger city. They carry, as a rule, larger stocks and a higher class of goods than is ordinarily found in a city of this size supported by a farming community. This is necessary to meet the peculiar demands of its inhabitants and of a thickly populated community of intelligent and well-to-do people, successfully engaged in diversified and intensive agriculture. The three banks of the city held in deposits, January 1, 1903, approximately $1,500,000, and transact an average daily deposit and exchange business of about $50,000, which certainly speaks well for the business enterprise and general prosperity of the city and surrounding country."

The city is divided into between thirty and thirty-five additions and sub-divisions, besides which practically all of the land for three or four miles on all sides has been subdivided and platted into small tracts of from one to ten acres. These suburban lands sell at from one hundred to one thousand dollars an acre, depending upon their location, the character of the soil and the state of improvement and cultivation. The city is in easy and quick communication with all parts of the surrounding valleys by means of rural free delivery mail routes and telephone systems. Telegraphic service, locally and with the outside world, is furnished by the Western Union Company, and telephone service by the Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company.

The city is symmetrically laid out with streets one hundred feet wide running north and south and eighty feet wide running east and west, with two exceptions, Yakima avenue, the main business street, which runs east and west, and Natches avenue, running north and south, which is one of the prettiest boulevards in eastern Washington. Each street, except Yakima avenue, is fringed on both sides with rows of beautiful shade trees of at least a score of varieties, watered by small irrigating ditches. This gives a pleasing and refreshing appearance to the city and speaks highly for the wisdom and æsthetic nature of its founders and people. In fact, it would seem as though the corporation had done or was doing everything in its power to promote the healthfulness, safety, comfort, stability and beauty of the metropolis.

The old city charter, granted by the territorial legislature, remained in force until the city was incorporated under the general state law as a city of the third class. This charter at present governs the corporation. The city's boundaries are as follows:

Commencing at the northeast corner section

thirty, township thirteen north, range nineteen east; thence north one-half mile on section line to northeast corner southeast quarter section nineteen, township thirteen, range nineteen; thence west one-quarter mile to northeast corner of northwest quarter southeast quarter section nineteen, township thirteen, range nineteen; thence north three-quarters mile to northeast corner southwest quarter of southeast quarter, section eighteen, township thirteen, range nineteen; thence west one-quarter mile to northeast corner of southeast quarter of southwest quarter section eighteen, township thirteen, range nineteen; thence north one-quarter mile to center section eighteen, township thirteen, range nineteen; thence west one mile to center of section thirteen, township thirteen, range eighteen; thence south seven-eighths of a mile to northeast corner of south one-half of southeast quarter of northwest quarter of section twenty-four, township thirteen, range eighteen; thence west one-quarter mile to northwest corner of south one-half of southeast quarter of northwest quarter of section twenty-four, township thirteen, range eighteen; thence south five-eighths of a mile to southeast corner, southwest quarter of southwest quarter of section twenty-four, township thirteen, range eighteen; thence east on section line one and three-quarters miles to point of beginning.

The municipal government is in the hands of the following officers, whose terms expire January 1, 1904: Mayor, A. J. Shaw; city attorney, Vestal Snyder; city engineer, C. G. Wands; city clerk, H. B. Doust; city treasurer, Charles R. Donovan; city marshal, J. N. Mull; police judge, J. A. Taggard; city physician, J. B. Burns; councilmen, first ward, Harry E. Moran, A. L. Aikins; second ward, E. J. Wynan, Thomas R. Fisher; third ward, J. C. Liggett, A. F. Switzer; at large, E. O. Keck (elected for two years, the terms of four expiring each year). The fire department, with headquarters at the city hall on Front street, is composed of C. M. Hauser, chief; hose company (volunteers paid for service at fires), F. T. Liggett, captain, S. E. Bunce, driver; engine company, W. D. Walker, engineer; hook and ladder company, Ernest Hamilton, captain. The police department, also with headquarters in the city hall, is in charge of Marshal Mull and Policemen G. C. Hunter, A. J. Villaume and James Curran.

PROSSER.

Second in size of the towns of Yakima county, but second to none in the brightness of its prospects for future development is Prosser, situated at Prosser falls of the Yakima river, on the main line of the Northern Pacific railroad. Like many other towns of central Washington, it owes its development to the magic power of irrigation in the reclamation of desert land. Its history, therefore, may, without great inaccuracy, be said to have had its inception with that of the irrigating era in Yakima county.

A small village was, however, called into existence at Prosser falls nearly twenty years ago by the necessities of farmers and stockmen in the vicinity, and of construction crews at work on the railroad. The land was located by the well-known Colonel William Prosser in 1883, and that same year, the first two business houses were put up by that esteemed pioneer of the place, Nelson Rich, and a man named Chamberlain. Both were stocked with general merchandise. The town consisted of little more than two stores, a blacksmith shop, a saloon and five or six dwelling-houses until 1890, when it began to move forward at a quickened pace. The Yakima Herald of January 3d of that year, after briefly reviewing the previous history of the town, and noting its slow growth and small population, says:

"Brighter prospects are in the air for this little hamlet, however, and capitalists who have in the last few months obtained large holdings in and adjoining the townsite propose to make things hum this coming season. M. V. B. Stacy, Mr. Alexander, of Tacoma, and Eugene Canfield are interested in the booming scheme, and it is said that Robert Harris, late president of the Northern Pacific, will have a hand in the pie. Electric lights and waterworks are to be established with power taken from the falls, and other improvements and enterprises inaugurated. The big ditch to be built by the Yakima Irrigation and Land Company will open up much tributary farming land, which will be a stimulus to the building of the town."

From the issue of the same paper bearing date of April 19, 1894, we learn of the completion of the enterprises referred to in the above quotation. It tells us that the happy event was celebrated three days before by appropriate exercises, including speeches by Colonel W. F. Prosser, W. L. Jones, G. L. Homes, president Tacoma Chamber of Commerce; W. D. Tyler, receiver of the Hunt system of railroads; D. E. Lesh, president Moxee Company; Dr. N. Fred Essig, of Spokane, and James F. Kinney. It likewise states that the officers of the company which had accomplished the important and meritorious enterprise were: President, J. G. Van Marter; vice-president, G. B. Hayes; secretary and treasurer, W. B. Dudley; manager, Fred R. Reed; superintendent of buildings, Frank McCartie; engineer of construction, Frank Bartlett. From the pen of the last named, we obtain the following description of the work:

"A pumping plant has lately been put in at this place to irrigate four thousand acres, and arrangements have been made to furnish water power for different factories soon to be erected. * * * The Prosser Falls Irrigation Company control the south side of the river. The land on this side of the river is too high to be covered by any gravity system, and though it is as productive as any in the state, without water it would be worthless. The power of the falls is utilized to raise water one hundred feet high to cover this land. The water power here is the best on the Yakima river, the fall being twenty feet in half a mile, and during the dry season in October, 1893, the river discharged 2,662 second feet, equivalent to 6,050 horse power.

"The headgates are placed in the rock on the south side of the river. The headgate frame is made of sixteen by sixteen timbers; is twenty-two feet high and thirty-six feet wide, and has six openings for gates, each four feet in the clear. In front of the headgate frame is a rack frame made of twelve by twelve timbers, on which rest the racks which will keep floating timber and ice out of the wheels. A wing dam has been built from the headgates out into the river to direct the current toward the flume.

"The headgates supply two flumes, each ten feet deep and twelve feet wide in the clear, and the water will be six feet deep in the flumes when the river is lowest. One of these flumes will supply water to the factories; the other furnishes water for the irrigation canal, and the power to raise that water one hundred feet, also water to supply the town. From the headgate to the power house is six hundred and fifty feet. Part of this fall is lost during high water, and the machinery has been designed for a twelve-foot fall. The flume connecting the headgate and power house is made of two-inch tongued and grooved planks with bents every two feet, made of six by ten timber. The water from the flume enters a forebay ten feet wide, seventeen feet deep and sixty-five feet long, and from the forebay enters three penstocks, from which it is discharged through the turbines.

"The turbines are forty-eight-inch, special Victors, and develop one hundred and thirty-five horse power each, under twelve-foot head. Each turbine drives a duplex power pump, twenty-five-inch cylinder, twenty-four-inch stroke. Each pump has a capacity of four thousand gallons per minute. This is the discharge of an eighty-foot per minute piston speed, and the pumps, when necessary, can be run at a one-hundred-foot piston speed. Two pumps and two turbines are now in successful operation, and when the third pump is in, the plant will have a daily capacity of seventeen million two hundred and eighty thousand gallons.

"From the pumps this water will pass through twenty-eight hundred feet of twenty-eight-inch steel pipe to the penstock at the head of the company's canal. Three hundred feet from the penstock the canal divides into two branches—the western one being nine miles long, the eastern now only three miles long, but with a proposed extension. The water supplied to the canal is twenty-seven second feet, which, at a duty of one hundred and fifty acres to the second foot, will irrigate four thousand acres."

The inauguration of this irrigation system resulted in the starting of a newspaper, the Prosser Falls American, in the town, the opening of the First National Bank of Prosser Falls, and the establishment of a number of other enterprises, with the natural increase of population attending such development. But the era of financial depression soon dawned, giving a quietus to anything like rapid progress for the time being. The Prosser Falls Irrigation Company became involved in financial difficulty, and with them the country suffered. After a pause of three years, the town and its enviring country resumed their onward march, but the irrigation company, unfortunately, was not able to recover itself, and its property eventually passed into other hands. Some conception of the rapidity with which the country picked up may be gained from a comparison of the volume of Prosser's shipping business in 1898 with that of the preceding year. In 1897 there were transported from the town two cars of wheat, four of flour, fifteen of wool, three of hay, seven of melons, forty of cattle and four of sheep; total, seventy-five cars. In 1898 there were shipped twenty-nine cars of wheat, twelve of flour, twenty-four of wool, twenty of hay, twelve of melons, twenty-two of cattle and four of sheep; total, one hundred and twenty-three cars.

February 11, 1899, a city election was held in Prosser, at which the question of incorporating was at issue and a corps of officers were to be chosen for the new city should the friends of incorporation carry. The result was: For incorporation, forty; against, eighteen; mayor, E. W. R. Taylor; councilmen, James Whiting, G. W. Anderson, Joseph Ponti, Fred Brandt, C. H. Denley; treasurer, C. A. Jensen.

Notwithstanding the fact that in 1899 the sale by the receiver of the Prosser Falls Irrigation Company's property became necessary, there is no evidence that any stagnation existed in the town during that year or the ensuing two. It is, however, plainly evident to the most superficial observer that the Prosser of to-day is largely a product of more recent growth. The United States census of 1900 gives to the town a population of only two hundred and twenty-nine. The census may have been incomplete, but is surely to be taken as an approximation to the truth as it then existed. But if the actual population was four hundred, it has almost, if not altogether, tripled in the three years that have since elapsed. No statistics from which the present population may be estimated are at hand. Men well acquainted with the town have, however, stated to the writer that there must surely be at least a thousand people in Prosser, and some have expressed the opinion that an enumeration would show an even greater number.

An idea of the present business development of Prosser may be gained from the following register of its business men and establishments, which is thought to be very nearly, if not quite, complete: General merchandise, the Prosser Mercantile Company, Nelson Rich, E. W. R. Taylor, D. S. Sprinkle, Coffin Brothers; hardware, Cheshire & Sovern; hardware and furniture, Harper & Sons; furniture, the Prosser Furniture Company; groceries, Reider & Kuhnley, E. C. Johnson; undertaking, William Guernsey; lively, Lee & Miller, Bandy & Smith; blacksmith, W. W. Smith; drugs, Elkins Drug Company, the Angus Drug Company, which also carries paints, etc.; paint and wall paper, Kuhnley Brothers; millinery and fancy dry goods, Williamson Brothers; meat market, Ed. Wilson, I. J. Croufutt; candy and confectionery, Finn & Hinsling; hotel, the Lape; restaurant and bakery, Kuhne & Allgaier; three Chinese restaurants; lodging house, S. H. Mason; photograph gallery, Horace C. Deitz; barber shops, Ethan R. Allen and E. Burk; banks, Prosser State Bank, J. D. Bassett, of Ritzville, president, and the Prosser Commercial Bank, established and soon to be opened for business; harness and saddlery, Hinkle & Castor; the Prosser Steam Laundry, A. W. Baker, proprietor; flour mill, Taylor & Kemp; warehouse, Ezra Kemp; jewelry, Elmore T. Hensler; saloons, Ward & McFarland, James H. Bailey and Joseph Ponti; postmaster, Nelson Rich; the Prosser Lumber Company, St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Company; contractors and builders, Creason & Barandt, J. H. McKeivitt; brick-maker and contractor, Theodore Wright; a number of dressmakers; dealer in coal and wood, H. W. Creason; draying and hauling, Railsback Brothers; newspapers, Prosser Falls Bulletin and Prosser Record; city waterworks, the Prosser Falls Irrigation Company; electric light, Thompson & Pratt; tin shop and plumbing, J. W. Jett; milkman, G. W. Krippner; real estate dealers, A. J. Busen, A. G. McNeill, W. H. Hill, Ashley-Burnham Land Company, H. J. Jenks, Williamson Brothers, L. A. Clarke, C. A. Jensen and G. W. Krippner; dentist, R. A. Calkins; physicians, Charles C. McCown, D. M. Angus; lawyers, G. A. Lane, S. H. Mason and McGregor.

Prosser has a fine public school of eleven grades, and six teachers—two men and four women—labor during nine months of each year for the intellectual and moral betterment of the juvenile population. The number of children of school age in 1903 was one hundred and twenty-six males and one hundred and twelve females, and the average daily attendance was seventy-five male and seventy-eight female children. There are two church edifices in the town, the Presbyterian and the Catholic, but services are held by several other denominations of Christians. Not a little interest is manifested in fraternal organizations, flourishing lodges of the Masons, I. O.

O. F., M. W. A., Yeomen, R. N. A., Rebekahs and Women of Woodcraft being maintained. The water system before referred to as owned and operated by the Irrigation Company, furnishes, besides a supply for domestic purposes and for the beautifying of yards and lawns, an abundant protection against fire, while an electric light plant gives to the town an up-to-date appearance at night.

The rapid development of Prosser during the past year or two is not the result of over-advertising or the efforts of the professional boggler, but is the legitimate outcome of an extensive development in the surrounding country, a country whose natural capabilities for wealth production cannot easily be over-estimated. Nor is this era of progress approaching its end. On the contrary, it is believed to be just beginning and that nothing short of a general financial stringency can bring it to a speedy end. It is stated that at least thirty thousand acres of land under the Sunnyside ditch are tributary to Prosser, and the projected extension of that canal will, if carried into execution, result in the population of another large tract whose trade will naturally flow to that town. Of the farmers on the extensive Rattlesnake wheat plateau to the north and the still more extensive Horse Heaven country to the south, a very large proportion make Prosser their trading point. The possession of this vast extent of rich tributary territory, of a splendid water power and of an unexcelled climate has inspired in the people an abiding faith in their future, a faith which in itself is the best possible earnest one could seek of what that future will be. It impels the citizens to strive most zealously for the encouragement of enterprise, cheerfully making whatever of personal sacrifice may be necessary for the attainment of the general good.

This public spirit has recently manifested itself most emphatically in efforts to secure the erection of a five-hundred-ton sugar factory at Prosser and the building of a branch road to Sunnyside to bring the sugar beets of that rich irrigated section to the factory. A mighty effort has resulted in the raising of the required subsidy for the beet sugar company, which is the same that has done so much for the people of the Grande Ronde valley of Oregon, and if a satisfactory adjustment can be effected of certain difficulties at present existing between the citizens and the Northern Pacific Railway Company relative to the subsidy required by the latter for the construction of the Sunnyside spur, the factory will soon be an established fact. There is every reason to believe that the last slight obstacle in the way of this great desideratum will be speedily removed, and that the town and country will receive the impetus which must result from the inauguration of such a splendid industry.

SUNNYSIDE.

The Sunnyside irrigation region of Yakima county enjoys a fame that is widespread and deserved. It has come to be thought of by multitudes as a sort of Utopia, a land of sunshine and warmth and good cheer, the birthplace of fatness and plenty, the home of industry, morality and thrift. The evangelists of its fame have been the products of its soil, which, borne by the arteries of commerce, have penetrated all parts of the west and crossed a continent and an ocean. Its succulent alfalfa is in demand in the orient, while the lusciousness of its fruits has appealed most powerfully to the palates of the denizens of the eastern states.

This renowned valley is situated on the northeastern side of the Yakima river between it and the high Columbia divide, and extends from Union Gap to below the town of Prosser. A short distance back from the river, an irregular, long, high basaltic ridge, named Snipes mountain in memory of a pioneer cattle king of the county, gives boundary to the gently rising slope and shuts in the greater part of the valley. The main canal winds along the base of the Columbia river divide, perhaps ten miles north of the river in places, sending forth its hundreds of miles of laterals to water the hillsides and plains constituting the farming section. Wherever the canal's vitalizing fluid has gone, orchard, field and garden have sprung into being, comfortable homes and buildings have taken the place of the sage brush waste, and a prosperous people have expelled the coyote and the jack rabbit. The luxuriant foliage, the bloom of orchard and garden, the emerald hay fields, the comfortable homes are indeed a glad some sight to the summer visitor—and summer on the Yakima is a long season. Tens of thousands of acres are here in cultivation, generally intensively farmed, producing hundreds of thousands of dollars each year, bringing the blessings of abundance to multitudes of homes and challenging the admiration and wonder of the visitor from less favored regions.

The city of Sunnyside, the commercial center of the valley, is situated at the eastern end of Snipes mountain. It is surrounded for miles in all directions except toward the ridge by a rich, irrigated region. The townsite forms the center of a circle embracing a solid area of cultivated land, broken only by the projection into it of the narrow end of Snipes mountain. Twelve miles to the north rises the sharp crest of the barren divide separating the watersheds of the Columbia and the Yakima; seven miles south is the Yakima river at Mabton; while the broad valley stretches eastward and westward at least twenty miles in each direction.

Says Walter N. Granger, organizer and present general superintendent of the Sunnyside Canal company: "At the instance of friends, in 1889, I had come from Montana to look over the irrigation project presented by that portion of the lower Yakima valley, locally called the Sunnyside section. So one June morning, accompanied by a guide, I left North Yakima. We soon passed through the gap, Parker bottom and out into the valley. A few miles farther down we ascended Snipes mountain and traveled along its summit, the better to view the country on either side. When we reached the lower end of the bridge, the vast area of practically level land below us plainly indicated that we were in the heart of the region. As I gazed on the scene I then and there resolved that a city should some day be built at the base of the mountain, for the site was ideal. My mind had been made up regarding the feasibility of the canal project, and next day we rode to the nearest telegraph station, where I wired for my crew of engineers. The rest of the story has been told so often that it need not be repeated."

The canal was built and two townsites laid out in the region to be irrigated, Sunnyside and Zillah. Mr. Granger became the president of each townsite company, the stockholders being canal company officials. True to his resolve, President Granger platted the town of Sunnyside, named after the great canal, on the site he chose that June evening. The land was acquired from the railroad company, being section twenty-five, of township ten north, range twenty-two east. The canal passed the site in 1893, and in December of that year the engineers surveyed the town.

In the meanwhile, through Paul Schultze, the townsite company offered William H. Cline, of Tacoma, a business and a residence lot in Sunnyside if he would open a store there. Mr. Cline accepted the offer, shipped his goods and lumber to Mabton, and during December, 1893, built Sunnyside's pioneer store, on Mayhew street, just west of Sixth, or Main street. The grocery was opened for trade about January 1, 1894. The prospect was not an inviting one, as there were then not a dozen families in the vicinity, the usual troubles of placing a light soil under cultivation were experienced and the hard times were just beginning to be felt.

Perhaps a few words may here be said regarding the early settlement of the region surrounding Sunnyside. The pioneer families in the district were those of Jock Morgan and John Ferrell, who lived five or six miles from Sunnyside toward Mabton. They were not there as farmers or fruit growers, but as cattle and horse raisers, for at one time that vast area was covered with the succulent bunch-grass. The first real settlers as farmers in the vicinity of the town were Joseph Kunz, who located with his family in 1890 on a homestead a mile northeast of town; John Chisholm, Nat Stone, William T.

Stobie, Sr., George A. Mathieson, Robert Mains, Abner Kirk, — Taylor, — Hendricks and one or two others. The honor of pioneership belongs to the first mentioned gentleman, who came before work on the canal was begun. To this list may be added the following who settled at an early date in the Outlook district, a few miles west of Sunnyside: W. H. Norman, P. S. Wood, B. H. Nichols, William Finn, A. Croonquist, T. J. Cooper, B. F. Brooks, A. Christenson, Fred Mansfield, Jack Williams and George Clark. These pioneers either settled upon government land or purchased land from the Northern Pacific & Yakima Irrigation Company. The waters reached them in the year 1893.

"During the spring of 1894," says Joseph L. Lannin, who came at that time, "there was a large influx of people who bought land, settled down and began preparing homes for themselves. Of those I may mention G. W. Wentworth, J. J. Brown, James Henderson, Emory Thompson, L. Pace, G. G. Mayenschein, C. E. Johnson, Andrew Green, P. S. Bacon, R. D. Young, M. Webber, F. C. Gorton, D. R. and J. W. McGinnis, E. E. Ferson, I. H. Rhodes, J. W. Day, M. D. Clarke and L. P. Vandermark. When I arrived in Sunnyside there were nine acres of alfalfa all told, of which Mr. Bacon and Mr. Mayenschein had three each. In those early years we had to do something for amusement, so we organized a literary and a dramatic society, both of which met first in the Gillis building and subsequently in the schoolhouse. (Mr. Lannin was elected president of the literary and Mrs. Lannin president of the dramatic society.) We had good times, you may be sure, and derived no little benefit from our associations. The foundation was laid then and there for the good fellowship which is now so characteristic of our people."

Late in 1893, Joseph Miller had established a stage to Mabton, and in January, 1894, the town secured a postoffice, D. R. McGinnis becoming postmaster. He was local sales agent of the townsite company. In January, also, Reuben Hatch built a commodious hotel, jocularly known as the "Incubator." A little later a man named Garland established a lumber yard and erected two small frame buildings on Sixth street, now occupied by George's mercantile house. In April, Miles Cannon opened the town's second store in one of these buildings, and about the same time B. M. Brewer occupied the other with a hardware business. D. C. Gillis, also, erected three buildings on Sixth street, which were soon in use by Crabb's restaurant, Gillis & Farrell's real estate firm, and as a schoolhouse and public hall respectively. Before the close of the year 1894, the town had, besides the establishments mentioned, another hotel, the Globe, built by Nathan H. Morris, which is still in operation; a drug store, opened by James Henderson in the fall; a livery stable, put up on Mayhew avenue by W. T. Stobie; a furniture store belonging to Frank Petre; and a blacksmith shop, owned by Nathan Morris.

Withal, the year 1894, the first year of Sunnyside's existence, was a prosperous one and productive of a rapid growth in the new town. By January 1, 1895, there were probably a hundred people in Sunnyside, but the widespread financial depression was soon severely felt. Scores were obliged during 1895 to leave their farms in the Sunnyside valley. Many had sold land in the east, and made a payment upon their Washington farms, but being unable now to secure the balance due them, they were obliged to return and take back the old property. The valley was almost deserted for a period. In Sunnyside every business house but one, namely, William H. Cline's store, closed its doors.

But with the return of prosperity late in 1897 times in Sunnyside began to improve. The next spring J. B. George came to the town with another store; old lines of business were re-established and new ones founded, settlers began flocking into the country and a general industrial revival was experienced. Among the many new buildings of importance that were erected that spring was the Odd Fellows' hall, a two-story structure, of which the lower floor is fitted up as an opera house and public hall. It is a very creditable building to a town of Sunnyside's size.

During the early years of Sunnyside's history travelers crossed the Yakima river at Mabton, the nearest railroad station, on a scow ferry operated by Jock Morgan. At times the old scow was dangerous, and anyway the people desired something better than a ferry of any kind, so in the summer of 1897 a public meeting was held in Sunnyside for the purpose of taking steps to secure an improvement of conditions at the river crossing, of which meeting Joseph L. Lannin was president. A committee consisting of H. D. Jory, Tobias Beckner and Hugh Gray was appointed to look after the matter of building a bridge across the river. They laid the proposition before the board of county commissioners and secured an appropriation from the county, which, together with the generous donations of labor and money made by farmers and business men, including seven hundred dollars in cash and labor by the residents of Sunnyside, made possible, in 1898, the construction of the present substantial bridge.

About this time what is known as the Christian Co-operative movement was organized by Messrs. S. J. Harrison, Christian Rowland and H. M. Lichty for the purpose of colonizing the Sunnyside region. These three men had been associated for a number of years in church work, as members of the Dunkard, also known as the Brethren and German Baptist, religious sect. The gentlemen named met from year to year in the national conventions of their people. At one of these meetings, Mr. Harrison was chosen editor of the Evangelist, the denominational paper. For several years he and Mr. Lichy had considered the question of colonizing their people in some favored section of the west, and in the course of their investigations, Mr. Harrison spent a year in California. While looking over that section, Mr. Rowland was asked to join them, and did so. The party came very near agreeing on a point in the San Joaquin valley, but Mr. Rowland saw a promising field in Texas, and five or six investigating trips followed.

Mr. Lichy then drew the attention of his associates to the Sunnyside region. He had acted as bookkeeper in the Yakima National Bank for a short period, and by reason of his residence in the county was somewhat acquainted with its resources. Albert Saylor, his old friend and a former partner, who had lived ten years at North Yakima, urged Lichy to take advantage of the reduction that was made in 1897 in the price of Sunnyside lands. Messrs. Harrison, Rowland and Lichy looked upon the matter favorably and at once organized to carry out their long cherished project. They were members of the Brethren or Progressive division of the Dunkard church, but had many warm friends in the German Baptist, or Conservative, branch; so had little trouble in securing the enthusiastic indorsement of their scheme by D. L. Miller, a prominent colonizer of the latter branch.

Under the name of the Christian Co-operative Colony, the firm began work in 1897, bringing about twenty people into the district that year. Instead of colonizing their own people exclusively, they determined to embrace all Christian workers and secure, so far as possible, their co-operation in building up a Christian community. In their efforts they have been unusually successful. During the first six years of their work, Mr. Harrison estimates that they brought directly more than three hundred people into the Sunnyside region, besides exerting a powerful and ever increasing indirect influence. The Christian Co-operative Colony has done a great work in the Sunnyside valley. Its influence has ever been exerted for the substantial development of this noted irrigation district and the highest good of its citizens. Largely through the efforts of this firm the Christian Co-operative Telephone Association was organized, and many other public projects have been carried to success. Messrs. Harrison, Rowland and Lichy are still engaged in their work of colonizing. Mr. Rowland resides in Lanark, Illinois, the others in Sunnyside.

In the fall of 1899 Messrs. Harrison, Rowland and Lichy purchased the holdings of the Philadelphia Securities Company in the Sunnyside townsite. That corporation had acquired the property from the original owners through a mortgage. They still own about two hundred lots, the remainder having been disposed of to various individuals. The title is in Mr. Harrison's name. All deeds issued contain a forfeiture clause designed to keep out of the city saloons, gambling resorts and houses of ill-fame. At present Sunnyside is without any of these demoralizing institutions, and there is but one saloon in the entire valley.

So rapidly did the town grow after its resurrection in 1898, that by 1902 the citizens were able to incorporate under the state laws as a city of the fourth class. Attorney Henry H. Wende had charge of the matter. The town became a municipal corporation September 2d. Its first officers were: Mayor, James Henderson; councilmen, Joseph L. Lannin, W. B. Cloud, William Hitchcock, C. W. Taylor and George Vetter; treasurer, J. B. George; attorney, Henry H. Wende. Mr. Vetter became the city's second mayor, and Henry H. Wende its third. The latter is serving at present. The remaining city officials at present are: Councilmen, Elza Dean, W. B. Cloud, G. W. Reece, L. C. McDonald, E. J. Young; treasurer, L. E. Johnson; clerk, H. W. Turner; attorney, C. E. Woods; marshal, B. F. James. At the last city election one hundred and thirty-five votes were polled. Conservative estimates place the population of the city now at not less than seven hundred.

In educational and religious facilities, Sunnyside is especially blest, the development along these lines being abnormal for a young western town. As early as the spring of 1894, Mrs. Anna Williams, subsequently Mrs. Albert Wright, taught a private school in her own home to accommodate the few children then in the community. Later in the summer the pioneer public school was established in the Gillis building with Professor H. G. Rousch as teacher. He instructed between thirty and thirty-five pupils. In the fall the district built what is now known as the Emerson school. This building originally cost twenty-two hundred dollars, but a fifteen hundred-dollar addition was added in 1901. The same year, 1894, another school-house, now known as the Washington school, was erected, under the supervision of P. C. Bacon, two miles east of the village. It cost fifteen hundred dollars.

February 1, 1903, the districts numbered forty-four and forty-eight, embracing sixteen-square miles around Sunnyside, were merged into a union school district for the purpose of building and maintaining a high school. The Washington Irrigation Company donated to this district forty acres of land which netted it fourteen hundred dollars, while S. J. Harrison and H. M. Lichy gave two lots worth five hundred dollars. Then the district issued twenty thousand dollars in five per cent. bonds for the payment of its indebtedness and the erection on a fine five-acre tract in the northwestern part of the town of an eleven-thousand-dollar schoolhouse. The building is a handsome frame structure of modern design, resting on a stone foundation and very prettily located. It will be used this fall for the first time.

The school board of the Sunnyside union district maintaining the Emerson and Washington schools, before mentioned, and the high school, is now composed of Lee A. Johnson, J. B. George and F. W. Noble. More than four hundred and fifty pupils are enrolled in these schools. The corps of teachers in charge is as follows: Superintendent, Miss K. L. Brown; principal high school, Miss Maude M. Corson; assistant principal high school, J. C. Oliphant; commercial department, Mrs. W. B. Bridgman; Emerson school, eighth grade, E. M. Douglass; seventh grade, Miss Fannie Freeland; sixth grade, J. D. Marsh; fifth grade, Miss A. E. Rodman; fourth grade, Miss G. P. Searle; third grade, Miss M. A. Jacobs, principal Emerson school building; second and first grades, teachers not selected; Washington school, primary room, Miss H. G. Snyder, principal of the building; grammar room, Miss E. J. Jacobs. The high school courses are broad, including practically everything taught in any high school in the country.

Perhaps no town of like size in the state can boast of more or better churches than Sunnyside. The first church service in the city was held in Gillis' office in February, 1894, by Bishop Wells, of the Episcopal faith, and throughout all the early years the Episcopalians, Methodists and Congregationalists held services alternately, and a union Sunday school was maintained. Now there are ten religious bodies represented. The Sunnyside Sun, in its special issue last February, listed these and their membership as follows: Brethren, 92; Christian, 35; Baptist, 47; Congregational, 45; Episcopal, 40; Free Methodists, 60; German Baptist Brethren, 75; Methodists, 170; Presbyterian, 75, besides a society of Christian Scientists.

The Episcopal, German Baptist and Federated church buildings were all erected in the summer of 1901, and are substantial, handsome edifices. The Free Methodists completed a neat little church last winter. Rev. Edward J. Baird is rector of the Episcopal church, Rev. Rollins E. Blackman has charge of the Presbyterian, Rev. B. J. Hoadley of the Methodist, Rev. Whitmore of the Congregational, Rev. Slosser of the Baptist, Rev. S. P. Westfield of the Free Methodist, S. J. Harrison of the Dunkards, and Rev. S. H. Miller and D. B. Eby of the German Baptist.

The Federated church is so named because it was erected by the Sunnyside Church Federation, an incorporated body consisting of six different denominations, as follows: Baptist, Brethren (Progressive Dunkard), Methodist, Presbyterian, Christian and Congregational. This federated movement has been a grand success, and there is probably not a single denomination in the federation which is not numerically stronger to-day than it would have been if each had undertaken to go it alone. The expense of keeping up five or six separate establishments is obviated. Its growth has been unprecedented and the news of its success has been widely published.

The fraternal spirit is strong in Sunnyside, as is evinced by the presence of nine thriving lodges—Sunnyside Lodge, No. 49, I. O. O. F., and its auxiliary, Rebekah Lodge, Sunnyside Camp, No. 561, Modern Woodmen of America, with its auxiliary, the Royal Neighbors; Edith Lee Lodge, No. 73, A. O. U. W.; a Masonic lodge just being chartered, and lodges of the Fraternal Brotherhood of America, Order of Washington and Yeomen. The city churches also maintain various organizations for charitable and religious work, including a home-finding society.

Quite recently the city established a public library. To Mrs. Joseph L. Lannin belongs the credit of originating this enterprise and doing more than any other to carry it to a successful issue. Through her individual efforts a subscription of five hundred and fifty dollars was raised in the town, a donation of town lots valued at five hundred dollars secured from the owners of the townsite, and a promise of twelve hundred dollars' worth of land obtained from the Washington Irrigation Company. An organization was effected in October, 1902, with Mrs. Geneva Lannin as president; Rev. Lee Johnson, vice-president; H. Perin, secretary; S. J. Stewart, Mrs. J. R. Harvey, Henry Wende, J. W. Sanger and E. C. Taylor as trustees. However, before this administration was able to complete all arrangements, a new one was elected with William B. Bridgman as president, and a short time ago the library was purchased. Temporarily it occupies a rented building.

The Sunnyside Bank was organized April 15, 1902, by well-known Yakima county business men, with an authorized capital of twenty-five thousand dollars. A general banking and exchange business is transacted. This institution is fortunate in having for its stockholders and directors men of known business ability and experience. The directors and other officers are: S. J. Harrison, president; N. Woodin, vice-president; L. E. Johnson, cashier; P. J. Lichty, of Sunnyside, George Donald, president of the Yakima National Bank, and Miles Cannon, president of the Yakima Valley Bank.

Sunnyside has two telephone systems, a long distance system whose wires extend all over the Northwest, and a local line. What is now the Christian Co-operative Telephone Association, with its nearly two hundred telephones and its seventy-five miles of main line, connecting Prosser, Belma, Mabton, Outlook, Zillah, Toppenish, Parker and Wapato with each other and Sunnyside—its base and headquarters—was first conceived by Homer L. Brown, its former electrician, now deceased, and S. J. Harrison. Mr. Brown furnished the knowledge of the business, and Mr. Harrison and three associates the money to connect their own residences and run a line to Mabton, thus giving them connection with the railroad. This was in April, 1900. The original plan was simply to give a few neighbors and merchants in Sunnyside a telephone connection with the depot, seven miles away, but these gentlemen built better than they knew. They had started what those farmers, who were not neighbors in the strict sense of the word, saw that they wanted and must have. New members were added. New lines had to be built. An exchange had to be put in at Sunnyside. The benefit of the telephone spread from house to house. Mr. S. J. Harrison had up to this time assumed the responsibility of this growth, both financial and otherwise. The present association was incorporated at that time with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars, one thousand shares at fifty dollars each, with the following officers: S. J. Harrison, president; William LeMay, vice-president; R. D. Young, secretary and treasurer. At a recent meeting of the stockholders the price of stock was advanced to seventy-five dollars per share, or twenty-five dollars above the par value.

The city is connected with Mabton and Zillah by stage lines, now owned by Allen & Mathieson Bros. The Zillah stage makes daily trips; the Mabton stage makes three round trips daily except Sundays, when only two round trips are made. This excellent transportation system gives the city as many mails as any town on the railroad possesses. However, the historic stage bids fair to cease soon its labors in the Sunnyside valley, as there is every reason to believe that the Northern Pacific will soon build a belt line from Prosser to Toppenish, via Sunnyside, directly tapping one of the richest sections on its entire route.

One of the important enterprises of the Sunnyside valley and of the town is the Mountain View Creamery, established and owned by E. E. Ferson. For the year ending December 31, 1903, this institution gathered 137,474 pounds of cream. It made last year 39,307 pounds of butter, for which it received an average price of 22²/₃ cents, and paid out to its patrons the sum of $8,858.82, an average per month of $738.24. The concern is in a highly prosperous condition.

One of the real forces at work in the community—and one of no mean strength—is the Sunnyside Sun, to whose courtesy we are indebted for much information concerning the field in which it circulates. The first issue appeared May 24, 1901, and since that date the paper has steadily improved in every respect until it has become one of central Washington's leading weeklies. The Sun's founder, editor and proprietor is William Hitchcock.

A summary of the city's business houses and professional men would include the following:

The Sunnyside Sun, published every Friday; the Bank of Sunnyside; the Mountain View Creamery; general stores, J. B. George, Boutell Bros. & Company, Coffin Bros., C. S. Wenner, manager; hotels, the Sunnyside, G. G. Muller, proprietor, the Globe, S. E. Jones, proprietor, the Vetter, Frank Vetter, proprietor; livery stables, Allen & Mathieson Bros.; clothing, Valley Clothing store, W. B. Cloud, proprietor; hardware and furniture, Lee A. Johnson & Company; drug store, James Henderson; lumber yards, Sunnyside Lumber Company, R. L. Reese, manager, St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Company, E. A. Hamilton, manager; jewelry stores, Frank L. Maxham, R. S. Calkin; harness store, J. E. Fisher; restaurants, Frank Vetter, Rev. M. P. Westfield; grocery, C. F. Wheeler; meat markets, G. F. Barnes, Farmers' Market, W. C. Smith and L. L. Higgins, proprietors; confectionery and bakery, Frank Vetter; millinery, Mrs. A. H. Lyons; book store, Rev. A. H. Lyons; blacksmith shops, John Coney, Nathan Morris; undertaking parlors, M. D. Clarke; attorneys, Henry H. Wende, C. E. Woods, William B. Bridgman; physicians, Dr. J. R. Harvey, Dr. J. D. Campbell, Dr. F. C. Jones, osteopath; dentist, Dr. M. R. Kinner; real estate, Sunnyside Land & Investment Company, Elza Dean, general salesman, C. E. Woods, local manager and attorney, Milton & Meacham, William B. Bridgman, Frank H. McCoy; insurance, Rev. A. H. Lyons, L. C. Johnson, Dean Woods; photographer, William P. Jackson, A. K. Black; barber shops, two, owned by Brown & Fisk; tailor, L. B. Caple; contractors, Oliver Hibarger, J. E. Streiff, H. W. Holloway, Ira D. Martin, Caleb W. Taylor; painters, F. E. Lampkin, A. D. Cafferty, W. E. Lemming; plumbing, Sunnyside Plumbing & Heating Company, Frank Rodman; stove repairing, Robert Plant; billiard hall, bowling alley, etc., Pace Brothers; well drillers, Huston & Cabell Brothers, West Well Company; fine poultry breeder, H. W. Turner; Sunnyside Cemetery Association, William Hitchcock, president; M. D. Clarke, secretary; S. J. Harrison, treasurer.

The Sunnyside postoffice, George Vetter, postmaster, was advanced to the presidential class, January 1, 1904. The business of this office increased forty per cent. last year. There are now two rural free delivery routes connected with it.

Tributary to the city of Sunnyside is an area of thirty-five thousand acres of tillable land, of which at present nearly twenty thousand are in cultivation. It is estimated that fifteen thousand are in alfalfa, which last year yielded seventy-five thousand tons, selling at an average price of five dollars. One firm of stockmen, Courtney & Wright, bought thirty thousand tons of Sunnyside hay last season. Although there are several hundred acres of orchard and vineyards surrounding the city, this district is surpassed in horticulture by the upper canal district near Zillah. But berries, vegetables, etc., are produced abundantly, and it seems to be the general opinion among those competent to judge that Sunnyside will in the future be famous for its market gardening. Experts claim that the soil is especially adapted to this kind of intensive farming. One gardener last summer raised over five hundred dollars' worth of vegetables on half an acre of land within the corporate limits of the town. He marketed radishes, lettuce, onions, cabbage, cauliflower, beets, parsnips, carrots, turnips, lima beans, bush beans, peas, cucumbers, melons, celery, eggplant and tomatoes. Celery proved to be the best crop raised.

The healthfulness of Sunnyside may truthfully be said to be much greater than that usually found in irrigated districts. Dr. J. R. Harvey, one of Sunnyside's prominent physicians, states that during the past year there have been about fifteen cases of typhoid fever, of which only one proved fatal. Of pneumonia, in this same period, there were only two cases reported, neither of which terminated fatally. Sunnyside has not lost a case of pneumonia during the past three years. Although the people do not desire to advertise their section as a health resort, they feel that much injustice has been done them in the matter of health reports and claim to live in a section whose sanitary conditions are above the average.

KENNEWICK.

In the southeastern part of Yakima county, and eighty-seven miles from its seat of justice and local government, is the thriving town of Kennewick. It enjoys an exceedingly fortunate location, being about midway between Spokane and Puget sound, while its low elevation, three hundred and sixty-five feet above sea level, gives to it and the country immediately surrounding the advantage of a semi-tropical climate. Certainly no town in the state surpasses it in the brevity and mildness of its winter seasons. "Here smiling spring its earliest visit pays," while autumn's delightful charm lingers long after winter has enfolded most of the other towns of the state in its chill embrace.

The advantage of a warm, genial climate to a town depending in large measure upon fruit culture for its support is fully apparent. A high price always rewards the men who can first get their fruit products on the market. The earliest strawberries often command prices several times greater than those which often obtain even a week or two afterwards, and the same is true of other small fruits. Kennewick growers are in a position to outdo practically all competitors in the matter of early berries, for they enjoy a season earlier by two or three weeks than do growers in most other parts of their own county, one of the warmest in the state. Indeed, it is claimed that they can even antedate with their products the horticulturists of the famed Hood River valley of Oregon.

Inasmuch as Kennewick is located in an arid plain of great extent, one would hardly expect it to be favored with an environment specially pleasing to the eye, but the surrounding country is not without scenic beauty. Far to the east, the wondrous Blue mountains rear skyward their lofty crests; on the south the general level finds at length a boundary in the hillsides which form the stairway to the prodigious Horse Heaven wheat plateau; away to the northward shadowy uplands, clad in the beautiful hue which nature delights to give to all distant objects, stand projected against the paler blue of the sky; while right at one's feet is the great Columbia, world-famed for its beauty. A trip to the center of the railway bridge which spans at Kennewick this mighty river places one in a position to view its pellucid waters, and soon the beholder is convinced that it needs not the embellishment of verdure-clad banks to give it a divine charm. Though its currents are not of crystal clearness, a greenish blue cast has been imparted to them which, while it takes away transparency, adds a touch which appeals most strongly to the aesthetic eye. At times the Columbia, as seen from the bridge, suggests to one the river of Addison's vision, which appeared to emerge from a deep mist at one end of the valley and to lose itself in a deep mist at the other.

On the Columbia plains contiguous to Kennewick may be observed the exceeding gorgeousness of coloring which is wont to characterize the advent and departure of the sun in desert places—a gorgeousness never equaled in more favored localities—while here and there a wealth of verdure contrasts strongly with the sandy, sage brush plains, and gives earnest of the beauty which shall here develop, when irrigation shall have done its perfect work.

The history of Kennewick for many years is one of long waiting and hope deferred. When the railroad made its way into the country in 1883, and it was known that eventually a bridge would span the great Columbia at this point, the fact that a town would one day be built became apparent to some of the men engaged in construction work. C. J. Beach, who was at that time in the company's employ, filed upon government land in the vicinity, and his homestead is a part of the townsite. The other part was railroad land. The first building in town was Beach's house, which still stands, but the honor of having erected the first structure for business purposes belongs to one Joseph Diamond. It was built in 1884 and filled with a small stock of general merchandise. Mr. Diamond catered to the trade of the railway employees, during the period of road building, then to the needs of settlers in the vicinity, until about 1890, when he removed to Walla Walla. Several merchants had stores in Kennewick at different times, and blacksmith shops and saloons were opened—perhaps a few other business establishments also, but the growth of the place was slight until 1892, when an attempt was made to irrigate the arid lands contiguous. It was then that the town was regularly platted. Mr. Beach tells us that the village received its rather peculiar name in this way: The railway company, desiring to name the town to be after the first white man to visit its site, aside from those of Lewis and Clarke's party, made some inquiry among the Indians as to who of the pale-face race first came among them. The simple natives tried to say "Chenoweth," referring to an early trapper, but corrupted the name into something which sounded like "Kennewick," and Kennewick the town was christened.

The Yakima Irrigation and Improvement Company, for such was the name of the aggregation of progressive individuals who first sought to redeem the Kennewick country, did not meet with complete success, though it spent much money in the construction of a lengthy canal from the Horn rapids of the Yakima river, some seven miles below Kiona. The work of this company gave a temporary impetus to Kennewick, and in the years 1892 and 1893 there was a very considerable influx of people. It was then that the magnificent Columbia Hotel building was erected. But the ditch was too small and totally inadequate; the irrigation company was unable to enlarge it, owing to the hard times which began to oppress all classes in 1894; so the town suspended developments and soon relapsed into much the same condition it was in before the quickening resulting from this enterprise.

The return of prosperity brought renewed activity to the Columbia plains, as to other parts of the state and nation, but it was not until 1902 that the work of town building was resumed at Kennewick in good earnest. The ditch, water right and realty holdings of the old irrigation company passed at length into the hands of what is known as the Northern Pacific Irrigation Company, which in February of the year designated began the work of enlarging the ditch. This undertaking was intrusted to Superintendent John Russell, a competent and careful man, who, supplied with abundant means and instructed to do a good job at all cost, has built what is claimed to be the finest irrigation canal in the state. At Kennewick, twenty-one miles from the head-gate, it is five feet deep, eighteen feet wide on the bottom and twenty-eight on top. The ditch is thirty miles long and so situated that about fifteen thousand acres can be irrigated from it. A perpetual water right costs the farmer or horticulturist about thirty-five dollars an acre, and a maintenance fee of a dollar an acre a year is thereafter charged.

Though the ditch was not completed in time for use in 1902, it has already produced a wonderful effect in the development of Kennewick. The population of the town a year ago last May was fifty. In May, 1903, it was estimated at four hundred, and conservative men now claim for Kennewick a population of five hundred. Almost all the present business houses have been opened in the past eighteen months, so a simple enumeration of them gives a good idea of the commercial development wrought in that brief period. They are: Dry goods and furnishings, Scott & Company; general merchandise, Johnson & Fullerton, Robert Geary, Coffin Brothers, L. S. Erley; hardware, Ridow & Schweikert; hardware and furniture, H. A. Bier; Exchange Bank of Kennewick, S. H. Amon, president, John Sherman, vice-president, J. R. Amon, cashier; shoe and second-hand store, T. S. Cantrill; drug store, H. R. Haynes; blacksmith shop, Charles E. Reed; carpenter shop, Schroeder & Callahan; real estate, C. J. Beach, C. A. Lundy, Cosgrove & Hanson, C. F. Freithaupt, H. A. Hover; shaving parlors, J. F. Shafer and B. F. Nye; livery and feed stables, H. E. Beach and C. M. Lloyd; lumber yards, St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Company and Frank Emigh; saloons, N. R. Sylvester, Hawkins & Wilkie; hotels, the Antlers, William Keefer, proprietor, the Hotel Hover, H. A. Hover, proprietor, the Hampshire House, C. P. Stanyan, proprietor, and the Hotel Kennewick (the last named of which was built by C. J. Beach in 1892); Japanese restaurant; confectionery, etc., W. A. Morain; postmistress, Ida M. Morain; confectionery and ice-cream, B. F. Nye; wall paper and paint, M. P. Fuller; attorneys, Daniel Boyd and Fay Dean, the latter being also an abstractor; physicians, Drs. William Pallister and J. W. Hewitson; music teacher, Mabel Haney; newspaper, the Columbia Courier, C. A. Anderson, editor.

There are two churches in Kennewick—the Presbyterian and one used by the Congregationalists and Methodists jointly. The Modern Woodmen of America have a flourishing local camp, and a camp of their auxiliary society, the Royal Neighbors of America, has also been established. The Kennewick public school district was organized in 1884. At that time it was twelve miles square and contained fifty-four children of school age. The present schoolhouse, which was erected in 1893, is a two-room structure in which a graded school is maintained during nine months of each year. An addition the importance of which can hardly be estimated has recently been made to the educational facilities of the town by the establishment there of the Academy Emanuel. The superb building* originated inally erected by the Yakima Irrigation and Improvement Company for hotel purposes has been purchased by Matinas O. and Mrs. Carolina Klitten, and is now being renovated and fitted for the use of the academy at a cost of about seven thousand dollars. The people of Kennewick take great pride in this institution, but as it is described in some detail elsewhere in this volume, extended reference to it here is unnecessary.

An enumeration of the attractive features of Kennewick would surely include notice of the very extensive and superb collection of curios belonging to D. W. Owen. Though it is a strictly private collection, it has attracted not a little notice from government naturalists and curio hunters far and near. Mr. Owen receives many letters of inquiry from persons in all parts of the United States, while an occasional communication reaches him from some point in the British Isles. A man of seventy-three summers, he has been an enthusiastic collector from his earliest years, and the result is a miniature museum. It includes mounted animals and birds, petrified objects, fossil remains, rare pottery, heirlooms, buffalo robes and other skins, specimens of Indian handiwork, arrow heads, ancient pottery, pictures of monstrosities, a Buddhist idol, portions of papyrus with Greek characters inscribed thereon, curios from Pompeii, the holy land, the far north and the far south, pieces of wood from the steamer Beaver, the Charter Oak and other historic structures, specimens of the continental and other paper money of two centuries or more ago, ancient American coins, rare foreign coins, shells, beautiful agates, opals and other precious stones and many things rare and interesting. The collection and the kind hospitality of the enthusiastic curio lover who owns it have made a deep and lasting impression upon the mind of the writer.

It is hoped that the foregoing paragraphs of this sketch have conveyed to the reader some idea of the town of Kennewick and the country contiguous to it, past and present. One of the most hopeful portents of its future is the faith and courage of its inhabitants. These are not backward in pointing out to the visitor that the Northern Pacific Railway Company believes in and is partial to their town, and some of them infer that the recent building of a five-thousand-dollar passenger depot and the expressed intention of the company to build a freight depot of like cost, together with other unmistakable signs, indicate an intention to build down the north bank of the Columbia at no distant date, thus making Kennewick an important distributing center and railway point. "At any rate," say they, "the state of Oregon will build a portage road around The Dalles, has appropriated money for that purpose already—and soon the cheery whistle of the steamboat will greet our ears."

These people are firm in the belief that the warm, dry, healthful climate of their section, its excellent drainage to the Columbia river, its rich, volcanic soil, the superb system of irrigation with which it is supplied, its early seasons, its splendid location, its excellent railway facilities and its inexhaustible markets must secure for their town and country a high and abundant development.

MABTON.

Mabton, a bustling village on the Northern Pacific railroad thirty-eight miles southeast of North Yakima, lies at the extreme eastern edge of the Yakima Indian reservation in the lower valley of the Yakima. It is the shipping point of the rich Sunnyside district and considerable of the fertile Horse Heaven and Bickleton wheat belt, a fact in itself sufficient to give more than ordinary importance to the station. A few years ago Mabton was but a telegraph point with a side track and a store; to-day it is a lively, rapidly growing place of probably one hundred and fifty people with exceedingly bright prospects for the future.

Thousands of acres of rich, arid sage brush soil surround Mabton on every side. The great stretches of dull gray plains, for the most part practically level or slightly undulating, extend for miles up and down the valley, which winds three or four miles wide between Snipes mountain and the Columbia river divide. Across the river a mile and a half north of Mabton, green fields and foliage mark the beginning of the Sunnyside irrigated district, which extends back many miles, reaching far up the slope of the Rattlesnake range and as far as the eye can see up and down the river. Through a low gap in the high basaltic wall to the north, a glimpse may be had at this writing of a verdant wheat field, tokening the lower edge of Yakima's cereal region, but not one green spot is to be seen on the vast plain below; only the promise of a great future, when irrigation shall have begun its transforming task.

The reason for the present condition of this valley land is that the lower end of the reservation is still without water, and the presence of the large reserve makes it almost impossible to carry out any canal project which has for its object the irrigation of the valley below the reservation. It is quite probable that the new government ditch will be extended so as to cover most of the reservation, and some of the Mabton region, but it is thought that in order to bring water upon all the land in the vicinity of and beyond Mabton, a canal will have to be taken out of the Naches river. This would be an expensive undertaking, but enterprising men have nevertheless applied for permission to build an aqueduct across the reservation, and are now preparing plans for its construction. The opening of the reservation which is expected to take place in the near future, will greatly simplify the water problem, and, owing to Mabton's fine natural location, will give a mighty impetus to the life of that town.

When Samuel P. Flower, formerly of Bickleton, erected a warehouse and store building at Mabton in June, 1892, the only other structures there were a section house and a water tank. They stood on the reservation a few yards west of the line. Mr. Flower's building was placed on the company's right of way just west of the section house. His small stock of general merchandise occupied one end of the little warehouse, and his customers were the few homesteaders in the region and those who occasionally came to Mabton siding to ship stock. The next year the railway company built a station and installed T. W. Howell as telegraph operator. That year also Edward F. Flower became the pioneer postmaster of the Mabton settlement. In 1894 Tobias Beckner established his present general store, just off the reservation; in 1895 Frank Martin opened the Hotel Mabton on its present site; school district No. 36 was also organized and a little frame schoolhouse built a mile and a half southeast of Mabton, in which Miss Lima Platt taught the pioneer school during the winter of 1895-96. The year following a substantial depot building took the place of the telegraph station.

The next business to be established at Mabton was Tilton F. Phillips' general store, which came in 1898. A year later George Miller opened a blacksmith shop; then came J. L. Brewer's harness shop, and in 1901 the Hub Mercantile Company's store, the North Yakima Milling Company's warehouse, the Birk Hotel, built by Ferdinand Selle, and other business concerns. Mabton's greatest development, however, came in 1903, and at the present writing it is rapidly expanding along all lines; nor is its growth unnatural or in any degree the result of an effort to boom the place for purposes of speculation.

The original townsite lies in section one, township eight north, range twenty-two east, being upon railroad land. Of this section, one hundred and eighty-eight acres are within the reservation. So strong was the demand made for a townsite that about the first of the year 1901 the railway company platted eight acres of this section adjoining the depot grounds. The lots were all soon sold, and May 16, 1902, Joseph A. Humphrey and Mrs. Amy M. Flower purchased the remainder of section one—four hundred and forty-four acres. They incorporated the Mabton Townsite Company, which has platted one hundred acres into town lots, practically all of the property being south of the railroad. Northeast of this and the original townsite and adjoining the reservation, lies Phillips' addition of forty acres, which is a portion of the southeast quarter of section thirty-one, township nine, range twenty-three, originally the Dalton Mansfield homestead, filed upon in the early nineties. Fred Phillips subsequently acquired the homestead through relinquishment. The reservation line passes through the center of the town as now built up, those living on Indian land leasing it; but it is quite probable that this condition of affairs will not long continue. The town is as yet unincorporated.

District No. 36 held a special election May 28, 1904, at which, by a vote of fifty-three to five, the taxpayers voted to issue bonds in the sum of four thousand dollars for the purpose of building a new brick schoolhouse. The site selected is on the Mabton Townsite Company's addition south of the tracks; the building will be erected this summer. The old schoolhouse southeast of town was abandoned after the first year's use, the district accepting the offer of the Methodists to use their church at Mabton. This comfortable little building has served as both church and schoolhouse since that time. It was built in 1894. At present the Presbyterian society also uses the building. Rev. H. E. Hoadley conducts the Methodist services. The Mabton school board is composed of Tilton F. Phillips, E. J. Eide-miller and Ewald Selle. Miss Mary McKay and Miss A. M. Cone will have charge of the school next year.

An interesting enterprise is now under way at Mabton, namely, the drilling of an artesian well, the Mabton Townsite Company being engaged in this laudable undertaking. At this writing the drill is down eight hundred and forty feet.

Mabton's business interests are much larger than a casual observer would judge. Last December (1904) the freight receipts at this station are reliably reported to have been between thirty thousand and thirty-five thousand dollars, and December was not an unusual business month. Some days as high as twenty cars are loaded with wheat, hay and fruit from the Bickleton, Horse Heaven and Sunnyside districts.

The Mabton Chronicle was established by Bernard J. Pacius, May 12, 1904, and is a creditable weekly, a six-column folio, independent in politics. It occupies a cozy, well-equipped office. A directory of the town's other business men and establishments follows: General stores, Tilton F. Phillips & Company, the Hub Mercantile Company, of which Charles Bilger is manager, and The Spot, owned by N. J. Beckner; lumber, lime, cement, etc., Samuel P. Flower & Company, St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Company, Dean D. Stair, manager, and the Cascade Lumber Company; hotels, The Mabton, Frank Martin, proprietor, East Side Hotel, C. M. Christy, proprietor; livery, Cyrus O. Wommack; restaurants, J. B. Early, Roy Glaze; warehouses, Interior Warehouse Company, Balfour Guthrie & Co., proprietors, Tacoma Grain Company, James Skirving, manager; feed, flour, grain, North Yakima Milling Company, Edward Eidemiller, manager; blacksmith shop, A. Safstrom; drug store, Mabton Drug Company, Alexander Angus, proprietor; barber shop, J. S. McArthur; temperance hall, Herbert Kenyon; boots and shoes, Frank M. Nelson; real estate, Mabton Townsite Company, Samuel P. Flower, manager, Fred Phillips, W. L. Leonard, Fred Selle, J. B. Early; lawyer, George W. Paswater; physician and dentist, Dr. James E. Stephenson; plumber, house-moving, Ewald Selle; carpenters and contractors, Ernest A. Colby, A. W. McKinney, N. E. Litherland.

A thrice-day line of stages is operated by Allen & Mathieson between Sunnyside and Mabton, and a tri-weekly line between Mabton and Bickleton by C. O. Wommack. The Pacific States and the Christian Co-operative Telephone Companies have lines extending into the town.

TOPPENISH.

Situated about the center of a large, fertile valley on the main line of the Northern Pacific Railway, nineteen miles southeast of North Yakima, is Toppenish, the principal trading and shipping point on the Yakima Indian reservation. At present it has perhaps a hundred inhabitants, but the volume of its business transactions would do credit to a place of much larger population.

Toppenish is an Indian word, applied also to a creek whose source is in the Simcoe mountains, the valley's western boundary. In the Yakima tongue, "toppenish" is said to mean "sloping," and in the Klickitat, "the main or highest trail."

The valley in which Toppenish lies is similar in shape, except that it is longer, to the valley surrounding North Yakima. It is bounded on the north by the Columbia river divide, on the south by the Simcoe range, and on the east and west by low hills pierced by the river. The Toppenish and Satus creeks, whose sources are in the Simcoe range, flow through the reservation. As the valley reaches the foothills, the lands become very broken and rough, except in these creek valleys, where the principal Indian settlements are.

When the Northern Pacific Railway was built through the reservation, in the middle eighties, a section house, water tank and telegraph station were established there. The point was designated Toppenish. Some years later stock yards were built by the company, side tracks were put in and a station agent was appointed. W. J. Jordan in 1888 became the station's second agent, and with his advent the shipping business began at once to increase materially.

Thomas Stalen, late in the eighties, opened a trading post on the reservation about three miles below Toppenish, but conducted it only a short time. In 1890 N. H. Lillie secured a post-trader's license from the government and opened the first business house in Toppenish, his building being erected on the south side of the track. A postoffice was also established in 1890, Mr. Lillie becoming the first postmaster.

George Harvey in 1895 succeeded Lillie as post-trader at Toppenish, but in the fall of 1896 sold out his business to J. B. George, who erected the building now forming the rear portion of the Hotel Toppenish. This same year William L. Shearer became station agent, relieving Mr. Jordan. Two years later, in August, 1898, another mercantile establishment entered the community, the Toppenish Trading Company, of which F. A. Williams was the manager and principal owner. This concern soon became the official trading post, which resulted in its becoming master of the business situation. In the meantime Mrs. Carrie Staten secured George's old building and opened a hotel, but she soon after sold to Mrs. S. E. Stone, who leased the place to her son, Harry Stone. The station also had a blacksmith shop at this time, established by Lillie, for whom John Palmer conducted it at first.

About 1898, also, white men began leasing large areas of the reservation, inaugurating the present universal method of farming the valley lands. The first government canal on the reservation was built during 1896-7, covering an area of twenty thousand acres. This aqueduct diverts water from the Yakima river near Wapato, flows for twelve miles in an easterly direction across the valley and empties into Toppenish creek. From the first, the agricultural experiments on the reservation proved highly successful, with the result that white settlers flocked into the region by the score, rapidly placing the Indian lands under cultivation. This year more than five thousand acres of this area will be farmed. A larger area would be cultivated if leasing conditions were more favorable.

From the inception of the leasing regime and the revival of the Sunnyside canal region after the hard times, Toppenish has grown steadily and rapidly, especially as a shipping and receiving point. One by one new business houses have been established, large warehouses erected, old businesses enlarged and trade facilities increased and improved. Among the new institutions may be particularly mentioned the Hotel Toppenish, begun two years ago by Ira Pearsoll, and completed by the present owners, Charles H. Newell and A. N. Sarjent; they opened it for business June 3, 1902. This hotel is three stories high, built of wood, and is quite a pretentious structure for a small town. Another business institution of especial importance is the Washington nursery, established two years ago by former residents of Salem, Oregon. This nursery is one of the best in central Washington and is doing a rapidly increasing business. J. P. McDonald is manager.

As a shipping point Toppenish is one of Yakima county's wonders. Last year (1903) between thirteen hundred and fourteen hundred cars were required to ship the immense quantities of hay, fruits, potatoes, hops and live stock raised in the tributary region. To dispose of the 1904 crop a much greater number of cars will be required. Five miles of the new government canal, which is designed to irrigate fully fifty thousand acres, have already been completed, and by the utilization of its magic life-giving power, more than three thousand acres are this year being converted from sage brush prairie into thrifty farms. Work on the canal was begun last fall. Each year the government will appropriate money for its extension until the proposed twenty miles are finished. The project is of gigantic importance to the county. The government's two canals will place practically all the valley under irrigation, furnishing homes for thousands of people, although a general settlement will not be effected so long as the present Indian department rules remain in force. Five commission houses handle the shipping interests.

One of the signs of progressiveness at once noticed in this thrifty community is its excellent educational advantages. The fact that every white inhabitant of the district, with the exception of those living upon the railroad's right of way, is there purely by Indian sufferance has not in the least prevented Toppenish from having one of the best schools in the county. Mrs. Powell taught the pioneer school in 1898. In 1901 district No. 49 leased a small tract of land from T. P. Robbins for ten years and erected thereon a two-room building. Last year the capacity of the building was doubled, bringing the aggregate cost up to forty-two hundred dollars, which was raised by special tax. The schoolhouse is supplied with the most approved equipment of all kinds, and has been so built that if necessary it may be moved at small cost. The district has purchased a library valued at two hundred and fifty dollars, to which it is constantly adding, and owns two organs. Two high school grades are maintained, and next year a drawing and music teacher will be added to the corps. Last year the one hundred and sixty pupils enrolled were under the instruction of Principal Halbert Lawrence, Miss Alice Clark and Miss Kate Hitz. The school board of this unusually progressive district is composed of William L. Shearer, William McAuliff and W. R. Laidler.

The town has one church (the Methodist), of which Rev. J. J. CaHaway is resident pastor. This society erected its cozy, substantial house of worship in 1898 upon a tract of leased land which the society has the prior privilege of purchasing when offered for sale.

Toppenish labors under one unfortunate disadvantage in that it occupies leased land, with the exception of a strip five hundred and ninety feet wide owned by the railroad company. The remainder of the site east of the track is land leased to the whites by Mrs. S. E. Stone, of Indian and white parentage. Lancaster Spencer, an Indian, owns the rest of the site lying west of the railroad. This land, under the law, cannot be sold at the present time. Should serious trouble arise between lessees and lessors, it is possible that the town would be removed to an eighty-acre tract adjoining the eastern side of the railway grant half a mile above the station, as F. A. Williams purchased this land from the government last December at a price of one hundred and one dollar and fifty cents an acre. Mr. Williams is the principal stockholder of the Toppenish Trading Company.

However, despite the unfortunate condition of the townsite, the inhabitants of Toppenish appear to regard the matter as merely an impediment and not a menace to their town's growth. Substantial buildings are constantly going up, including the new stone warehouse of Richey & Gilbert. When finished, this structure will have a total length of two hundred and fifty feet and a width of eighty feet. A directory of the town's business houses would include the following:

General merchandise, Toppenish Trading Company, Coffin Brothers; lumber, the St. Paul & Taconia Lumber Company, carrying approximately nine hundred thousand feet of lumber, besides lime, cement, laths, shingles, etc., W. H. Holt, manager; commission firms, Richey & Gilbert, Coffin Brothers, Toppenish Trading Company, John L. Craib, J. M. Perry & Company; hotels, The Toppenish, Charles H. Newell and A. M. Sarjent, proprietors, The Staten, Frank Snipes, proprietor; nursery, Washington Nursery Company, J. D. McDonald, manager; bakery, confectionery, Adolphus Gaunt; blacksmith shops, Cantrell & Gibson, Lancaster Spencer; meat markets, T. P. Robbins (established in 1901), Casey & Bond; barber shop, Adolphus Gaunt; cigars and confectionery, Stephenson Brothers; station agent, express agent and postmaster, W. L. Shearer.

Toppenish is well located and is fortunate in possessing broad-minded, progressive business men who will make the most of the advantages which their town possesses in situation and natural resources.

ZILLAH.

The town that bears this pretty name lies on the high northern bluff of the Yakima river four miles northeast of Toppenish, the nearest railway point, in the very heart of the fruit-growing section of the Yakima valley irrigated by the Sunny-side canal. Fully one hundred and fifty people make their homes in the village.

Nature has dealt most generously with the region surrounding and tributary to Zillah. Its beauty is truly surpassing. The swift waters of the Yakima course noisily through their wood-fringed channels eighty feet below the level of the town, then wind prettily down the valley, presenting an entrancing water scene. Off to the south and west, across the Indian reservation, the horizon is converted into a broken line by the Cascade and Simcoe ranges, from which the whitened dome of Mount Adams and the sharp peaks of Mount Ranier rise into conspicuous prominence. To the north lies the high rocky divide separating the Columbia and Yakima watersheds; but by far the most fascinating sight, for many reasons, is that of the country reclaimed by the great life-giving canal and its hundreds of miles of small arteries. The course of the Sunnyside canal is plainly marked upon the dull gray landscape by a wide strip of verdant hay and grain fields, innumerable orchard tracts, pretty farm buildings and rows of stately, waving poplars. Dale and hillside alike have responded to the efforts of the husbandman. The verdure and luxuriance of their new life are fairly dazzling. The object-lesson of irrigation is here overwhelming in its vividness and force. If ever the desert has "blossomed as the rose," it is in the region around Zillah. What is of probably greater importance in this commercial age, this quondam desert is now producing the necessities and luxuries of life in quantities that are rapidly enriching the fortunate owners of the land.

The head-gates of the canal are twelve miles above the town, but, owing to the topography of the country, the cultivated strip between the aqueduct and river is quite narrow for the entire distance, and even a few miles farther; but the region is all intensively farmed and supports a large population, most of whom are engaged in fruit-growing. The soil consists of decomposed lava, volcanic ash and alluvial wash from the surrounding mountains, from twenty-five to one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth and wonderfully rich in all the elements of fertility. The rolling topography of the region watered by the upper portion of the canal adapts it particularly to horticulture; hence it is that we find that industry the principal one, apples being the chief fruit raised. The next crop of importance is alfalfa. Just what amount the Zillah region produces it is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy, but the region furnished most of the twelve hundred cars of produce shipped from Toppensish last year. The climate is very favorable, and an altitude of eight hundred feet and good drainage contribute to the healthfulness of the locality. With such a region from which to draw its support, Zillah can hardly fail to prove a permanent commercial center, and when the Yakima reservation, embracing the rich lowlands across the river, is placed under cultivation, the town will draw support from it also.

As might be supposed, Zillah came into being with the construction of the Sunnyside canal in the early nineties, and its growth has been contemporaneous with that of the surrounding country. Walter N. Granger, the promoter of the great canal and its only general superintendent, selected the townsite in the spring of 1892, acting for the Zillah Townsite Company. Of this corporation he was president, while Paul Schultze, Thomas F. Oakes, William Hamilton Hall and C. A. Spofford, the last named acting for Henry Villard, were trustees. Seventy acres of railroad and state land were platted for the new town.

Some time in April, shortly after the selection of the townsite, a party of railroad and canal officials, including President Oakes, his wife and daughter, visited the place in charge of Mr. Granger. The question of naming the town arose, and, after some discussion, Mr. Schultze suggested Zillah, in honor of Miss Zillah Oakes. Then and there the party adopted this pleasing and rather striking name, and by it the town has ever since been known.

The next step in the town's growth was the establishment some weeks later of its first business house, the Zillah Hotel, built by Reuben Hatch. This commodious building is still in use. At the same time the Northern Pacific & Yakima Irrigation Company erected its present handsome, substantial offices. A little later E. J. Jaeger and George Harvey, partners, opened a general store opposite the irrigation company's building, and Col. R. C. Walker was appointed postmaster. Then came the Puyallup Drug Company's store, in charge of C. H. Williams; a hardware store, owned by the present stockholders of the Yakima Hardware Company, and managed by Arthur Knowles, and Blagdon's blacksmith shop. By the first of the year 1893 Zillah had a population of perhaps fifty people.

The year 1893 was an important one in the town's history. The mercantile firm of Jaeger & Harvey was dissolved and a new one formed by Jaeger and J. B. George. J. P. Fox succeeded Blagdon in the blacksmith shop; C. S. Hale opened a livery barn and a meat market; Dr. Andrew McCracken and Harry Armitage purchased the drug store, and a few new business enterprises were started. An unusually heavy spring flood of the river washed out fully ten acres of the townsite, resulting, however, only in the loss of the land. The town has suffered one further loss of this kind, the spring flood of 1904 having been attended by similar consequences; but it is thought that the channel is now permanently fixed, as it is straight. In 1893 also the hardware and drug stores were burned. Both were rebuilt. E. W. Dooley opened a saloon about this time which was subsequently destroyed by fire.

School district No. 32 was organized in 1894 and a comfortable frame schoolhouse built. With improvements since added, this building has cost twenty-two hundred dollars. It is indeed one in which the district has reason to take pride. Edna Haines taught the first two terms in it, and Fred Haines, Joseph Lucas and ——— Gale comprised the first school board. At present this school is taught by Principal S. S. Busch, assisted by Grace and Ossie Laughlin.

Zillah has grown steadily, though slowly, since its establishment, always keeping pace with the surrounding country, but never experiencing a convulsive boom. It is now on a more substantial basis than ever before. Until a railroad reaches it, Zillah cannot excel as a business point, but as a residence town and country commercial center, it stands high.

The Episcopal, Christian and Methodist churches have organized in Zillah, and three years ago the first named society erected a fine stone church, costing twenty-five hundred dollars. Rev. E. J. Baird is the present rector. The two other societies occupy the Modern Woodmen hall, a substantial frame building erected by Zillah Lodge, No. 5577, M. W. A., which has a large membership. The lodge also has a thriving auxiliary, the local organization of the Royal Neighbors. The community has three other lodges—Zillah Lodge, No. 175, I. O. F., and its auxiliary, and a lodge of the Order of Washington.

The most important business institution of the place is the headquarters of the Washington Irrigation Company, in charge of Superintendent Walter N. Granger and a large staff of other canal company officials. The offices are in a handsome frame building, erected upon a beautiful site and so situated as to at once attract the attention of the passing visitor.

Two stage lines and two telephone (local and long distance) lines give Zillah intimate connection with the outside world. A twice-a-day stage is operated by C. H. Furman between Zillah and Toppenish, while Allen & Mathieson run a daily stage between Zillah and Sunnyside.

Zillah's other business men and establishments are: The Zillah Hotel, Cornelius H. Furman, proprietor; general store, Edward J. Jaeger; hardware, groceries, undertaking, Edward L. Lawrence; meats and groceries, Henry Randolph; bakery and feed store, Mrs. M. Jennie McCleery; drug stores, Dr. Andrew McCracken and Dr. James H. Barthley, the proprietors being general practitioners of medicine; jewelry, John Bergman; blacksmiths, Archie J. Elliott, W. R. Newell & Bro. (David A.); millinery, Mrs. Ida E. Clute; real estate, Dell A. Fox, C. H. Furman; postmaster, John P. Fox; barber shop, Frank J. Sprague; a saloon.

Zillah is as yet unincorporated.

YAKIMA CITY.

The early history of Yakima City, the first town to be established in the Yakima country, is so intimately interwoven with the general history of Yakima county that it has been treated of in that connection. To tell again the story of the founding of this business center, to trace its growth from a mere hamlet to a thriving county seat of nearly two thousand population, to describe the numerous stirring events of which it was the scene, to detail the interesting story of its struggle against the rise of North Yakima, its loss of the county seat to the rival town and its subsequent decline for many years, would be useless repetition. Yakima City has experienced its share of the vicissitudes of fickle fortune, but to-day its people rejoice in the stability and prosperity of their town and are firm in their belief that a bright future is before them.

Yakima City is situated on the western bank of the Yakima river, four miles south of North Yakima, on the line of the Northern Pacific Railway. Its location is both pleasing and convenient. The presence of an abundance of shade trees and other foliage and the fine view of the river and the surrounding country give their charm to the place. Two passenger trains stop daily to accommodate the traffic, while a mail stage operates daily (except Sunday) between the town and Fort Simcoe. A mile south of the town is Union Gap, which is the northern gateway into the rich Toppenish valley and Parker bottom region, much of whose trade comes to Yakima City.

The town has always been an important trading post, and to-day the business interests are well represented by prosperous establishments. Edwin H. Taylor, who is also postmaster, Mrs. Elizabeth Carmichael and Herman Kampmeier have general stores; W. Z. York has a feed, second-hand, saddlery and notion store combined with a wood yard; Albert Piche and Milton Hildreth own meat markets; Charles Campbell and Joseph Brownlow maintain hotels; Charles Campbell has a livery stable; Captain J. H. Thomas, owner of most of the townsite, and Cowles & Butler are in the real estate business; there are two saloons; B. H. McNeel is station agent, and there are a telephone exchange, express office and a telegraph station in the town. Besides these establishments, Yakima City possesses two important manufacturing concerns—a flouring mill and a creamery. The mill, which is the old Schanno property, has a capacity of thirty barrels a day and is operated most of the year by its owner, Edward Goins. Mrs. Elizabeth Carmichael owns the Yakima City creamery, a fair-sized plant, built two years ago, while Thomas H. Wheeler is the proprietor of the Yakima dairy, a large concern. Three church societies are established in the town—the Roman Catholic, the Methodist Episcopal and the Christian, the last two occupying a union church. Rev. A. C. Williamson, of the Methodist church, is the only resident pastor. A four-room school is taught by C. M. Beardsley, principal, W. A. Bowers and Miss Ruby Vertner. There are two secret organizations—Yakima Camp, No. 10, 228, M. W. A., and its auxiliary.

It is not at all improbable that Yakima City will in the near future possess a fine beet sugar factory. The whole Yakima valley is supporting the town in its efforts to secure this concern, which seems sure to locate somewhere in the Yakima country. It is said that one man alone has guaranteed half the necessary capital for a four-hundred-thousand-dollar plant, and the deal is now being closed for the granting of an eighty-acre tract of land requested by the company. Such a manufactory, together with the opening of the Indian reservation, the boundary of which is only a mile distant from Yakima City, cannot fail to give the pioneer town a great impetus.

The town is incorporated under the general state laws, its present corps of officers being: Mayor, John L. Baker; councilmen, John L. Druse, Marshall Oliver, William Loudon, Reuben U. Underwood, Edward Goins; clerk, Edwin H. Taylor; treasurer, James A. Loudon; marshal, Walter Lindsey.

KIONA.

This thriving little hamlet is situated sixty-six miles southeast of North Yakima, on the Yakima river; also on the main line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Like all the business points in the lower Yakima valley, it depends for its existence and growth upon the development by irrigation of the rich sage brush land surrounding it. The country immediately tributary is under the recently completed Northern Pacific canal, while the northern boundary of the famed Horse Heaven prairie is only two miles south of Kiona. Experience has demonstrated that tender fruits, such as strawberries, apricots, peaches and nectarines, grown in the lower Yakima valley can be placed on the market from ten days to two weeks earlier than those produced in any other portion of the entire Northwest, all of which tends to the rapid development of the region, and gives the towns their hope for future development. One acre of melons on the Kennedy ranch netted the grower one hundred and fifty dollars; Ezra Hill harvested fifty-five tons of potatoes from four acres, selling the entire crop at twenty-two dollars per ton; raspberries on the Ralph fruit farm yielded at the rate of four hundred dollars per acre, while equally valuable crops of other small fruits and berries are reported from the district immediately surrounding Kiona.

The townsite is now owned by Kelso Brothers and Mrs. Kennedy. The former conduct a hotel and livery stable, and Mrs. Tina Scott has a general store, besides which there are a blacksmith shop and a lumber yard. The Episcopalians, Methodists and Presbyterians maintain church organizations, though as yet there are no buildings especially dedicated to public worship. Rev. E. H. Rubicam, of the Methodist church, is the only resident pastor. There is a two-room schoolhouse in the village, presided over by Mrs. H. H. Nagle and Miss N. N. Williams, and the town also has a flourishing Modern Woodmen lodge, a Western Union telegraph office, a postoffice in charge of J. Giezentanner, and one physician, Dr. F. S. Hedger.

FORT SIMCOE.

Thirty-one miles southwest of North Yakima is Fort Simcoe, the oldest permanent settlement in the county, and for several decades the headquarters of the Yakima Indian agency. At that point are situated the agency buildings, schools, etc., occupying one of the prettiest nooks in the whole Yakima region. A postoffice, of which Mrs. J. D. Coburn is postmistress, and Cline & Coburn's general store constitute the business portion of the village, aside from the agency and the school. Fort Simcoe was established immediately after the Indian wars of 1855-56. Whenever the surrounding country is all placed under cultivation it is quite probable that the village will be converted into a large town, its location being so favorable.

Other business points in Yakima county are: Ahtanum, in the Ahtanum valley, which is the home of Woodcock Academy, and has, besides a general store kept by A. J. Chambers, a creamery and a public hall; Belma, consisting of a postoffice, of which O. Bergeron is postmaster, a general store kept by O. Bergeron, and a blacksmith shop, owned by O. Brunette; Bluelight, a settlement midway between Mabton and Bickleton; Cowiche, a trading point and postoffice of the Cowiche valley, sixteen miles northwest of North Yakima, with which it is connected by tri-weekly stage, W. H. Schenck, postmaster; Nile, a postoffice on the Naches river, thirty-four miles northwest of North Yakima, James Beck, postmaster; Outlook, a postoffice in the Sunnyside region; Tampico, a postoffice and trading point on the upper Ahtanum, twenty miles southwest of North Yakima, H. J. Knox, postmaster; Wenas, a station on the Northern Pacific Railway in the Selah valley; Wenas, the postoffice, on Wenas creek, Ida R. Kandle, postmistress; and Wapato, formerly Simcoe, a flag station and trading point on the Yakima Indian reservation. Alexander E. McCredy has a general store there, and Mrs. McCredy is postmistress.

KITTITAS COUNTY

PART IV.

HISTORY OF KITTITAS COUNTY

CHAPTER I.

CURRENT EVENTS.—1861-1889.

To determine who first discovered the Kittitas valley would be a difficult problem. No doubt some of the emissaries of the great fur companies, the real pathfinders of the northwest, were the first to feast their eyes upon this beautiful gem of the Cascades. These strange merchants pushed their operations in all directions, following every high-way of Indian migration and especially every stream in their trapping and fur purchasing excursions. It is therefore likely that, by ascending the Yakima, they were led into Kittitas valley at a very early date, possibly during the regime of Astor's Pacific Fur Company, or soon after that of its successor, the Northwest Company, began. One man, who is now a resident of Kittitas valley, passed through it in 1855. This man is Charles A. Splawn. He tells us that he found a small Catholic mission on what is now the Pet Barnes place, known as the Mission farm, situated on the Manastash. There was a priest in charge whose name he does not remember. The mission was probably abandoned during the Indian war and never repossessed.

It is certain, however, that when the actual settlement of south central Washington commenced, there were practically no traces of previous settlements in the valley and that the reign of savagery showed few signs of having ever been disturbed, except by the operations of troops and volunteers in the Indian war of 1855-6. The occupation of this region by whites began in Klickitat county in 1858, reached Moxee basin in 1860 and the Kittitas a few years later. Of course, after the first settlements were established in the country near by, Kittitas valley, which for years had been seldom visited by whites, was more frequently traversed and the day when it, too, should be appropriated by the dominant race and made to yield up its wealth for the support and comfort of civilized man was not far distant.

State Senator A. J. Splawn, in describing a trip with cattle to the British Columbia mines, made by himself and others in August, 1861, says:

"It was the fourth day out that we came to the beautiful Kittitas valley. This valley as it looked that day to me, a boy of sixteen, was the loveliest spot I had ever seen. To the west stood the great Cascade range; to the north rose the snow capped peaks of the Peshastin, standing as mighty sentinels to guard the beautiful valley below, where the Yakima river wound its way full length, while from the mountains on the north flowed numerous small streams, and the whole plain was covered with a thick coat of grass. Sage hens and prairie chickens and jack rabbits were on all sides. The song birds were singing a sweet lullaby to the departing day and the howl of the coyote was borne on the evening breeze. As we gazed on this lovely sight, I wondered how long it would be before the smoke would be curling from pioneer homes, for here the settler would find a paradise."

Mr. Splawn tells us that he visited the valley again in May, 1863, with a pack train of forty horses, enroute to the Caribou mines, and that he found the whole flat covered with Indian lodges. The red men were there that their women might gather the kous for winter provision, while the warriors of the different tribes should hold councils, and engage in sports of all kinds, gambling, dancing, horse racing, etc. It was a grand gala occasion, and the savage shouts, the barking of dogs, the neighing of horses, the noise of the drums and the dance produced a medley of sounds such as not many at the present time are privileged to hear.

A. J. Splawn says that for a few months during 1860, Hald & Meigs, of The Dalles, Oregon, maintained a trading post at Manastash ford, Kittitas county, for the accommodation of travel to the Similkameen mines. In the fall of 1865, John Rozelle, with his wife and three sons, and his son-in-law, William Harrington and wife, entered Kittitas valley with intent to form a permanent settlement, but that winter they ran out of provisions and the cold being very severe, their sufferings were great. Hearing of their distress, F. Mortimer Thorp, of the Moxee valley, sent Andrew Gervais to the rescue. The latter persuaded them to return to Moxee with him, so the Kittitas valley was again left without a white resident. There may have been a few in the mining region of what is now Chelan county.

The first actual settler in the valley was a Swiss named Frederick Ludi, who, in company with John Goller, better known as "Dutch John," came in from Montana in the summer of 1867. Mr. Ludi says that while mining in Montana he fell in with an old German sailor who talked incessantly of the Sound country. So eloquent were this man's descriptions, that he and Goller were finally persuaded to seek their fortunes in the supposed earthly paradise. Ludi had a thousand dollars, his companion nothing. They came via the Mullan road to Walla Walla, thence to Wallula and up the Yakima river, traveling with a saddle horse each and a pack animal. They bore notes of introduction to F. M. Thorp, James Allen and Alfred Henson, the first mentioned of whom advised them to go to the Kittitas valley, which they did. When Ludi got his first view of the country to the northward of the Umpanum divide, the beautiful valley, with its tree-bordered streams, appealed to him so powerfully that he resolved to go no further, but to seek within its confines the home he so ardently desired. It was now September. Descending into the valley, he found a pleasant place in a well watered basin half a mile above the mouth of the Manastash, and there he decided to make his home. The Indians raised no objection to the building of his little cottonwood cabin; indeed they said they rather desired the presence of one or two white men among them, but they asked Ludi to discourage his white brethren from coming. "Snow fall Injun deep; awful cold; whites can't stand it," they said. There were two principal bands of red men in the valley, one under Shushuskin and one under Mex, the latter occupying territory near where Thorp now is. Besides these there were numerous parties passing through, berry picking and hunting and fishing at certain seasons of the year, or gathering kous and camas. All were very friendly to the two pioneer settlers, and Mr. Ludi says he found them quite trustworthy. He says there was one white man among these Indians, a worthless fellow named Wilson, who probably came to the valley in 1860 or the spring of the following year. He lived with Chief Shushuskin near the mouth of a stream which Mr. Ludi named Wilson creek.

Finding that the snow was much deeper on the west side of the Yakima river, where he was, than on the east side, and that it stayed on much later, Mr. Ludi determined to change his place of abode. Accordingly, the last of April found him on a claim in the southern part of the site of the present Ellensburg. Here he began farming in a small way, raising peas, beans, cabbage and other vegetables and in a measure demonstrating the incorrectness of the general impression that the valley was too cold for garden products or fruit.

June 16, 1868, the white population of the valley was increased by the arrival from Renton, Washington, of Tillman Houser, a stockman. He took as a pre-emption, the place now known as the Bull ranch, ten miles northeast of Ellensburg on Coleman creek. He states that the settlers at the time of his arrival were as heretofore named, that is to say, Ludi, Goller and William Wilson. The last mentioned, Mr. Houser tells us, was drowned in the Snake river in 1869 while endeavoring to escape with a band of stolen horses.

After erecting a little cabin on his pre-emption, Mr. Houser returned to the Sound, from which, with the aid of a man named Stewart, he brought a band of some fifteen head of cattle. Having put up a quantity of wild hay for winter feed, and erected a more commodious cabin, he went to the Sound once more; but October 22d found him again in the Kittitas country, this time with his wife and three children, Sarah, Harrison and Clarence; so Mrs. Houser gained the distinction of being the second white lady to effect a permanent settlement in Kittitas valley, Mrs. Charles Splawn being the first, though Mrs. Rozelle and Mrs. Harrington had come in before them with the intention of making homes there. Mr. Splawn had come in August and settled on what is now the Thorp estate on Tanum creek. His family soon joined him and wintered there that season. The white population of the valley was now two families and three bachelors. The valley also had a small trading post, one having been established by Mr. Splawn on his ranch, primarily to trade with the Indians.

The first part of the winter was mild, but later considerable snow fell and toward spring the ground was covered to a depth of fourteen inches. But though there was a heavy crust on the snow, cattle ranged all winter; nor was the death rate among them high. Mr. Houser lost quite a number of his three hundred sheep, however, but owing to the fact that disease had got among them and not because of cold and snow, for they were well cared for and fed.

The first survey of land in what is now Kittitas county was made in 1867 by Page Beach, but was not accepted. In 1868 he resurveyed it, this time with more success; and so townships seventeen and eighteen in range nineteen and townships seventeen and eighteen in range twenty east of the Willamette meridian, were prepared for entry under the United States land laws. The first filing was made by Tillman Houser at Seattle in the spring of 1869.

The time had now arrived for the Kittitas valley to experience a comparatively rapid development. It was during the year 1868 that the Union Pacific was completed, leaving a great many without employment. Large numbers of these started to seek homes and fortunes on Puget sound, and some of them, on beholding the Kittitas valley in its primeval luxuriance, resolved to go no further, but to cast in their lot with the few pioneers already there. Some also came from the Sound, and not a few with cattle from the Yakima country. The latter, however, had no intention of establishing permanent homes, wishing to remain only during the summer, then return with their herds to the lower and warmer levels.

Among the arrivals of the year 1869 were the following: Walter A. Bull, a bachelor, who located on the old Bull ranch on the Nanum not far from its confluence with the Yakima; Thomas Haley, a bachelor, who came with Bull and took a place adjoining him; Patrick Lynch, likewise a bachelor, who settled on what is now the Geddis ranch east of Bull's place; Charles Reed, who brought his family from Deer Lodge, Montana, and made his home on what later became known as the McEwen ranch on Cooke creek in the southeastern part of the valley; he subsequently located on the Manastash; Martin Davern and family, who came with the Reeds, and who located on the present Carver place, three miles southeast of Ellensburg; William (or as he was more frequently styled "Windy") Johnson, a bachelor, who took up his abode on Wilson creek, near the river; George Hull, who settled on Warm Spring creek in the eastern part of the valley; F. Mortimer Thorp, a Yakima stockman; George Gillespie, who settled below Bull's place and engaged in stockraising; Matthias Becker and family, who settled on the Fogarty ranch on the west side of the river; John Schmidt, a bachelor, who settled on the east side of the river two miles east of Ellensburg on the place now owned by Andrew Olson (he was drowned in the winter of 1869-70, in an attempt to ford the river, and his body was never recovered); William H. Kiester, a bachelor, who had come in with Christian Clymer's sheep to Houser's in 1868, but had gone away again leaving the sheep with Houser on shares; S. R. Geddis, a married man, who settled on the present Widow Prater place; John L. Vaughn, also married, who settled at Pleasant Grove, two miles southwest of Ellensburg; George and Jefferson Smith, the former a bachelor, the latter a squaw man, who took a ranch six miles northeast of Ellensburg; William H.

Crockett, who settled on the Mission ranch, Manastash creek; and Andrew Jackson Splawn and his brother Moses, formerly of the Moxee.

Other early pioneers of Kittitas valley who settled during that year or within a year or two afterward were: Thomas and Benton Goodwin; W. H. Beck, six miles east of Ellensburg; F. M. Frisbee, bachelor, on the Manastash; A. B. Whitson and sons, Edward and Albert, stockmen, East Kittitas; John A. Shoudy and family, at Ellensburg; John Brush, married, Cooke creek; J. D. Olmstead, married, on what became known as the Newland ranch in the southeastern part of the valley (he afterward established a store and conducted it several years), Charles P. Cooke and family, including Edward, Mode, Rufus and George, sons; William Taylor, bachelor, six miles northeast of Ellensburg; Jacob Becker, a blacksmith, at Ellensburg; Elias Messerly, bachelor, eleven miles northeast of Ellensburg; Harry M. Bryant, also a bachelor, who settled near Messerly; George W. Parrish, a bachelor stockman, who located in the eastern part of the valley in the "Park," so named by "Windy" Johnson in early days; D. J. Schnebly, sons Henry and Charles and their cousin, Frederick Dorsey Schnebly, all of whom settled about twelve miles north of Ellensburg and engaged in the stock business; E. E. Erickson, married, a stockman, who located just north of the Smith ranch in East Kittitas; George Wheeler, eight miles northeast of Ellensburg; August Nesselhouse, Cooke creek; "Nigger" Johnson, a bachelor, who came over from the Sound and made his home on the Tjossem ranch, just south of Ellensburg; J. G. Olding and family, East Kittitas; William Lewis, J. M. Perry, Hugh Perry, Charles A. Sanders and family, two miles northeast of Ellensburg; William Dennis, a partner of John A. Shoudy; Robert Wallace; J. D. Dysart; M. M. Dammon; James H. McDonald; C. B. Walker; Fenton McDonald; J. H. McEwen; David Murray, a nomadic stockman; Humboldt Packwood, who remained but a few weeks, although a few years later he returned to Ellensburg and became a permanent settler; Jesse W. McDonald, East Kittitas; Anthony A. Meade.

Practically all of those named engaged in the stock business. They sought a market for their cattle on the Sound, where, it is said, a two-year-old steer would bring from $35 to $40; a cow, $40 to $50; and a yearling, $20. The cattle were driven over the Snoqualmie trail to Seattle, which, though a town of small population, was even then an important shipping point.

Another event of the year 1869 was the birth, late in March, of Viola V., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Splawn, the first white child born in the valley. In August of the same year, twin children, a son and a daughter, were born of Mrs. Martin Davern, under a thorn bush in South Ellensburg, and on the 24th of the following December, Mrs. Houser gave birth to a daughter, who is now Mrs. William German.

During the spring of 1869 several bands of cattle from the Yakima country were driven into Kittitas valley for the summer, giving inception to a custom which remained in vogue for a few years afterward. While there with cattle during the summer of 1870, A. J. Splawn noticed the rapidity with which the region was settling up and concluded to start a store right on the camping ground. "After making arrangements for a huge log house," says he, "I went to The Dalles and bought my goods, and on November 20, 1870, my outfit of two four-horse teams and thirty pack animals was unloaded and I had my stock in order and was ready to do business with all comers. One evening my friend, John Gillespie, rode by and remarked, 'Jack, you want a sign; I will make one for you.' A few mornings after that I looked up over the door and there was a sign, sure enough; it read 'Robbers' Roost.'

"I settled down for the winter, which was a lone- some one, with my brother Moses as a companion, who found employment in quarreling with old Joe Ferrier and Fred Bennett over a certain passage in the Bible. . . . I had bought three hundred steel traps and given them out to the Indians in various parts of the country, thinking by that means they could be induced to trap for furs. It proved a wise move as the fur trade was my principal business. Indians would bring furs for hundreds of miles, and I was always ready to entertain them at any kind of games they were looking for. I kept race horses to run them from one jump to ten miles; had a race track of my own and here the Indians would come for their jubilee. Having never dealt in furs I knew nothing of their value, so I just traded by guess, but I never overlooked the price on my goods. One thing in favor of the Indian that traded with me, he never needed a pack horse to carry away what his furs brought."

In the same article from which the above is quoted, Mr. Splawn tells an amusing story of the early days, which is here reproduced in his own language:

"In November of that year I was passing from Yakima to Kittitas, and fell in about noon at Matthias Becker's, whose wife was a jewel, with a heart full of goodness. Riding up near the door I dismounted and went in thinking they would be glad to see me. There sat the whole family and my friend, John Gillespie, and the young lady sister, Miss Caroline Gerlick. We all called her Linnie. They gave me a cold stare for which I could not account. I wondered what I had done to lose their friendship and made up my mind to vacate the premises as soon as possible and ride on, which I proceeded to do. When I got outside my boy friend, Willie, was standing by my horse, and he said: 'Mr. Splawn, don't go; John and Linnie is going to get married and don't want anybody to know it.' I said, 'All right, Willie, I'll stay,' and returned to the house. I remarked that the atmosphere seemed chilly, as if pointing to some catastrophe that hovered over the premises. 'It surely bodes no good to this family,' said I, 'and I have concluded to remain and see if I can do anything to bring a ray of light from out the gloom.'

"Mrs. Becker began to laugh, saying: 'We can't fool Jack and might as well tell him that there is going to be a wedding here as soon as the justice of peace can arrive.' Just then the Hon. Frederick Bennett showed up, dressed to a finish. He had on Ben Burch's old pants, the legs of which reached to just below the knee, and it must have cost him a great effort to get into my coat which fit him as well as the pants did. My shirt, with a large striped paper collar, set him off in shape for most any kind of ceremony. John and Linnie were on their feet and Frederick Bennett, J. P., proceeded at once to tie the knot. These were his words: 'Shoin your right hands. By this you signify you love one anuder. By de laws of our country and de power in me, I pronounce you vife und vife.' He was almost exhausted. Catching his eye, I shook my head and he recalled the mistake and said: 'I don't mean dot, I means 'usband und vife.' This was the first marriage ceremony in Kittitas valley ended, and John and Linnie were one. They were both the salt of the earth and I count them as among my early friends."

During all the earliest years, the pioneers of Kittitas valley had many hardships to endure. The few residents were almost completely isolated, and as they had not much to sell, there was little money in circulation. Mr. Houser tells of using roasted peas for coffee and drinking the infusion with little or no sugar, also of living throughout the winter of 1869-70 on eight bushels of corn that he had carried up from old Yakima City and ground into meal in a coffee mill. Other pioneers subsisted themselves and families in much the same way until they could take small ditches out of the streams and get little patches of land under cultivation and irrigation. Of course beef was plentiful, that being the chief product of the valley. At first these pioneers were almost cut off from mail communication with the outside world. Charles Splawn tells us that he and Mortimer Thorp established the first postal and express system, a private one, late in 1868, employing a friendly Indian named Washington to make weekly trips to Seattle. For this service they paid him ten dollars a trip. Mr. Splawn says that this service was the only regularly established one in the valley until they created Tanum postoffice at F. M. Thorp's place on Tanum creek in the fall of 1869, Mr. Thorp becoming the first postmaster. The mails came in and went out through Yakima City, weekly at first, then oftener. The next postoffice was established at Walter A. Bull's place; then a little later moved to J. D. Olmstead's ranch, near the Bull place in the southeastern part of the valley, where also Mr. Olmstead early opened a small store. The name this postoffice bore is not recalled. About 1870 the Tanum postoffice was discontinued and in its stead, one was established at Pleasant Grove, West Kittitas, with John L. Vaughn in charge. Finally, along in the early 'seventies, the Olmstead office was abandoned and one established at Ellensburg, with John A. Shoudy as postmaster. Pleasant Grove postoffice remained in existence many years. As might be expected, during the first few years the Kittitas mail service was an irregular one, oftentimes many weeks of the winter passing without any mail whatever, except what some one who was forced to travel might bring up from Yakima City. Elisha Pell was one of the early carriers. The mail came in and went out by way of Yakima City and Umatilla, Henry D. Cock having the contract for its conveyance between the two points. In time the stage coach succeeded the saddle horse or mule in the important service of carrying the United States mail between the different points in central Washington.

During 1873* occurred an event of great moment in the settlement of the future Kittitas county, namely, the discovery of gold in the Swauk region. As early as 1867 a prospecting party, of which N. Thomas Goodwin, Benton Goodwin and Edward Townner were members, had passed through this country, and while following one of the many Indian trails, namely, that leading to the Peshastin district, had made a discovery, the importance of which they did not realize at the time. While camped for their midday meal near Swauk creek, Benton Goodwin busied himself in panning one of the bars of the stream. He was ignorant of the appearance of native gold, but suspecting that some yellow particles he found in the bottom of his pan might be the precious metal, he showed them to Townner, the only experienced prospector in the party. The latter pronounced the find gold. His statements were received with considerable doubt by the party in general, which passed on, having first jocularly named the place where the gold was found Discovery bar.

During the ensuing two or three years the region was prospected occasionally, but no one found enough gold to warrant the establishment of a camp. In the fall of 1873, however, a party of men met with better success than had any of their predecessors. In this fortunate company were Newton Thomas Goodwin and Benton Goodwin, who had been in the party that made the discovery six years previous, also W. H. Beck, George Mycock, whose name was later changed by the legislature to Starr, and a young Kentuckian named D. Y. Borden. The men were very much dispirited, having been unsuccessful in their quest of fortune and being exhausted and nearly out of provisions, but Benton and N. T. Goodwin accepted the proposal of the Kentuckian to prospect Swauk creek. Benton Goodwin soon discovered a small nugget. He called the others to him, who soon found a pot hole in the center of the stream. To dig down to bedrock was the work of but a short time, as there was nothing in the cavity but wash gravel. From a panful of dirt taken out of the bottom of the hole, Borden washed a small nugget worth about fifteen cents. The rest of the men were summoned. Leaving their sizzling supper to take care of itself, they set to work panning the gravel from the pot hole, and within an hour they had over five dollars' worth of coarse dust and nuggets, one of the latter weighing a dollar.

Next day the party divided its forces, Starr and Beck going below and the rest above the camp. Those who ascended the creek found a spot where, as evidenced by the protruding roots of a large fir tree, the bedrock was close to the surface. Digging here, Borden took out a nugget weighing over an ounce, and worth about $16. He also found gravel that yielded thirty to forty cents to the pan.

The five prospectors now prepared for systematic work, staking out claims in the regular way and sending to John L. Vaughn's place for provisions. Great pains were taken to keep the discovery a secret, but in about two weeks, rumors of it reached the outside world through the Indians. In that time, however, the party had secured between $500 and $600, even with the crude equipments at hand. One day, it is said, they dug out $150 with a butcher knife.

News of the discovery soon precipitated a rush of miners and others and ere long there were many hundreds on the ground. That fall the Swauk creek mining district was organized with D. Y. Borden as the first recorder. It was agreed that claims should be 200 feet long and from rimrock to rimrock. Soon the creek was located from its mouth, five miles below Discovery bar, to the forks fifteen miles up the stream, but the miners were unable to find gold in paying quantities except on and in the immediate vicinity of the bar. As a result most of the people left as speedily as they had come, and that winter less than fifty were there. These consisted of the Discovery Company (then increased to twelve by the addition of John P. Beck, G. W. Goodwin, Al. Churchill, David Munn, James and Samuel Bates and another), and three other companies, namely Walter A. Bull & Company, on Starr bar, a French association led by Joseph Superneau, operating on Williams creek, and a co-operative company at the mouth of that stream. The Williams creek miners met with little success that winter, though subsequently some rich ground was discovered there. Indeed the explorations and operations of the first three years failed to bring to light the wealth of the region, except on Discovery bar, where, in the spring of 1874, sluices were built of whipsawed lumber and where an ounce a day to the man was averaged that season. But the next year the lead played out and in 1876 the mines were abandoned. In the late 'seventies, activity was renewed in the Swaik district; lost leads were discovered; the region became a prominent producer and ever since it has continued to yield considerable quantities of gold. Many who were attracted to the country by the first discoveries remained to assist in the development of Kittitas county's latent resources, so the finding of the yellow metal may be considered one of the most important events of the early days, not alone in its direct but in its indirect effects.

Meanwhile the agricultural development of Kittitas valley was progressing slowly but surely. Every year brought a few additions to the laborers at work in the task of subjugating the rich country and winning from it its stores of natural wealth, but all were handicapped by lack of means to operate on anything like an extensive scale. The first irrigation ditch of considerable size constructed in the county was the Manastash canal, built about 1874 by farmers on the creek from which it took its name. Though a comparatively small ditch, its importance was great, serving to demonstrate the practicability of irrigation under the conditions of climate and soil obtaining in the valley. After all these years of usefulness, it still continues to render valuable service.

This canal antedated but little, perhaps not more than a year, the Tanum ditch, which took its water out of the creek of the same name. Though nine miles long, it carried only a small amount of water. As yet, however, it has not been superseded by any more capacious canal, though its own capacity has been increased somewhat. It now carries five thousand inches. It was put in by the Tanum Ditch Company, a local association of which J. E. Bates was the first president. Though the Manastash and Tanum canals were not large in comparison with the huge aqueducts of later years, they were the work of pioneer farmers without adequate capital, and their construction is a credit to the energy and persistence of the indomitable men who opened the way for the subjugation and settlement of the Kittitas valley.

Important though the first decade of white occupancy of the Kittitas was, it is not fruitful of events such as illumine and add interest to history's page. It was the time of small things, when men struggled with poverty, with isolation, and with a dearth of almost everything essential to comfort. It was a period of unromantic wrestling with the problem of existence, when, as George D. Virden expresses it, men were concerned with the vital question of "how they were to cover up their out-sides and fill up their insides," a problem serious enough for the majority of people in all lands and at all times. But the Kittitas pioneers were fortunate in that they were working out their destiny in a land well favored by Nature. In every direction was an abundance of succulent bunch grass for the sustenance of flocks and herds, while the tall rye grass along the streams furnished food for them during the winter months, greatly reducing the quantity of hay it was necessary to put up during the summer seasons. The early settlers well knew that in a land where stock may be allowed to multiply almost indefinitely, there is no danger of permanent poverty and that an abundance of everything was likely to be theirs, if they could but worry along for a few years. That they knew the time would come when these conditions would no longer exist is, however, evident from the energy and zeal displayed by them almost from the first in the development of agriculture by irrigation.

Another favorable circumstance was the general friendliness of the Indian tribes. That the red men would have preferred that the whites remain out of their country was evinced by their continually magnifying the drawbacks of the valley, its cold climate, deep snows, etc., but they never offered armed resistance to white occupancy, neither was reasonable ground for apprehension as to the safety of the white families presented at any time prior to 1878. That year was, however, one of not a little anxiety throughout the whole of central Washington. The unfortunate Perkins affair and the events which grew out of it have been treated at some length in connection with Yakima county, of which the Kittitas valley was then a part. In the apprehension and punishment of the dastardly murderers, the citizens of the northern section were no less active and interested than were their neighbors to the southward. Nor were the Kittitas residents less vigilant than the Yakima people during the continuance of danger from the Bannock and Piute war. The first intimation they had that trouble might be anticipated came in July, 1878. Rumors of danger caused G. W. Shaser and Gillam to start for the range after their cattle, lest these should fall into the hands of predatory Indians. When they got as far on their journey as Selah springs they met the Burbank boys, who, as elsewhere narrated, had been fired upon by the red men. These of course told their story, and immediately upon hearing it, Messrs. Shaser and Gillam set out post haste for home. Reaching Ellensburg about eight o'clock that evening, they at once gave the alarm. The result was electrical. Messengers departed forthwith for all the outlying districts, while those who remained at home began active preparations for quarantining and defending the people who should flock to their town, as well as themselves. Many of the country people were slow to take alarm, but a majority preferred to run just as few risks as possible, so flocked to the several places of defense without delay. Of these the principal were at Ellensburg, on the old Parson Hawn homestead adjoining Samuel T. Packwood's farm in West Kittitas, and on the A. B. Whitson place, but besides these blockhouses were built by Charles Wheeler, George Shaser and Robert Wallace, each erecting one on his own homestead. The stockade at Hawn's was largest of all, enclosing about three acres and being between fifteen and twenty feet in height. That on the Whitson place covered an area of not more than half an acre, but, it is said, was a cleverly designed, strong fortification, enclosing a blockhouse. The stockade at Ellensburg occupied most of the block bounded by Pearl, Main, Third and Fourth streets.

It is stated that these several fortifications, though thrown up with great rapidity by the settlers, were really quite substantial and capable of withstanding a considerable force supplied only with small arms. To them, during the early days of July, nearly all the white inhabitants of the valley, some three or four hundred, repaired with cooking utensils and supplies and what few firearms they could muster. Of the last there was certainly no great abundance at first.

Upon the assembling of the settlers, the formation of a military company for home protection was one of the first measures thought of. There were in the valley several men who had seen service in the Civil war, among them Samuel T. Packwood, a resident of West Kittitas. To him was assigned the duty of organizing the company. The muster rolls, which unfortunately cannot now be found, were signed by about fifty men. Mr. Packwood was of course captain and F. D. Schnebly, William Morrison and Tillman Houser were chosen for the offices of first lieutenant, second lieutenant and orderly sergeant, respectively.

Soon after the people had gathered into stockades, the officials of Yakima county had received from the government through the chief executive of the territory, a supply of needle guns and ammunition, which were brought from The Dalles to Yakima City by a detachment of men from the Yakima country. Of course, Kittitas valley was entitled to a just share of these, and to secure the same Captain Packwood, with a detachment of ten or twelve men, proceeded in a four-horse wagon to the county seat. It was feared that there might be some technical difficulty in the way of their obtaining the guns, and as the urgency of the case seemed to justify a rather high handed policy, the captain resolved to secure the weapons and ammunition first and to ask for them afterward. In the execution of this plan he succeeded admirably. Not before fifty stand of arms and ammunition therefor were in possession of his men did he mention his errand to County Auditor Masters, and when at last he broached the subject to that official, the result was as expected. "I have no authority from the commissioners to distribute the guns," he said. When, however, he learned that the arms and ammunition were already on the way to Ellensburg, he raised no serious objection, and seems to have concluded that the wisest policy was to overlook the illegality of the proceeding entirely.

As soon as the military supplies reached Ellensburg, the work of drilling the company was begun, Lieutenant Morrison serving as drill master. Much attention was paid not alone to drilling and maneuvering during the early part of the Indian war, but also to the maintenance of a strict guard at night. But as time passed and no enemy appeared, the irksome sentinel duty was neglected, and soon the families returned to their homes and regular occupations. The military organization was, however, maintained for over two years. The guns were never called in and, it is presumed, are still in possession of the home guardsmen or their descendants.

While some of the tribes of central Washington were undoubtedly hostile in feeling, the Indians who made their homes in the Kittitas valley were very friendly. Indeed they seemed to fear an invasion of their red brethren in arms as much as did any of the white men.

Another Indian scare was occasioned by Chief Moses' demonstration on the Columbia river, the story of which has been told elsewhere. Many of the settlers again sought the protection of the stockades, but careful defensive precautions were not observed as on the former occasion. Captain Packwood states that quite a large number gathered at his home during these times of uncertainty and trouble, also several friendly Indians, all of whom were as well taken care of as conditions would permit.

These Indian scares and the prospect that trouble with the aborigines might last indefinitely, caused a few settlers to conclude that the climate of the country was unendurable and to go elsewhere in search of Fortune's favors. It is probable, too, that some intending settlers were deterred from coming by the unsettled Indian situation. However, the vigor displayed by the whites in preparing for defense and their energy and courage in capturing and punishing the Perkins murderers effectually put an end to all danger of an Indian uprising in future, and whatever scares there may have been since were absolutely without foundation. The promptness, determination and vigor displayed in the years 1878 and 1879 are certainly deserving of the highest commendation; and the wisdom of the course pursued by the settlers in bringing the perpetrators of atrocities to summary punishment has been abundantly justified by the subsequent history of central Washington.

The winter of 1878-9 was a mild one, and the season following it brought some encouragement to the struggling pioneers of the Kittitas country. It was about that time that Dr. Dorsey S. Baker, of Walla Walla, began preparations for the building of his celebrated wooden railroad from Walla Walla to Wallula, creating a big demand for ties and other timbers. Throughout the whole of the winter of 1879. W. J. Harkness operated a tie and lumber camp near Cle-Elum, employing a considerable crew of men and, of course, greatly improving the local market for farm products. Next spring an enormous drive of logs and tie timber was sent down the Yakima to the Northern Pacific Company's sawmill at Ainsworth. It was during that year, also, that the railway began building eastward from Ainsworth, inspiring the hope that the day of isolation from the outside world must soon pass, and creating a demand for the timber on the eastern slope of the Cascades. It furnished encouragement for an industry which had its first feeble beginnings as early, it is thought, as 1876, when James S. Dysart established a sawmill near the site of the present Cle-Elum. Even this was not the first manufacturing plant if Houser's dates are correct, for he says that in 1875 a grist mill was built in the county by Robert Canady. It stood on Wilson creek, five miles northeast of Ellensburg, where the brick mill now is. At first it was a small water power mill, but later Mr. Canady took in his brother as a partner and enlarged and improved the plant. Other flour mills were soon after built by Charles A. Sanders and Jerry D. Dammon. Thus it will be seen that even during the earliest days, when the people were few and for the most part poor in worldly possessions, the resources of the Kittitas country began to be developed, and promise was given of a time when it should be taking prizes at state fairs for the variety of its industries and products. Before the first decade had passed, it had begun to yield besides agricultural products and cattle and horses, considerable outputs of lumber and gold, and some manufactured articles.

The first time, and at least during the early years the only time, that troops were stationed in the Kittitas valley was in the spring of 1879, when about two hundred cavalrymen took station near George Cooke's present place about a mile above the old Olding ranch. The troops came by order of Department Commander O. O. Howard for the purpose of watching the Columbia River Indians, who were then showing signs of restiveness. They remained several months.

As in all other parts of the central Washington country and the northwest, the winter of 1880-1 was exceedingly severe in the Kittitas country. The first weeks of the winter were not unusually cold, nor did they bring much snow, but at Christmas the trouble commenced. Then the earth was wrapped in a downy coverlet nearly a foot thick. Soon this melted somewhat and crusted. Several lighter snowfalls succeeded, each one crustling, until, in January, there were twenty inches of solid ice and snow. Then came a fall of eight inches, followed by a terrific blizzard, the first, and indeed the only one, occurring since the advent of the whites. When at length the storm subsided, the canyons were drifted full of snow and all roads were effectually blocked. The effect upon range stock may be imagined. Entire bands were imprisoned where sustenance could not be secured and some of them perished utterly before the snow melted or help came, while others were in the last stages of starvation, eating each other's hair and tails, when discovered.

At this time there were few large bands of cattle in the valley, but many had from ten or fifteen to two hundred head; Smith Brothers had more than two hundred. The losses amounted to fully fifty per cent., the heaviest losers, proportionately to their entire herds, being the owners of small bands, for the large stock owners had made greater provision for feeding, hence were able to tide a greater percentage of their animals over the severe weather.

Fortunately, the blizzard occasioned the loss of no human lives in Kittitas valley, though one man, a Swede named Honson, was unlucky enough to be caught by it in the Yakima canyon, north of Squaw creek. He saved his life by lying down and allowing the snow to drift over him, covering him completely. When the fury of the elements had at last spent itself, he dug his way out and resumed his journey unharmed.

The stock loss sustained by the Kittitas farmers was partly compensated by the increase in prices following upon the hard winter. In 1880, a two-year-old steer was worth about $15; in the spring of 1881 the same animal would bring $20, and a year later $30. A further compensation was had in the immense crops the heavy snowfall produced the next spring. The snow lay on the ground till after the 1st of March, then started to go away quite rapidly before the warm breath of a Chinook, but fortunately the balmy wind did not last long, and most of the snow disappeared gradually, causing no destructive floods. The abundance of moisture in the ground caused everything sown or planted by the agriculturist to grow and produce bountifully. Mr. Houser tells us that forty acres of his farm which was not plowed on account of being too wet, yielded thirty bushels to the acre of volunteer wheat, worth from fifty to seventy-five cents a bushel that season.

Although the population of the Kittitas valley in 1880 was still small and scattering, yet even at that early date, the people began to have political ambitions. They had from the first experienced much inconvenience on account of the distance to Yakima City, their county seat. Enough of their time was consumed in making long, periodical trips to The Dalles for the purpose of disposing of their products and laying in stocks of supplies, without other long trips to Yakima City, whenever county or court business had to be attended to. The people desired one of two things, that the county seat be removed to Ellensburg or that a new county be organized. Of course the people of the Yakima valley were opposed to both projects, especially the former, for the removal of the county seat would work a hardship upon all the residents of Yakima valley from Naches gap to the Columbia river. The matter was in issue in the election of 1880. Its effect was seen in the election of George S. Taylor, a Democrat, to the legislature by a majority of fifty-six over John A. Shoudy, the Republican candidate, although the county was Republican at the time. The reason was that many Yakima valley Republicans supported the Democratic nominee, fearing that Shoudy, if elected, would attempt to divide the county or remove the county seat.

At the next election, that in the fall of 1882, the same men were candidates for the same office. This time the Kittitas valley Democrats, or many of them, supported Shoudy and the result was that he was elected over Taylor by exactly the same majority that the latter had received two years earlier, fifty-six.

"Between these two elections," says W. H. Peterson, "several things had occurred to arouse and solidify the taxpayers of Kittitas valley in favor of county division. The small building, or courthouse, occupied by the county officers, was, with all its contents, totally destroyed by fire, and the board of county commissioners had to provide some place for the use of the county officers. There was no doubt that a large majority of the taxpayers of the county were in favor of renting offices, but the board, then as now consisting of three members, two living in Yakima and one in Kittitas valley, in their wisdom saw fit to proceed at once to erect a new courthouse. To get them to take this step great pressure was brought to bear on them by the residents of old Yakima. It was a subject of remark at the time and of no little adverse criticism among the people of Kittitas valley, that the two commissioners from Yakima valley were divided on the proposition, while the vote of the one from Kittitas, which if in the negative would have defeated it, was cast for it. Of course the people of old Yakima were jubilant over the action of the board. They felt sure that once the new courthouse was built there would be no possibility of the removal of the county seat to Ellensburg, and that it would have the effect of postponing for a long period the division of the county. But 'the best laid plans of men and mice gang aft aglee.'

"S. T. Packwood brought an action in the district court attacking the right of the board to build a courthouse without having first submitted the question to a vote of the people. In connection with this he also secured an injunction from the court restraining the county treasurer from paying any orders issued in payment for the courthouse or any part thereof pending the final determination of the case. Judge J. R. Lewis, a resident of Seattle and president of the Yakima National Bank, was the holder of these orders. He was too good a lawyer not to know that upon a final determination of the case the temporary restraining order would be made permanent. It was apparent to him that in case the county was not divided he could not hope to realize on his warrants, as Packwood was determined to fight his legal battle to a finish, but that should it be divided, the terms of division would no doubt be such as to virtually indemnify Kittitas for the payment of its proportionate part of his warrants and in that case he could (as he afterward did) get Packwood to have the case dismissed by reimbursing him for his expenses. And so it came about that the influence of Judge Lewis and the bank instead of being wielded against county division, was exerted in favor of it."

When Shoudy's bill for the creation of Kittitas county came up before the territorial legislature, it met with practically no opposition. The mother county was vigilant to protect her every interest, but as the bill was a liberal one and fair to the old county in every respect, there was no cause for a fight. The language of the creating act is as follows:

AN ACT

To create and locate the county of Kittitass and to define the boundaries thereof.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington: That all that portion of Yakima county situated within Washington Territory and included within the following limits be, and the same shall be known as, the county of Kittitass, viz: Commencing at a point where the main channel of the Columbia river crosses the township line between township fourteen and fifteen north, range twenty-three east, Willamette meridian, and running west on said township to the range line between townships eighteen and nineteen east; thence north on said line six miles to the township line between townships fifteen and sixteen north; thence west on said township line to the Naches river; thence northerly along the main channel of said river, to the summit of the Cascade mountains, or southeast corner of Pierce county; thence north along the eastern boundaries of Pierce, King and Snohomish counties to the main channel of the Wenachee river; thence down said river to the Columbia river; thence down the main channel of the Columbia to the place of beginning.

Section 2. That Robert N. Canaday, Samuel T. Packwood and C. P. Cooke are hereby appointed a board of county commissioners for the county of Kittitass, with all the powers as if regularly elected, who shall hold their offices until the next general election and until their successors are elected and qualified; and said board of commissioners shall have power to select and appoint the remaining county officers, who shall serve until the next general election and until their successors are elected and qualified, for which purpose the county commissioners herein appointed shall meet at the county seat of Kittitass county, within forty days after the approval of this act, and appoint the necessary officers for said county, and perform such other duties and things necessary for a complete organization of the county of Kittitass.

Section 3. That the justices of the peace and constables who are now elected as such in the precincts of the county of Kittitass be, and the same are hereby, declared justices of the peace and constables of and for the said county of Kittitass.

Section 4. That the county seat of said county of Kittitass is hereby temporarily located at Ellensburg, at which place it shall remain until located permanently elsewhere in said county by a majority of qualified electors thereof, and for which purpose a vote shall be taken at the next general election provided for by statute; and the officers of election shall receive said vote and make return thereof, to the commissioners, who shall canvass the same and announce the result in like manner as the result of the vote for county officers; Provided, That if there be not a majority vote in favor of such location of county seat at any one place at such general election, the qualified electors of the county shall continue to vote on that question at the next and each subsequent general election until some place receive such majority, and the place so receiving a majority of all the votes cast shall be declared the permanent county seat of said Kittittass county.

Section 5. That all laws applicable to the county of Yakima shall be applicable to the county of Kittittass.

Section 6. That all taxes levied and assessed by the board of county commissioners of the county of Yakima for the year A. D. 1883, upon persons or property within the boundaries of the said county of Kittittass, and all delinquent taxes heretofore due said county of Yakima shall be collected by its proper officers and paid into the treasury of said Yakima county, for the use of said county of Yakima; Provided, That the said county of Yakima shall pay all the just indebtedness of said Yakima county; and Provided further, That the county of Kittittass shall pay to the county of Yakima a just proportion of the net indebtedness of said Yakima county, the same to be determined as hereinafter provided.

Section 7. That the auditors of the counties of Kittittass and Yakima are hereby constituted a board of appraisers and adjusters of the real estate and other property of Yakima county, and if they cannot agree, the auditor of Klickitat county shall act as umpire, and for this purpose shall meet at Yakima City on the second Tuesday in January, A. D. 1884; then and there they shall appraise the value of all public property, both real and personal, belonging to the county of Yakima, and said board of appraisers and adjusters shall then proceed to ascertain the net indebtedness of said county of Yakima, which shall be done as follows, viz.: Ascertain all the county justly owes in warrants, scrip or other just debts, which amount shall constitute the gross indebtedness of said county, from which deduct the amount of the unpaid portion of the assessment roll of 1883 and the amount of all delinquent assessment rolls which are considered collectible up to that date, and the amount of all moneys and other credits due the county, also the value of all public property belonging to the said county of Yakima, and the balance so found shall constitute the net indebtedness of said county of Yakima; Provided, The real estate and personal property thus deducted shall be the property of Yakima county after division.

Section 8. That the net indebtedness of the said county of Yakima as found above, be divided equally between the counties of Yakima and Kittittass in proportion to the taxable property of said counties as it legally appears on the assessment roll for the year 1883, and the said county of Kittittass shall cause a warrant or warrants to be drawn upon its treasurer, payable to the county of Yakima out of any funds not otherwise appropriated, for its full share of such indebtedness; Provided, That if from any cause either or both of the above mentioned adjusters and appraisers fail or refuse to act as such, then, and in that case, the county auditors of the respective counties shall constitute a board of arbitrators and appraisers, and shall proceed as herein directed.

Section 9. That if the board of appraisers and adjusters as herein appointed shall not agree on any subject of value or settlement as herein stated, they shall choose a third man from an adjoining county to settle their differences, and their decision shall be final.

Section 10. That the compensation of the said board of appraisers and adjusters shall be four dollars per day each, for each and every day necessarily employed therein, and the counties of Yakima and Kittittass shall pay the same equally.

Section 11. That the county auditor of Kittittass county shall have access to the records of Yakima county, without cost, for the purpose of transcribing and indexing such portion of the records of property as belongs to the county of Kittittass, and his certificate of the correctness thereof shall have the same force and effect as if made by the auditor of Yakima county; it is hereby provided, however, that nothing in this section shall permit the record books of Yakima county to be removed from the office of its auditor.

Section 12. That the county auditor, for transcribing and indexing the records of Kittittass county, shall receive the sum of three dollars per day for each and every day so employed, to be paid by the county of Kittittass, and in addition to his yearly salary as hereinafter provided.

Section 13. That the county of Kittittass shall be attached to the county of Yakima for legislative purposes and to the second judicial district for judicial purposes.

Section 14. That the county commissioners of the county of Kittittass shall receive the sum of four dollars per day each for each and every day necessarily employed in the service of said county, and ten cents per mile for each mile necessarily traveled to attend said county business. The auditor shall receive a yearly salary of three hundred dollars per year, payable quarterly. The treasurer shall receive a yearly salary of $150 a year, payable quarterly. The sheriff shall receive the same fees as are allowed to sheriffs of other counties by the statutes of Washington Territory. The probate judge shall receive the regular fees of his office as prescribed by the laws of Washington Territory. The superintendent of public schools shall receive a yearly salary of forty dollars per annum, payable quarterly, and all other officers of the county shall receive the regular fees of their respective offices as prescribed by statute.

Section 15. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to effect just proportion of the school fund of the said county of Kittittass.

Section 16. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Section 17. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval by the governor.

Approved November 24, 1883.

At its first meeting, held in December, 1883, the board of county commissioners, in harmony with the provisions of the creating act, named the following officers for the county: Probate judge, W. A. Bull; sheriff, J. C. Goodwin; auditor, W. H. Peterson; treasurer, Thomas Johnson; surveyor, John R. Wallace; superintendent of schools, Irene Cumberland; coroner, M. V. Amen, M. D.; sheep commissioner, E. W. Lyen.

"The act creating the county," says Auditor Peterson, "provided that the auditor of Kittittas county should make a copy of all that part of the Yakima records required to be kept in Kittittas county. It also provided that the settlement between the counties should be made by the auditors of the same and went on to designate how it should be made. In case they failed to agree they were to call to their assistance the auditor of Klickitat county.

"For his services in transcribing the records and making the settlement the auditor was to receive three dollars a day. After paying stage fare back and forth from Yakima several times in the dead of winter through fierce snow storms (one of which I think my old friend, M. M. Dammon, has not yet forgotten) and paying my hotel bills, I had, as may readily be inferred, not much of my per diem left to pay for cocktails and cigars. Fortunately for me, however, I could do without these luxuries, and buoyed up by the knowledge that I was entering upon the discharge of the onerous duties of an office for which I was to receive the princely salary of three hundred dollars a year, I faced the storms and rushed my work.

"The first instrument filed for record in Kittitas county was filed on the 22d of December, 1883. The first marriage license was issued on the 9th of January, 1884, to John C. Ellison, now deceased, and Amy A. Childs; Dr. I. N. Power, now residing at Cle-Elum, was the first physician who registered in the county.

"When a Republican legislature, at the instance of Mr. Shoudy, himself a Republican, created the county of Kittitas and appointed a county board consisting of two Democrats and one Republican, and vested in it the power to appoint all the county officers, who were to hold their offices until after the next general election, the Democrats had the laugh on the Republicans, but when the same board appointed more Republicans to office than Democrats, the laugh was on the Democrats. When, at the first general election, held in November, 1884, there was only one Republican elected in the county, it was the Democrats' turn to laugh."

The local government was not maintained without some inconvenience and sacrifice on the part of the early officers, who were of necessity very poorly paid. The county had no courthouse or other suitable building for the keeping of its records and for offices, etc., neither was it deemed expedient at first to erect such a building, so that for several years the machinery of government was moved from one rented place to another, bank vaults being used as receptacles for the record books and valuables. But the local political power was in good hands during the earliest years, and the result was that the county's warrants did not fall so far below their face value as did those of the mother county, nor did they go begging in the market as some prophesied that they would. The officials practiced due economy in the expenditure of public moneys, thereby maintaining the credit of the county and enabling it to pay off, with reasonable rapidity, the sum it was adjudged to owe to Yakima. It may be safely asserted that notwithstanding the sparseness of its population, Kittitas county got a very fair start as one of the political divisions of the territory.

The year that the county of Kittitas was created was one of great activity in the territory which was included in its confines. While not much money was in circulation, an abundance was enjoyed by all the people, who traded much with each other by direct barter of commodities, thus obviating the necessity for a large circulating medium. The railway was in course of construction, and the certainty that it would soon traverse the valley, caused an influx of homeseekers. The necessity of coal for the consumption of the railway had given an impetus to prospecting, and it was during this year that discoveries were made which led to the opening of the Roslyn mines. The Seattle & Walla Walla Trail & Wagon Road Company, of which Walter A. Bull was president and George H. Smith, secretary, were at work on a road over the mountains and everywhere the wheels of industry were in motion.

June 16th of this year appeared the initial issue of the Kittitas Standard, a weekly newspaper, with headquarters at Ellensburg. This pioneer journal tells of numerous parties of land hunters seeking homes in the Kittitas valley in anticipation of the railroad, of a bright outlook for abundant crops, and of the fact that one hundred men had just been added to the railroad force in the canyon of the Yakima. It states that a mail route would be opened July 1st from Ellensburg to Wenatchee via Peshastin; that J. Blomquist had opened a brewery on his place on Wilson creek and that George H. Smith had completed thirteen miles of his Cascade wagon road between Ellensburg and the summit. A few quotations from some of its later numbers will illustrate the spirit of this strategic period in the county's history as no pen of the present could.

In its issue of June 30, 1883, it said:

Cattle are now as good as gold, and owners, in our opinion, need not fear a decline in prices. A variety of causes has operated to bring about this state of affairs, but probably the greatest cause for advance in prices lies in the rapid development of the Northwest. The thousands now pouring into our territory require to be fed. Eastern buyers have also in a measure depleted our large herds and hence a scarcity of good marketable cattle exists and those we do have for sale are bringing from $50 to $60 a head in many instances.

The same number contains the following:

We learn that matters in general throughout the Peshastin mining district are lively and encouraging. The Summit, Pocket, Polepick, Bobtail, old Polepick, Schaffer, Tiptop and other mines are being worked. Upon the creek two arrastres and the Schaffer Mining Company's six-stamp mill are busily engaged in crushing quartz; and the prevailing complaint is lack of sufficient crushing machinery to meet the demands of the camp. This want will be filled in a measure by the erection of a mill upon the old Polepick property, recently purchased by Thomas Johnson, Esq. . . . Upon a recent run of twenty-one days, upon culled hard quartz, the Schaffer Company's little mill yielded $1,800 in free gold, while the new concentrator saved four tons of sulphurets worth $300 per ton and upwards. During the past six years, the Schaffer Company property has yielded $36,000, the Tiptop mine over $1,100 in thirty days and other mines in like proportion. As yet the mines are still in the grass roots. Twenty-five men are working in the camp, many of whom are prospecting or developing upon their own account. . . .

The issue of August 18th contains the following:

Sheep raising is ever a large as well as an increasing industry in our section. There are large portions of our county which are not fit for agricultural purposes, but as grazing grounds for sheep and cattle they cannot be excelled. Among those who have profitably followed this industry in this section we may note: Messrs. Coleman, Meade, Lyons, Schnebey, McCleary, McDonald and Hanna. Of the above, Meade and McCleary, Lyons and Schnebey and McDonald and Hanna are partners, while Mr. Coleman is alone. The latter has about 1,800 head, McDonald & Hanna, 1,000; Meade & McCleary, 1,500, and Lyons & Schnebey, 700. The summer range of these flocks extends from the east dividing ridge of the valley to the Columbia. In winter they are taken to more sheltered localities—Johnson's gulch and Whiskey creek. We learn that the clip this season was unusually good, and as far as sold has averaged fair prices. Lyons sold in San Francisco and cleared 16 cents a pound over all expenses. McDonald sold at The Dalles for 15½ cents. From the others we have no report. The sheep of this section are healthy, free from scab and thrifty.

A quotation from the writings of one of its correspondents follows:

LAKE CLE-ELUM, August 22, 1883.

EDITOR STANDARD:—

For a pleasant and profitable mountain excursion commend us to the section of country in and about the headwaters of the Wenatchee, Peshastin, Cle-Elum and Teanaway rivers. Three years ago, by panning gravel in and along the Cle-Elum, S. S. Hawkins was enabled to discover gold and silver bearing ledges, well up on the west slope of the mountain which bears his name and marks the divide between the south fork of the Teanaway and Fortune creek (since named Good Fortune creek). Being pleased with the character of the quartz found, as also with a description of the locality given by Mr. Hawkins, Messrs. Boyls, Stevenson, P. J. Flint, Morrison, Wilson, Splawn and others subsequently visited the new camp and made locations covering the claims known as the I-1-ays, Cle-Elum, Hawk, Foster, Ida Elmore, Red Jacket, Madeline and Silver King, all of which by numerous reliable assays yield from $17 to $400 per ton. From the presence of copper and the fact that in almost every case the amount of gold and silver yielded by assays is equal, and from the general appearance of the formation in which serpentine, horn blende and slate predominate, the general impression prevalent is that with depth the mines in question will yield large returns in silver bearing ore. Several desirable claims have been grouped and sold to Tacoma mining people, who are making preparations to prospect their property thoroughly during the coming winter.

East of the Cle-Elum mining camp, and upon the Teanaway slope of the Hawkins mountain, lies the greater part of the recently discovered copper mines. The honor of this discovery lies between Messrs. E. P. Boyls, York, Hawkins and A. J. Splawn, but to share in the profit thereof of come with the discoverers, Messrs. Wilson, Flint, Morrison, Stevenson, Foster and others of Yakima City and Walter A. Bull & Company of this place. The property located is about 180 acres by each party or 360 acres in all, which is about the known extent of what is known as the Copperhead and Copper King lodes, which assay seventy-six to eighty per cent. copper with several dollars of silver to the ton; also a little gold.

Another correspondent in the issue of September 1st says:

Going up Dry creek with a feeling that you have passed the edge of civilization and that nothing but dense forest, unbroken, save by an occasional mining camp, lies beyond until the settlements upon the west side of the Cascades shall have been reached, it is quite a relief when the foundations of several pretty homes are first sighted in Horse canyon, and later the picturesque farm of Mr. Virden is found nesting down on the Swauk, while a great and agreeable surprise is felt when a continuous line of settlement, in every degree of development, from the well fenced and otherwise well improved farms of Messrs. Giles, Seaton Senior, and Masterson, to the "tomahawk improvements" of the last corner, is found all along the Teanaway and skirting the southern margin of Lake Cle-Elum. Several thousand acres of agricultural lands have been located in this region during the present season and thousands of acres of mixed timber and open lands yet remain open for settlement. A large mill race has been taken out of the Teanaway and two sawmills and a gristmill are now under construction. The principal settlement lies along and one to four miles away from the Seattle and Walla Walla wagon road, as also of the proposed Cascade division of the Northern Pacific railroad, the 100-mile tree from salt water being located at a point just opposite the mouth of Teanaway creek. At no distant day this must be a large and prosperous settlement, and will add not a little to the traffic of both wagon road and railroad. The heavy snowfall, averaging perhaps three and a half feet, and the supposed prevalence of destructive frosts, have done much to retard the settlement of the Teanaway country, but hardy Minnesotans are filling up the region and are well satisfied.

Passing through miles of open country in which berry and hazel nut bushes occasionally vie with each other in blocking the way, the whirr, whirr of the grouse, and the deer and bear signs seem quite often, very quickly explain the great attachment our dusky population feel toward this section. Sighting the magnificent waters of Lake Cle-Elum, bounded upon one side by high, craggy, treeless peaks and upon the other by gently sloping, forest-covered hills, free from underbrush, one can readily understand what a magnificent sight must have been presented when, in days ago, the lake was dotted with gaudily decked Indian canoes, or its ice-environment surface was illuminated by hundreds of torches of the piscatorially inclined children of the forest. Nor is any great stretch of the imagination required to enable one to see that at no distant day the waters of this beautiful lake must attract to its shores many persons upon health or pleasure bent.

Again on December 8th the Standard quotes from a communication of Charles B. Reed, in the following language:

We are not ashamed of the following statement concerning our town, valley and surroundings, sent by Postmaster Reed to Charles S. Fee, Assistant Superintendent of Traffic, Northern Pacific Railroad Company, in response to a request:

"First, Ellensburg is located about one mile north of the Yakima river; second, population, 450, an increase in two years of 400; third, water power abundant; fourth, has two hotels, capacity 150 guests; one National bank, capital $50,000; two public halls, also an Odd Fellows and A. O. U. W. hall combined and a Masonic hall; four general merchandise stores, carrying $50,000 in stocks; six retail stores and sundry minor establishments, shops, etc.; two newspapers, two livery stables, and a fine two-story public school building erected entirely by public subscription; fifth, in the immediate vicinity are five gristmills of from ten to twenty barrels capacity, and excellent equipment; also three sawmills with capacities of from eight to twenty thousand feet per day; sixth, in adjacent mountains $75,000 in placer and $100,000 in quartz gold have been taken out by primitive processes and during the past season an extensive field bearing copper ore assaying from fifty to eighty per cent. copper and carrying $15 to $1,000 in silver per ton, has been discovered; also a belt of bituminous coal lying in veins of from five to eight feet adjoining the copper and iron fields; . . . ninth, our shipments are live stock to the amount of $500,000 per annum, driven chiefly over the Snoqualmie Pass wagon road to Puget Sound markets, and wool hauled 150 miles by wagon and shipped to Portland, Oregon; tenth, in game we have deer, bear, grouse, prairie and sage chickens, ducks and geese, while in fish, every stream carries fine salmon and speckled trout; eleventh, our neighboring towns are Yakima City, fifty miles, stage fare, $5; Ainsworth, 125 miles, $15 fare; The Dalles, 150 miles, $15, daily stages, and Seattle, 125 miles. To reach the later the Snoqualmie Pass wagon road is being constructed, upon which mail service has been ordered and by which stage fare will be $12."

An event of the year 1883 deserving, perhaps, of a passing notice, was the expulsion of a family named Wilson from the valley as a result of a sensational criminal trial in which one of them appeared as prosecuting witness. It seems that about 1881, the Wilsons settled on the school section, along the Nanum creek, eight miles northeast of Ellensburg. Two years later, Elsie Wilson, one of the young women of the family, laid a complaint against one William Clark, a cowboy, charging him with the crime of seduction. Clark was arrested and placed under bond, but later the case was compromised in some way. The defendant was re-arrested, however, and a sensational hearing before Justice Ford, who resided a mile and a half south-east of Ellensburg, resulted in his discharge.

The young man had many staunch friends who made open accusations against the Wilson girl, and who expressed their indignation, at the time of the hearing, by repairing to Ford's court in force, loading the family into a wagon and taking them down the canyon to Squaw creek, where they were released with a warning that they should never again set foot on Kittitas soil.

Upon reaching Yakima City, Mrs. Angie Wilson immediately commenced civil proceedings against George O'Hare and others, retaining Allen & Whitson and Reavis & Prun as her attorneys. The defendants employed Mires & Hill and Hiram Dustin, so that both parties to the battle were well represented by legal talent. After a hard contest in Judge Turner's court in Yakima City, the case was concluded June 2, 1885, by a verdict of $5,000 damages against five or six of the leading defendants. The collection of the judgments greatly crippled several well known Kittitas citizens and caused quite a number to leave the valley.

Great activity continued throughout the year 1884, notwithstanding the scarcity of money which no doubt operated as a brake upon the wheels of industry. The mountains were scoured by prospectors, though, it is said, the already discovered properties were not developed so energetically and persistently as during the previous twelvemonth. There was, however, much activity in the Swauk district, which was reorganized and had new laws enacted for it at a meeting held at John Black's cabin, May 7, 1884. The limits of the district were described as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Teanaway and running along the east bank of the same to the Swauk trail; thence to and along the summit of the Swauk and Teanaway divide; thence to and along the summit to the Peshastin and Swauk divide; thence to and along the summit of Wilson creek and Swauk divide; thence along and down the same to the 'Nineteen-mile post' on Dry creek; thence westerly to and across the Yakima river; thence up the same to a point opposite the mouth of Teanaway river and across the Yakima river to place of beginning." A feature of the laws enacted was that by them all Chinamen were forbidden to come into, mine or hold property in the camp. The notice to the Chinese by this legislation was signed by the following: Luke McDermott, T. Lloyd Williams, S. Bandy, James A. Gilmour, Zeb. Keller, Moses M. Emerson, James Eoall, Daniel May, J. C. Pike, W. H. Elliott, T. F. Meagher, L. McClure, A. J. Wintz, Louis Quietsch, John Black, G. S. Howard and D. L. Evans.

In an article in the Northwest Magazine bearing date of September 29, 1884, H. C. Walters spoke of this mining district as follows:

"Fifteen miles south of Peshastin and twenty-five miles from Ellensburg is located the Swauk district, chiefly noted for its placer deposits from which $50,000 to $75,000 have been extracted in nugget gold. The pay is found in an old channel which cannot be traced above the mouth of Becker creek, yet much of the gold has the appearance of having been washed a long distance. Nuggets have been found weighing from $100 to upwards of $750 each; and a perplexing feature in the matter of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to the source of the placer deposits is found in the fact that many of the nuggets, mixed with a sort of porphyritic quartz or 'spar,' appear to have been freshly broken from veins of that character occurring in the mountain beyond which the older channel is not higher traceable. The gravel deposit in and about the discovery is deep, the pay spotted and water for extensive working difficult to procure. Hence placer mining has thus far been confined to drifting and ground sluicing in a limited way simply for the bedrock gold. Beautiful wire gold specimens in every imaginable shape and design are found in these placers. As much as $1,100 in spiral and other curious wires have been taken from a single crevice. The bedrock, alternately slate and sandstone, occasionally carries small seams of coal, and here the strange anomaly has been presented of bituminous coal and native gold in the same crevice. Hydraulic mining has recently been undertaken upon a small scale and it is highly probable that in the near future water sufficient for extensive working will be carried by ditch and flume upon an immense auriferous gravel deposit, appearing to mark the point at which the ancient stream empties into the lake or other body of water once covering Kittitas valley. This deposit is fully one-half township in extent and its greatest depth is one hundred feet.

"Gold bearing quartz, assaying from $10 to $300 and remarkably free in character, has been discovered in the Swauk district. Considerable money has been expended in an effort to develop the Homestake Company's property, but here, as in fact in almost every other mining enterprise undertaken in this region, the amateur mania for tunneling upon undeveloped quartz prospects prevailed and in consequence nothing beyond the value and extent of highly promising top croppings is known."

But the precious metals and copper do not constitute the only minerals of Kittitas county. Even in 1884 the existence was known of a mineral which has since surpassed all others in importance and wealth producing power, namely coal. The discovery of "float" had caused some desultory prospecting at a very early period and its presence was responsible for the interest taken in the Lake Cle-Elum country by the Northern Pacific Company, long before the rails were laid through Kittitas valley. At any rate about the year 1881, they sent into the region a prospecting party in charge of a man named Taylor. The party failed to discover the desired commodity, and had the assurance to report the utter absence of it in the country.

Two years later the Lake Cle-Elum region began to settle up. April 28, 1883, Thomas L. Gamble came and staked off as a homestead the southeast quarter of section twenty-six, township twenty north, range fifteen east, which is now a portion of the townsite of Cle-Elum. By him Walter J. Reed was induced to come in and take the claim adjoining on the west. These two men were the first permanent settlers in the township, but later that same summer came C. P. Brosious, a prospector, and located on a claim between Cle-Elum lake and the site of Roslyn. He was soon followed by Chris. Anderson, John East and John Stone and perhaps one or two others. The land proved very productive, yielding as a reward for the labor and faith of Mr. Gamble a large crop of potatoes and other vegetables the first season. Another arrival of the year 1883 was H. Witters, who built a saw-mill at the mouth of Teanaway creek, operating the same by a turbine water wheel.

Hardly had Mr. Gamble completed his cabin when his attention was called by Mr. Brosious to the float coal found in the vicinity. As he had formerly been a resident of the Pennsylvania coal fields, Mr. Gamble was familiar with the mineral and competent to judge of its quality. The specimens exhibited by Brosious he found to be good, but he nevertheless took but little interest, giving his energies rather to the task of building a home in the wilderness. There were others, however, who gave the matter more attention, among them George D. Virden and William Branam, the former of whom, it is claimed, opened up what was probably the first deposit of any size found in the county, a portion of what afterward became Mine No. 3, situated at Ronald. But little development work was done the first summer. The discoveries, or supposed discoveries of the year were summed up in a newspaper of the time as follows:

"In reference to the recent coal discoveries in this county, we learn from Messrs. Gamble and Masterson that the present limits of the coal field are the Masterson gulch, left fork of the Teanaway and Lake Cle-Elum. Thirteen locations have been made by Seattle and Renton people and six quarter sections by Messrs. Schnebly, Smith, Bull, Walters and others of this place (Ellensburg). Mr. Gamble an experienced operator, states that three likely discoveries have been made, one a five-foot vein of bituminous coal of excellent quality being undoubtedly in place. Coming upon the heels of the successful season's campaign among the copper, silver, iron and other smelting ores of the Cle-Elum and lying upon the proposed line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, in the very gateway of the Cle-Elum district, these coal discoveries are of great importance to our whole people."

The same publication in its issue of November 17th says: "Now comes John Stone forward with tidings of the finding of no less than four well defined veins, though from what is told us we are of the opinion that this latest find is on the same belt as those of the Teanaway. Mr. Stone's find is four miles and a half northwest of the Preston ranch, and on the east side of the Yakima river. Among those who have located are: John Stone, C. P. Brosious, J. R. Tucker, William and K. Branam and 'Auntie' Maynard."

To George D. Virden and "Nez" Jensen belong the honor of exporting the first coal from the Roslyn mines. The former took his out in a sack and tried it in a blacksmith shop in Ellensburg. June 24, 1884, Jensen started with his first load, and throughout the whole summer he made fortnightly trips with team and wagon, supplying the Ellensburg blacksmiths. This ore was taken from what became known as the "Dirty" vein, opened by Jensen, Brosious, Branam and others.

Throughout the season of 1884 much prospecting was done. Among the seekers for hidden treasure were Brosious and Reed, who together had the previous year discovered the vein on which Mine No. 3 was later located. They met with little success in 1884, finding only occasional specimens or broken ledges of poor quality, but during the spring of 1885, in company with Judge I. A. Navarre, of Lake Chelan, they discovered the famous Roslyn vein in upper Smith creek canyon. The original prospect was a large cropping on a hillside a little west of Mine No. 3. It was covered with earth originally, but this the prospectors scraped away, bringing to light a considerable body of coal. Smith creek is a small stream draining into the Yakima, a narrow, short, irregular and densely timbered cañon heading above Roslyn.

Judge Navarre called the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's attention to the discovery of the Roslyn vein, which promised better than any prospect previously found, and he succeeded in inducing the company to send experts to locate the property and look over the field. None of the original discoverers were ever directly recompensed for the valuable information furnished the railway officials. They could not locate the find themselves as it was upon railroad land.

In May, 1886, the Northern Pacific Company's party made its appearance in Kittitas county. Its personnel was H. E. Graham, Harry Cottle, Thomas Flemming, Archibald Patrick, William Thompson, Archie Anderson and William Anderson, and it was equipped with diamond drills and everything else that could facilitate the search. At Masterson's ranch, four miles east of Cle-Elum, it sank its first prospect hole, and found the mineral of which it was in search, after which the drill was moved to a point north of Cle-Elum. In a comparatively short time a number of splendid mines were discovered and located.

August 12, 1886, active development work was begun by a force of eighteen men under the supervision of James Anderson. Simultaneously with the prospecting party came also a company of engineers, surveying for a practicable route from the main line at Cle-Elum to the coal fields, and in June construction crews reached Cle-Elum and began work on the Roslyn branch. By November or December the road to the mines was completed. The shipment of coal commenced at once and the rapid development of the region began. It is claimed that the discovery of the Roslyn coal beds was what definitely decided the railway company in favor of the Stampede pass, rather than the Naches or any other.

Unfortunately, the opening of the mines gave rise to much litigation between the railroad company and the settlers. The company began at once an effort to secure possession of the entire district, buying the claims of settlers and carrying them forward to patent as rapidly as the law would allow. Many persons took advantage of the situation by acquiring an inchoative right to land, in order to sell to the railway at a good price. Some claims netted their owners as high as $3,000. Many bona fide settlers were forced to sell as they could not prove up under either the homestead or pre-emption laws, when the land was shown to be mineral in character, and to patent the claims under the statutes governing the disposal of such lands cost $20 an acre in cash, besides a specified amount of development work.

Of course, the railway company could not acquire the whole district peaceably, and in August, 1886, it contested the claims of twenty-six settlers on the ground that the land was mineral and not agricultural in character, offering as evidence to sustain its contention the affidavits of H. E. Graham and Archie Anderson, two of the prospecting party sent out the previous spring. In order to oust the settlers the coal company must prove that at the time of filing on the claims the settler-knew of the existence of mineral thereon, certainly a difficult task. The case was taken directly to the General Land office and two years later was decided by the secretary of the interior in favor of the settlers.

Meanwhile the main line of the Northern Pacific was in course of construction through Kittitas county, giving employment to all who wished it, furnishing a market for the products of the agriculturists, distributing thousands of dollars in a county that had theretofore suffered through lack of a sufficient circulating medium and otherwise contributing almost immeasurably to the development and settlement of the whole of south central Washington. Throughout the entire year, 1886, the company was active in the Kittitas country and the mountains to westward, pushing to completion the connection between the two parts of the Cascade division. During the fall of that year, the efforts to fill in the gap become especially strenuous. Says the Yakima Signal of October 13, 1886: "A recent trip along the road from Tacoma to Ellensburg demonstrates to the satisfaction of a Signal representative that, if the present favorable weather does not break, through trains will be running early in January. On the west side (of the Cascade mountains) the track is laid nearly to Hot Springs, a distance of thirteen miles east of Eagle Gorge, and on this side the track has reached McGinnis's, twelve miles from the mail tunnel. The grade is nearly if not quite completed to the east face of the main tunnel, barring the trestles and the minor tunnels, which will be finished in time to allow of the track's reaching the switchback by the 1st of December. Hunt's grade work on the east side will be completed to-day and between five and six hundred laborers will be let out, some of whom have been secured to push the work on the west side. The grading on the switchback is approaching the finish, and will be delayed only for the trestling. Leonhard's mill, having exhausted the suitable timber at Tunnel City, has moved to a point two miles west of Cle-Elum, where it will be utilized in sawing trestle timbers, which will be fitted at the mill and moved by car to the switchback, ready to be swung into place and bolted. On the west side the work is not so far forward. A reduction of wages on October 6th to two dollars a day lessened the forces considerably, but the old wages are to be reinstated and the work hurried forward. Engineer Pogue is desirous of having the connection made by the 1st day of January, 1887, and is exerting every energy to that end, and should the weather hold good his desires will be fulfilled."

When at last the gap was bridged and trains began laboriously working their way back and forth over the interminable windings of the switch-back, the country enjoyed not only the blessings of a transcontinental railway but likewise a continuation of the period of construction, for the great Cascade tunnel kept men at work constantly for years. The impetus given to the territory at large, by the completion of the iron pathway connecting it with the east, soon enabled it to knock successfully at the doors of the federal union, and Kittitas county, by reason of the fact that the bars of its isolation were broken forever and owing to the development of its mineral as well as its agricultural and timber resources, was ready to take a prominent place among the political divisions of the larger Washington.

It is necessary to record but a few more events happening in the county during its life as a part of the territory. In 1885 was incorporated the Ellensburg Water Company with a capital stock of $40,000, subscribed by the farmers and real estate owners of the Kittitas valley. It proposed to itself the task of constructing the first large ditch ever undertaken in the county. The canal took its water out of the Yakima river and carried it in a south-easterly direction across the valley, covering at first several thousand acres, and subsequently a much larger territory. The people were rather slow in carrying forward the enterprise and after about ten miles of the ditch were completed, work was suspended until 1891, when it was extended seven miles further. One of the moving spirits in this important enterprise, which gave a great impetus to Ellensburg, was S. T. Packwood. For several terms he served as president of the company of which he was the largest stockholder at the time he disposed of his interests.

The territorial legislature of 1885-6 passed an act slightly changing the boundary between Yakima and Kittitas counties and correcting an error in the wording of the act creating the latter. By this change of boundaries, Yakima county gained nearly four townships on the upper Wenas, while Kittitas gained a township embracing in part the Yakima canyon. The language of section one of the bill follows:

"That the boundary line between Kittitas and Yakima counties, in Washington Territory, be and the same is hereby changed and shall hereafter be as follows, viz.: Commencing at a point where the main channel of the Columbia river crosses the township line between townships fourteen (14) and fifteen (15) north, of range number twenty-three (23) east of the Willamette meridian, and running thence west on the said township line to the range line between ranges eighteen and nineteen east, thence north on said range line six miles, or to the township line between the townships fifteen (15) and sixteen (16) north, thence west on the said township line to the range line between ranges seventeen (17) and eighteen (18) east, thence north to the township line between townships sixteen (16) and seventeen (17) north, thence west along said township line and a line prolonged due west to the Naches river, and thence northerly along the main channel of the Naches river to the summit of the Cascade mountains, or the eastern boundary of Pierce county." Governor Squire approved the bill February 4, 1886. No further changes have since been made in the county's boundary lines.

The first serious railroad accident in the county occurred, according to Thomas L. Gamble's valuable diary of events, on March 31, 1887. A locomotive working on the divide above Easton became unmanageable and started down the track at a terrific speed. The fireman jumped early and escaped injury. As the engine rounded a sharp curve, the engineer also jumped. He struck against a high bank, rebounded onto the track and was seriously though not fatally bruised. A little below this point and beyond another sharp curve, four men were at work on a high trestle, spanning a canyon. One of these men was struck and killed instantly; another jumped to the ground, seventy feet below, and was badly injured, though he recovered; a third threw himself flat between the rails and escaped owing to the fact that the engine was running on one rail at that point in its mad career, while the engine left the tracks before it reached the fourth man, who watched the steel monster leap through the air, down to a snow bank many feet below. It was hauled out of its resting place, repaired and placed in service again. The inquest over the body of the unfortunate man killed by this accident was held by Mr. Gamble.

April 21, 1887, less than a month later, another and more serious accident occurred, the scene this time being the vicinity of Cle-Elum. A large construction crew was being taken back from dinner on a flat car pushed by an engine. A drunken engineer was in charge, a man who took great delight in throwing the throttle wide open whenever he felt so disposed. On the flat car were twenty men, sitting in front and on the sides with their legs dangling over the edges, when the train pulled out from Cle-Elum to a place where the men were employed some distance up the line. A mile and a half above town the train rounded a curve at a rapid rate of speed and crashed into the tender of a disabled engine in front, which was slowly descending the grade, flat car and tender coming together. Five men were killed instantly, their remains being frightfully mangled; three more were mortally wounded and all the rest were injured more or less seriously.

At an inquest held before Justice Gamble at Cle-Elum, the crews of both engines were bound over to appear before the grand jury at its next session. Before the next term of court the train crews departed for parts unknown, and as the grand jury failed to find true bills against any of them, no attempt was made to mete out punishment to those guilty of this awful disregard of human safety and life.

An event long to be remembered by those who were residents of Kittitas county at the time was the great Roslyn strike commencing in August, 1888. It was instigated, so it is claimed, by the Knights of Labor, then a new organization. The strikers demanded that the hours of labor be reduced from ten to eight and that other concessions be granted, but their principal contention, and the one which was most strenuously objected to by the adverse party, was that all employees not affiliated with the Knights of Labor should be summarily dismissed. Upon the refusal of the superintendent to accede to their demands, the strike was ordered at once, the strikers calling upon all workmen to give them a moral support. Indeed, Mr. Gamble tells us that a virtual reign of terror was inaugurated, and that the chief victims were those toilers who refused to go out in sympathetic strike when so ordered. He states that about the middle of August, the employees of Thomas Johnson's mill at Cle-Elum were directed to cease work forthwith; that upon hearing of it, Mr. Johnson called his men together and asked if they had any grievances; that on their replying in the negative he asked them if they would remain at work and they said yes; that the men were armed and placed in a position to defy the strikers, when at length the latter appeared. Upon being told to go about their own business, he says, the strikers threatened to burn the sawmill. They failed, however, to carry their threats into execution, as the mill was vigilantly and efficiently guarded.

It is also related that Superintendent Alexander Ronald was captured by the mob, severely beaten and then placed between the Roslyn branch railway tracks to meet death from an oncoming train. Fortunately, the train crew saw the man in time. They did not dare to stop, but slowed down considerably that the fireman might pick Mr. Ronald up, a feat which he successfully accomplished, the angry mob hooting and jeering the while. The train brought the outraged man to Cle-Elum and placed him in the Reed hotel where he and others who had incurred the enmity of the strikers were closely guarded by citizens. An attempt to capture certain persons within this place of refuge on August 28th was frustrated by the courageous opposition of Sheriff Packwood, Judge Gamble, Walter J. Reed, Theodore Steiner and a number of other defenders. The next day there came at the request of the miners Governor Semple and staff. The chief executive went to Roslyn, accompanied by Sheriff Packwood and addressed the citizens of that place. He declined to interfere in the situation, stating that such action could not be taken unless at the request of the sheriff, who had as yet said nothing to indicate that he and his deputies were unable to cope with matters. So Governor Semple returned to Olympia without having interfered with the county's affairs. The trouble continued in a desultory way, however, although Sheriff Packwood and his large force of deputies in the mining region warded off serious complications, and Governor Semple, January 22, 1889, again visited Cle-Elum in an effort to settle the strike. Sheriff Packwood remained in office until the following March, keeping such a firm hand upon the situation that the operation of the mines was continued uninterruptedly and after the first few outbreaks, there was no more trouble of a serious nature, though some few indulged in petty acts of a malignant and contemptible kind. Mr. Gamble claims that to his personal knowledge, three different men were beaten into helplessness and then permanently maimed by having each an eye kicked out.

The company filled the places of its striking employees with negroes imported from Illinois. Two shipments were brought out, special trains guarded by deputies being run to convey them to their new homes in the west. For two years afterward the black population of the district outnumbered the white, but the first negroes imported were a corrupt lot, and the company filled their places by whites as rapidly as possible. There are, however, still quite a large number of negroes at Roslyn.

CHAPTER II.

CURRENT EVENTS.—1889-1904.

The early months of the first year of statehood were not specially prosperous ones in Kittitas county. There was a great scarcity of snow in the mountains throughout the winter of 1888-9, and the result was a shortage of water for agricultural purposes. The grass also was affected by the drouth and cattle were left in poor condition to withstand the hardships of the following winter. The farmers having very little produce to sell experienced a scarcity of ready cash that was in many instances embarrassing. They, of course, contracted as few debts as possible, doing without everything they could and unloading nearly all their surplus produce right after the Ellensburg fire when the demand was extraordinary. They did comparatively little business with the merchants and the result was dull times.

The fall of snow in the winter of 1889-90 made the farmers jubilant over the prospect of good crops and plenty of water the following season. But the snow lay on the ground so long that much hardship was experienced, especially among the stockmen. Even as late as February 26th, the mercury recorded thirty-four degrees below zero.

"The winter of 1889-90," says the Capital in its issue of April 10th, "has been one long to be remembered by the people of Ellensburg and Kittitas valley. It followed on the heels of a dry summer which had caused short crops, and although the heavy snowfall brought joy to the hearts of the farmers, it lay so long on the ground that it brought dismay to stockmen, for the ranges were covered to a depth which made it difficult for stock, especially cattle and sheep, to reach the bunch grass underneath. As a consequence the loss was unusually great, and for a while a feeling of discouragement was plainly visible. Now, however, spirits are rising and both farmers and business men are putting their shoulders to the wheel."

The dry season had at least one beneficial result for it led the people of the valley to redouble their efforts to provide a sufficient supply of water, so that by August of the year 1889 they had almost completed the ditch known as the West Side canal, which would furnish water for about ten thousand acres of arid land besides supplying the shortage on farms theretofore partially irrigated. They thus added many thousands to the value of property on the west side of the river, augmenting very materially the productive capacity of the land.

During the year 1890 a petition was presented to the legislature, asking for a division of Kittitas county and for the formation of a new county to be known as Grant. The boundaries of the proposed new political entity were to be as follows: Commencing at a point where the township line between townships twenty-three and twenty-four crosses the range line between eighteen and nineteen east, Willamette meridian, and extending thence south on said line to the township line between townships nineteen and twenty; thence west on said line between townships nineteen and twenty to the range line between ranges seventeen and eighteen; thence south on said range line to the township line between townships sixteen and seventeen; thence west along said line to the Naches river; thence northerly along the main channel of said river to the summit of the Cascade mountains or southwest corner of Pierce county; thence north along the eastern boundaries of Pierce, King and Snohomish counties to the main channel of the Wenatchee river; thence down said river to where said river crosses the township line between townships twenty-three and twenty-four; thence south on said township line to the point of beginning.

The principal opposition to the division, it is stated, came from the merchants, bankers and real estate men of Ellensburg who feared the building of a town of importance in the proposed county, which with its rich mining interests would rival Ellensburg and take therefrom much of the trade now received from the western portion of the county. The farmers and taxpayers aside from the class named were generally favorable to the division because they claimed that the extra expense of preserving law and order in the mining districts had increased their burden of taxation. But the proposal failed to receive the favorable attention of the legislature.

Notwithstanding the partial failure of crops in Kittitas valley in 1880 and the losses to the stockmen due to the hard winter following, the next year found the valley in a flourishing and prosperous condition. Indeed, the time was past when small losses would affect the county or retard its growth. The property values according to the assessment rolls were increasing steadily from year to year.

The United States census for 1890 credited Washington with a population of 349,496, and Kittitas county with a population of 8,761, placing it twelfth among the counties in point of population. This was, by comparison with the state auditor's report, a gain of more than 2,000 in three years. By precincts, the county's population is officially given as follows: Easton, 172; Ellensburg, 2,758; Martin, 77; No. 17, 504; No. 18, 992; No. 19, 411; Rosa, 12; township fifteen, 15; township sixteen, 21; township seventeen, 288; township eighteen, 328; township nineteen, 117; township twenty, 45; Cle-Elum, 337; Deerlick Swamp, 2; Fish Lake, 17; Lake Katches, 2; Mission Creek, 185; McCallum, 8; Rycpatch, 3; Ronald, 409; Roslyn, 1,481; Seaton's mill, 28; Silver Dump, 99; Swauk, 34; Teanaway, 14; Wenatche, 81; unsurveyed lands, 38; Wenatche Point, 203; total 8,761.

The fourth annual county fair was successfully held on the Kittitas County Agricultural Association's grounds at Ellensburg, September 8th to 12th inclusive, and proved to be a very congenial and profitable gathering. At the Northwest Industrial exposition, held at Spokane during the closing days of October, 1890, Kittitas county was awarded a gold medal, a silk banner and a superb mountain goat head for the best combined mineral and agricultural display and for the greatest variety of natural products. H. C. Walters was in charge of the exposition.

It was at this time becoming more and more apparent to the farmers of the valley that a larger supply of water must be secured for utilization in the agricultural development of the valley, and during the years 1891 and 1892, a movement was set on foot for the construction of a canal that would furnish water to at least eighty thousand acres in addition to that already irrigated. A corporation was formed known as the Kittitas Valley Irrigation Canal Company, the following named gentlemen being the incorporators: W. H. File, W. J. Magee, Willard S. Sargent and J. H. Wells. The capital stock was one million dollars; the object the construction of the upper ditch previously projected and the irrigation of the land of Kittitas valley. The men promoting this scheme were possessed of ample means and courage to carry through any feasible undertaking, and it was generally believed they would achieve an excellent success. Commenting upon the scheme and its reception by the farmers and merchants, the Register, in its issue of June 14, 1892, says:

"The business men of Ellensburg and the farmers of Kittitas valley, who have withstood the great fire of 1889 and the short crops for the past three years, which latter were caused by a scarcity of water for irrigation purposes, must certainly feel proud to know that an immense crop is assured for this year, and that the long-talked-of water canal is an assured thing. Ellensburg is in the center of a valley containing two hundred thousand acres of as fine land as can be found. Our farmers have pledged thirteen thousand acres and twenty of our business men seven thousand acres to Mr.

J. H. Wells, the promoter of the high line ditch. This land will be put under water this year, as Mr. Wells has gone east to secure the capital required for the enterprise and promises quick action. Besides payment for the water right on these twenty thousand acres, the company will receive a dollar an acre per year maintenance fee."

In October of the same year contracts were let to J. A. McDonald for the construction of the canal. Thirty miles of clearing contract were sub-let to Messrs. Matthewson and Charles Dickson, of Tacoma, between Easton and the mouth of the Swauk. In November eleven hundred men were reported at work on the right of way. In all about twenty thousand dollars were spent in surveys and clearing; then unfortunately the undertaking had to be abandoned because of the advent of financial stringency and wide spread industrial stagnation.

Early in the year 1892 occurred one of those heartrending accidents such as occasionally happen in the course of human activities. About two o'clock in the afternoon of May 9th there was an explosion in the Roslyn mines causing the death of forty-five men. Two boys coming from the mine with a donkey and a car of coal were forcibly expelled from its mouth and after them came a cloud of smoke and gas. As soon as the nature of the accident was surmised a party of twelve men under Foreman Harrison were sent into the mine in search of those within. They found little trouble in descending. When passing between the third and fourth levels they discovered the bodies of Harry Campbell and Leslie Pollard (colored), both of which were with difficulty borne by them to the surface, where the reappearance of the rescuers was awaited with not a little anxiety. It was hoped that many of the imprisoned miners might escape, but when the first bodies were examined, despair and gloom possessed the hearts of all.

By 12 o'clock fourteen bodies had been removed, all more or less bruised and burned, and nearly all so disfigured that they could not be identified. Then the gas in the mines became so oppressive as to compel the search party to suspend operations until the mine could be repaired. Thursday, the 12th, the work of bringing out the dead was resumed, and by Friday night forty-five bodies had been recovered.

Relative to this melancholy disaster, George Harrison, foreman of the mine, expressed himself thus in an interview with a reporter of the Seattle Press-Times:

"I was at the office when the explosion occurred. I went to the mines at once and called for volunteers. The men responded nobly and worked unceasingly. At noon yesterday there was no fire damp in the mine, as is demonstrated by every man working with a naked lamp; no safety lamps. There must have been a sudden outburst of gas. No expense was spared by the company to prevent accidents. The mine is considered a model mine.

The stoppings are built of cement and rock. New fans and air courses were recently put in. The men are satisfied that everything possible was done. The company has nothing to conceal and desires this to be known."

Justice Thomas L. Gamble, of Cle-Elum, held the coronor's inquest over the dead, the local justice, Henry Smith, being disqualified because of his close connection with the miners. The inquest was held at Roslyn. The testimony brought out the fact that the rooms in the slope were examined regularly by competent fire bosses and that as they found the mine somewhat disposed to give forth heavy gases, they repeatedly warned the miners to be careful. From the evidence submitted, Mr. Gamble says it is quite clear to him how the explosion occurred, though the jury did not fix the individual responsibility for the affair. Among the miners working on the seventh level near the main entry was one who was inclined to be careless, and in his efforts to effect a junction between the room and the entry, over zealous. This junction was nearing completion at the time the explosion occurred and there remained but a narrow wall to be pierced. The fire boss cautioned the men against shooting this breast as there was great danger from gas. However, the miner in question showed by his manner and remarks that he intended to "shoot" the wall anyhow. Again the fire boss warned him. A little later the explosion occurred. When the coronor's jury visited this particular room they found drill holes in the wall and around them indications of exploded powder. The miner to whom reference is made was discovered sitting on the floor with his back against the wall, some distance from the drill holes. He was undoubtedly killed by the concussion which resulted from the explosion. It is Judge Gamble's belief that he "shot" the wall contrary to good judgment and repeated warnings and that the great disaster resulted therefrom. The jury was composed of four business men and two miners; it sat eight or ten days in the Roslyn town hall. Its verdict was as follows:

"We, the undersigned, summoned to inquire into the cause of the death of the persons whose bodies were found in coal mine No. 1, Roslyn, having been duly sworn according to law and having made such inquiries, after inspecting the bodies and hearing the evidence adduced, upon our oath, each and all say that we find the deceased (naming the dead) came to their death by the explosion of fire damp in mine No. 1. We further find that said explosion was caused, in our opinion, by deficient ventilation, all of which we duly certify."

The Northern Pacific Coal Company finally agreed upon a compromise with those who instituted suits for damages whereby the surviving relatives were paid varying sums of money and the suits dropped.

In September of the same year, came news from the mining district that set the whole western country ablaze with excitement. A bold and successful attempt at robbery had been made on the bank of Ben E. Snipes & Company, at Roslyn. The manner in which the robbery was conducted as can be gathered from the newspapers of the time was as follows:

Five armed men rode up to the door of the bank, which three of them entered while the two others stood guard outside. Cashier Abernethy was writing when the first robber entered, and turning to wait upon the supposed customer, found himself facing a forty-five Colts revolver. Dr. Lyon, who had just entered, turned to go out, but was brought to a halt by a pair of Colts revolvers in the hands of the second robber. The third desperado picked up a pistol belonging to Cashier Abernethy and knocked him down with it. The cashier arose, his head streaming with blood, and was told to keep quiet if he wanted to live. The third robber then walked to the safe, which happened to be open, and taking out the coin and bills, shoved them into a canvas bag, which he then threw over his shoulder. The three men thereupon departed, joining the two who had remained without to guard the approaches to the bank.

Just before the robbers had made their sudden appearance, F. A. Frasier, assistant cashier, had stepped out. As soon as he perceived what was transpiring he came with a shot gun, but a ball from the rifle of one of the robbers, wounding him in the hip, prevented his interference. A colored man also was shot in the leg, and several others narrowly escaped injury or death at the hands of the murderous gang. The robbery successfully consummated, the five desperados mounted as many fleet horses, which had been held in readiness by one of their number, and speedily disappeared via the trail which leads over the mountains to the northward of Roslyn.

The sheriff was notified forthwith, and speedily organizing a large posse, started in hot pursuit. Manager W. R. Abrams, of the firm of Snipes & Company, offered a reward of one thousand dollars for the apprehension of the robbers. This was supplemented by an offer of an equal amount by Cashier Abernethy and of five hundred dollars by Governor Terry.

The robbers were dressed as cowboys and showed themselves to be expert in horsemanship and the use of weapons, executing their plans in a manner that would have done credit to the James gang. As Saturday was pay day at the Roslyn mine, $40,000 arrived from Tacoma that morning. It was this the robbers were after. They presumed it was on deposit in the bank for distribution, but fortunately it had been taken to the company's office. What are supposed to have been three of the gang were noticed by coal company officials at the depot in Cle-Elum at five o'clock Saturday morning when the money was transferred from the Northern Pacific car to the coach on the Roslyn branch.

By seven o'clock of the day on which the robbery took place, thirteen of the pursuing posse came in contact with three of the desperadoes, and a few shots were exchanged but, owing to the darkness, it was impossible to tell with what effect to the fugitives. None of the posse was hurt. The next morning three horses were found on the trail taken by the robbers, and marks on them evinced that they had been hard ridden. Later in the day two of them were identified as having been among the animals ridden by the desperadoes Saturday. The other horse was a pack animal laden with provisions and clothing. Two of these animals were retained in the hope that their original owners might be found by the brands.

The sheriff's posse returned after a search of several days' duration, having failed to find any new trail of the gang. The same day another Roslyn party also returned, reporting that they had followed the trail of the robbers along the high ridges to a point east of Mount Stuart, where was found the remains of a fire where clothing had been burnt. The ashes were still warm.

A detective named M. C. Sullivan was placed on the trail of the desperadoes and toward the end of November he arrested Cal Hale, Tom Kimzie and George Zachary in eastern Oregon on a warrant issued upon the affidavit of F. A. Abernethy, the cashier of the bank, charging these men and others with being the perpetrators of the crime. The warrant called for the arrest of Byron Barnard in addition to the men named, but for some reason he was not taken into custody, though he telegraphed his address to the chief of police at Portland, Oregon, on learning that he was wanted.

Hale, Kimzie and Zachary were given a preliminary trial Monday, November 28th, before Justice Boyle. The defendants were without counsel. They asked time to summon witnesses in their behalf, but it was unnecessary that testimony for the defense should be heard in the preliminary hearing, and the request was denied. Cashier Abernethy positively identified Hale as the one who had assaulted him with a revolver, afterwards taking $5,000 in money from the safe, while Doctor Lyon asserted that Kimzie was the man who held him up while the robbery was being committed. Other witnesses also identified the three as members of the gang and the bond of each was fixed at $10,000. Two others were arrested later but both were discharged after preliminary hearing.

A large reward had been offered for the apprehension of the robbers, and it was the intention of the state to spare no expense in its efforts to capture and convict the responsible parties. Attorney Henry J. Snively, of North Yakima, was retained by the state to assist Prosecuting Attorney McFall. The trial was first set for January 3d, but had to be postponed twenty-seven days, an important witness for the state being sick. Meanwhile E. E. Wager had become prosecuting attorney, and he with Mr.

Snively conducted the state's case. The attorneys for the defense were Frost & Warner and A. Mires.

As may be imagined the interest in the trial was intense. That it was not local merely is evinced by the fact that a special correspondent was sent by the New York World to report the proceedings for that paper. About thirty-five witnesses were summoned from eastern Oregon to testify in behalf of the accused, while the state called about fifteen, two or three of whom were from that section and the remainder from Kittitas county.

On request the defendants were granted separate trials, Cal Hale's being called first. A jury was secured with little trouble, the members of which were E. B. Mason, J. K. Morrill, Isaac Burns, J. F. Leclerc, L. Raskins, D. R. Richards, Harrison Houser, E. S. Coleman, D. Hannon, T. M. McCandless, W. A. Rice and S. T. Packwood. The taking of testimony occupied three days, twelve witnesses for the state and seventeen for the defense being examined. The story of the robbery, as told by F. A. Abernethy, Dr. J. H. Lyon, George M. Jenkins, Mrs. Clemens and Mrs. Veach, all of Roslyn, was in accord with the statement of facts already made. They fixed the date as between two and three o'clock in the afternoon of September 24, 1892. According to the review of their testimony made by the press of the time, it was substantially as follows: While Cashier Abernethy was alone at work two men and Dr. J. H. Lyon, a resident physician, entered. Both the cashier and the doctor were ordered to throw up their hands. One of the robbers immediately walked over to where Mr. Abernethy was standing and dealt him a stunning blow on the head with a gun. A third man entered, and covering Professor George M. Jenkins and a colored man named Smith, who were joined by a boy named Hewitson, he compelled them all to hold up their hands and watch the robbery. Their two confederates stood outside, one holding the fine saddle horses ridden by the gang, while the other guarded the street. The vault was open and it took but a few minutes for one of the men to secure the money, which amounted to over $5,000 in gold, silver and paper, besides which some checks were taken. This man, the apparent leader of the gang, was identified as the defendant by Abernethy, Lyon and Jenkins; Mrs. Clemens also identified Hale as one of the gang that rode away from the bank. Attempts to further identify Hale only resulted in eliciting the information that the prisoner closely resembled the man connected with the robbery. The testimony of George M. Jenkins brought out the fact that ten of the pursuing posse tracked the robbers from Roslyn to the Teanaway trail crossing, where several shots were exchanged with the posse by three of the desperadoes without effect; that the trail led toward the river and that the posse withdrew unsuccessful on the afternoon of September 25th.

The main efforts of the defense were directed to establishing the good character which Hale bore among his neighbors. An attempt was also made to establish an alibi. The evidence bearing on Hale's reputation in Oregon was especially favorable to him, but the positive testimony of those who said they saw the defendant commit the crime made a stronger impression upon the minds of the twelve jurors, for after five hours' deliberation, they returned a verdict of guilty as charged.

The case against Thomas A. Kimzie was called February 7th. The same attorneys appeared as in the Hale trial. A special venire of jurors was issued and returned, and after nearly forty had been rejected, the following were chosen: F. D. Schnebly, A. C. Steinman, John Olding, A. Welty, James Hornbeck, Chris. Johnson, John F. Denton, F. G. Hume, John Gilmour, William Beers, David Murray and Frank Martin.

The general character of the testimony was similar to that given in the Hale case, the prosecution seeking to establish the identity of the defendant as one of the robbers, and the defense setting up an alibi and offering proof of the good character of the accused at home. Dr. Lyon, George Jenkins, John Hewitson, Mrs. Veach and E. G. Hanlon swore positively that Kimzie was one of the men engaged in the robbery. Marshal Beal testified that a man closely resembling Kimzie drove him back when the shooting began, but was not positive that Kimzie was the man. Cashier Abernethy failed to identify Kimzie as the man who assaulted him, on the contrary claimed that he was not the man. Johnny Hewitson testified that Kimzie was the man who ordered Professor Jenkins and himself inside the bank during the robbery. Several witnesses for the defense testified as to Kimzie's reputation and whereabouts on September 24th. The case was given to the jury on the 8th, without argument. As might be expected from the contradictory nature of the testimony, the jury failed to come to any agreement; seven standing out for acquittal and five for conviction. The charge against George Zacliary was dismissed on the ground of insufficient evidence and later the two others were discharged on account of strange developments in the case, for while these trials were in progress, some new and exceedingly interesting complications had arisen. From a woman in Salt Lake City word was received by the authorities to the effect that the wrong men were being held for the crime. She offered to give information as to who the guilty ones were, if she could be assured that she would be protected from their assaults. Deputy Sheriff Banks and F. A. Abernethy made a trip to Salt Lake to interview the woman. Upon her statements a warrant was secured for the arrest of George, William and Thomas McCarty, of Baker City, Oregon, one Ras. Lewis, alias Christiansien, and two others. Deputy Sheriff Banks started for Baker City, Oregon, with a requisition for the three McCarty brothers. Arriving April 2d, he found Chief Farley, of Denver, there in quest of Tom McCarty, who was, it appears, also charged with having committed robbery in Colorado, and together they started for their men.

The warrants were turned over to Sheriff Conde, of Baker City, for service as the law required. It was ascertained that George McCarty was on Cracker creek, about forty-five miles from town and that William was at Haines. Deputy Kinison was despatched with a party to arrest George, an undertaking which was accomplished without difficulty. It was agreed that Banks and Farley should arrange with Sheriff Conde for the arrest of William. Sheriff Conde consented to start immediately, but insisted that it was unnecessary to take assistance; that if William McCarty knew he was wanted he would come in and give himself up. Banks and Farley protested and Conde finally consented to call for them at ten o'clock that morning, April 3d. They waited until eleven in the evening but no Conde appeared, though when they inquired as to the cause of his delay they were assured that he would soon come. He failed utterly to do so, however, and at eleven o'clock next day, April 4th, it was ascertained that he had started for Haines alone. Farley immediately set out after him, and overtaking him, rode into town in his company.

Upon arriving at the McCarty place, the officers were informed by a boy that William was out on the ranch, from which, however, he was expected to return soon. They then drove away, each in his own direction, having first agreed to meet later and make the arrest together. When Farley met Conde an hour afterward, the latter was much excited and said that William and Tom McCarty had held him up and made their escape. The story he told was that he saw William coming in on a horse, went out to meet him, and told him that he had a warrant for his arrest on a charge of complicity in the Roslyn bank robbery. William agreed to go with the sheriff if he would accompany him to the house. Conde did so. Just as they arrived at the door, Tom McCarty came out with a Winchester and getting behind the officer, compelled him to go into the house where he was disarmed and held a prisoner by Eck. McCarty until William and Tom had made good their escape. When Tom drew his gun on Conde he exclaimed: "You want to arrest Bill, do you? Well, you can't do it. I am the one that is responsible for this business, but you will never take me alive."

A message was sent to Baker City to raise a posse at once to scour the country for the escaped men. This message was the first intimation Mr. Banks had that the arrest had been attempted and he was greatly puzzled at the action of Sheriff Conde. A posse was quickly raised and started in pursuit of the McCarties. Their horses were found about ten miles out from town, but the whereabouts of the men could not be discovered although it was thought that they were hiding somewhere near. Thus by the false confidence and bungling of the Baker county officer was the one chance of arresting the McCarties lost. Deputy Banks returned home April 7th, accompanied by Chief Farley, who, as before stated, had come from Denver in search of Tom McCarty, wanted in that town for holding up M. V. Moffatt on the street a few years previous and taking $21,000 from his person.

Meanwhile Marshal McGrath, in company with Officers Wallace and Hart, had proceeded to Douglas county, Washington, in quest of Ras. Lewis and the other suspects. The different printed accounts of their adventure are slightly at variance, but no doubt that given by the Yakima Herald is substantially correct. That paper said: "The arrest took place at a cabin occupied by Christiansien, where the officers in the garb of miners applied for something to eat. When Christiansien was returning from a neighboring spring with a bucket of water he was covered with three guns and ordered to throw up his hands. Instead of obeying the command he laughed, dropped the bucket and reached for two guns which he carried in his breast pocket. The officers overpowered him before he could draw, and brought him and his two companions to this city (North Yakima), where they were held in jail until taken to Ellensburg, on the 5th."

George McCarty and R. Lewis were brought before Judge Boyle for examination. The state was represented by E. E. Wager and the defendants by Prun and Ready and by Judge C. A. Johns, of Baker City. By stipulation, the examination was continued until Monday, April 17th. Bail was fixed at $10,000 each, in default of which the defendants were remanded to jail.

Attorney H. J. Snively about this time received a letter bearing date May 1st, from Rose Lewis, wife of Ras. Lewis, alias Christiansien, who, from the time of her husband's arrest, had been stopping with her mother in Salt Lake City, Utah. In this epistle she declared that she was tired of Lewis's criminality and that she was willing to assist the authorities in capturing and punishing the lawless gang. She stated on oath that Ras. Lewis, her husband, George, Bill, Tom, Fred and Nellie McCarty were the only persons who took a hand in the bank raid. The plans for the robbery were laid at Ephrata, Douglas county, Washington, in Ras. Lewis's home, and after the robbery a part of the gang returned to that point.

The following is a verbatim copy of a part of the letter: "I am the living witness that George McCarty, Bill McCarty, Ras. Lewis, alias Ras. Christiansien, Tom McCarty, alias Williams, Fred McCarty and Nellie McCarty are the only individuals interested in the above robbery. This, your honor, judge and gentlemen of the jury. I swear by the powers of all heaven and the right of our government, as an honest citizen, the wife of Ras. Lewis, alias Christiansien. Now as for dates, as near as I can remember, about the 10th of September, they just met to our house planning the robbery, they left about the 12th. In about two weeks Ras. Lewis went to them and returned either the 1st or 2d of October. That was the last I saw of them until November 12th, 1892, when Billy, Tom and Fred McCarty came there to plan for another robbery and would have gone but for my interference. I swear to what my sister, Sarah Jane Morgan, has said, that it is the truth only, so help me God. Rosa Willard is my marriage name, Christiansien in Oregon, Lewis in Washington. Am also witness for five other robberies, train, bank, and store.

On Sunday afternoon, May 21st, the day before the trial, George McCarty and Ras. Lewis made a bold break for liberty. It was customary to allow the prisoners the freedom of the corridors between the hours of nine and four. McCarty and Lewis were given their dinner at the customary hour, shortly after one o'clock, and everything seemed as usual, but the highwaymen had their plans made and were only waiting for an opportunity to put them into execution. By means of a crowbar, a hole was quickly made in the brick wall, and through this the robbers crawled. They then ran across the yard and jumped the fence to the street. Under the sidewalk they found two revolvers secreted there by some of their confederates, and these they took with them. They started down Sixth street. Soon they were discovered by a couple of men who gave the alarm and started in pursuit. At Water street the fugitives turned north toward the Catholic church, shooting at their pursuers as they turned and hitting a man named Hayes in the arm. At this critical juncture, Mose Bollman and O. B. Castle appeared in front of the robbers, coming in a buggy from a hunting trip. Mr. Bollman, quickly taking in the situation, proceeded to use his shot gun, and soon both fugitives were wounded with fine shot. Being thus attacked from the front, the fleeing men ran across a residence block to Mr. Clymer's house, where they hid behind a projection. Here they were discovered by Charles Pond, whom they drove back with their revolvers. Mr. Helm sought to persuade them that their course was a foolish one, but arguments were answered effectually by two ugly looking weapons shoved in his face. Soon the officers and a large force of men arrived on the scene and the prisoners withdrew to Clymer's house, where were Mrs. Clymer and her son alone, neither of whom the fugitives offered to harm. Presently the escaped prisoners found themselves confronted with two shot guns loaded with buck shot and concluding that further resistance was useless, they allowed themselves to be led back to jail by Marshal McGrath and Deputy Sheriff Banks.

A Winchester rifle and belt of cartridges were found under the sidewalk, where the prisoners had taken the revolvers, and a further search of the jail and prisoners resulted in the discovery of two small saw frames and eighteen blades, an inch drill and a one-half inch bit and brace. The escape was certainly well planned and failed of success only because of the prompt action of officers and by-standers. It is supposed that the prisoners were to meet two men, who were seen approaching town on horses without saddles, but miscalculated the time.

On the following day, May 22d, the case of Lewis was called. In selecting a jury the regular panel was exhausted as were also special venirees of one hundred and forty-six before the following were secured: Elmer Goodwin, William McMillan, George P. Bradley, A. Anderson, Joseph Preece, Edgar Pease, R. M. Osborne, John Benson, A. Jensen, W. A. Scribner, Stanley Ames, and — Jones.

The first witness called was Cashier Abernethy, who testified to the facts heretofore narrated concerning the manner in which the robbery was accomplished. Then Mrs. S. J. Morgan, sister-in-law of Lewis, was called. She testified that in September, 1892, she was living with the Lewis family at Ephrata, Douglas county, Washington, where they were keeping a restaurant; that about the middle of September Lewis went away and was gone three weeks; that before going he had told his wife he was about to rob a bank; that upon his return he told her he had robbed the Roslyn bank, and had brought back the proceeds in a belt made for the purpose at Coulee City; that she helped count the money, which amounted to about $1,100. She testified that before he went away three of the McCarty boys had visited him, and that he rode a gray horse belonging to a neighbor on the trip, telling the owner he was going to Rock Island on a real estate deal. The horse was wounded in the jaw, a fact which Lewis explained as having been caused by cutting out glanders. She said she was sent to Waterville for papers giving the news of the robbery.

Ole Hanson testified that on the night of September 24, 1892, Lewis, in company with four others, came to his cabin on the Teanaway inquiring for the trail. They offered him ten dollars for his lantern, which he refused. They then offered him ten dollars to guide them to the trail. This he did. They went to a log cabin where they had left their horses a few days before. They told Hanson of the robbery, and threatened to kill him if he informed on them. After giving him the ten dollars as agreed they struck him in the face with a revolver and left him.

Joe Brooks, a former partner of Lewis, testified that the defendant left home about the middle of September, 1892; that he borrowed a horse belonging to witness saying he was going to Rock Island; that he returned about ten days later, both horse and man being in an exhausted condition. He said that the McCarty boys came to the house and held secret conferences both before and after the bank robbery; that he heard them counting money in the bedroom; that Lewis wanted him to aid in the robbery of the banks; that he had visited George McCarty and wife at Iron Mountain in company with Lewis. He identified the horses as belonging to the McCarty boys.

Doctor W. H. Harris, of Roslyn, testified that there were footprints of a woman among those of the men wherever the pursuers found tracks of the robbers afoot, and another witness identified the horses in the possession of the officers as the property of the McCarties.

The principal effort of the defense was directed toward discrediting the identification of Lewis. The lawyer who defended Cal Hale in the first trial of the Roslyn bank robbery case testified that Cashier Abernethy swore Hale was the man who took the money in the bank, and that on cross examination he was the only witness who admitted he might be mistaken. The stenographer at the same trial gave evidence that Abernethy said he was satisfied in his own mind that Hale was the man, though admitting the possibility of his being in error. It was also shown that other witnesses had sworn that men other than the defendant were the men who committed the crime. At one P. M. Thursday, May 25th, the jury retired and on the following day they reported that it was impossible for them to come to an agreement, eight standing out for conviction and four for acquittal. They were discharged.

The case of George McCarty was then taken up, and to try him the following jurors were selected: W. M. Stenson, J. M. Pease, W. H. McKee, C. D. Rhodes, B. A. Maxey, Ole Johnson, William Cutcheon, A. O. Fowler, William Norton, F. M. Leslie, Nick Blazen and W. W. Spurling.

The first witnesses called were those in the Lewis trial and their testimony was about the same. James Masterson identified the prisoner as the man he had seen at his house, eight miles from Roslyn the September before, and A. L. Bridgeman testified that he had seen McCarty on September 12th about twelve miles from Roslyn, accompanied by a woman and another man. J. M. McDonald identified the defendant as the man who held the horses in front of the Roslyn bank at the time of the robbery. He also testified that he saw three horses next morning and that they were the same as those held by the officers, and that he had found cooking utensils and footprints, including those of a woman, on the trail.

William Fisher, of Baker City, testified to having sold McCarty a horse before he left the valley. Mrs. Morgan, on being recalled, related that one of the robbers was shot by his own revolver on the retreat from Roslyn; that they crossed the river in an old boat for which they made oars; that they separated after getting ashore, and that they had deserted the horses after being fired upon by the posse from Roslyn. She also repeated the story of the cartridge belt and the counting of the stolen money in the cabin. She told about Sheriff Simmons, of Yakima, coming to Ephrata in search of the robbers; that Lewis sent her to the house to ascertain his (Simmons') errand, which she did. She explained that her hatred for Lewis was occasioned by his cruel and inhuman treatment of her sister (his wife), relating that on one occasion he had compelled her to dance at the point of a gun, and that on another occasion he drew a revolver on the witness, telling her that if she ever divulged any of his secrets he would cut off her ears and nose and otherwise disfigure her so that the dog would not look at her. Lewis also told the witness that Billie, Fred, George and Nellie McCarty went with him to rob the bank.

Joe Brooks testified that he saw Billie, Fred and Tom McCarty at Lewis' house September 12, 1892, and noticed their horses, the same ones now in Ellensburg in the hands of the officers.

The defense was opened by the calling of several witnesses to testify to the good character the accused bore at Baker City, and William McMillan, juror in the Lewis trial, testified that while giving testimony in it, Sarah J. Morgan had asserted her intention to send Lewis to the penitentiary and that now was the opportunity. J. Adkins testified that on September 24, 1892, the day of the robbery, he had ridden with Lewis from Crab Creek to Rock Island.

George McCarty, the defendant, being placed on the stand, said he lived at Baker City, Oregon, and had been prospecting since 1884. He left Sumpter valley accompanied by Ras. Lewis, Tom McCarty, Mrs. Lewis and his own wife. He prospected through the Peshastin and Swauk during the summer, going back to Baker City in September. He denied any connection with the Roslyn bank robbery in any way. He also denied that he had ever acknowledged that he had robbed the bank or that he had seen his brothers and Lewis after he had left the Columbia river. The last of September he and his wife and a man named Jones, whose whereabouts were not known, were in the Swauk and Peshastin prospecting. Mrs. Nellie McCarty, wife of the accused and known as the "Queen," substantiated her husband's testimony. She thought that they were camped on Tarpestan creek in September.

The jury again disagreed, seven voting for acquittal and five for conviction. Lewis and McCarty were both held for another trial, but at the September term of court they were dismissed by Judge Graves because of the inability of the state to procure the attendance of witnesses.

September 7th they were brought before Justice Boyle for preliminary hearing on a charge of shooting with intent to kill on the occasion of their breaking jail in the spring, but the evidence against them was held to be insufficient to warrant their being bound over, and they were accordingly discharged from custody.

Regarding the fate of the other McCarties believed to have been connected with the robbery, the Register of September 16, 1893, gives the following information:

"The two men killed at Delta, Colorado, on Thursday last (September 14th) while attempting to escape after robbing the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank and killing its cashier, have been positively identified as Tom and Fred McCarty, father and son. The third man, who escaped, is Billy McCarty. These men are undoubtedly a part of the gang who robbed the Roslyn bank last fall, and for whom a reward of ten thousand dollars is offered on account of their having robbed stages and United States mail.

"Chief of Police Farley, of Denver, says that Tom McCarty is the man who robbed President Moffitt of the First National Bank of that city about four years ago of $21,000. Ras. Christiansien, recently turned loose from the Kittitas county jail, was with Tom McCarty when he robbed Moffitt. George McCarty, another brother, and his brother Bill are the only members of the gang at large, but Tom being dead the country may breathe easier. Christiansien is a Dane and the most dangerous of any of them. Billy is addicted to the habit of excessive drinking and for that reason has never been entrusted with the carrying out of any plans.

"Jobs beside that at Roslyn with which the McCarty boys are positively identified, are the robbery of the San Miguel County Bank at Teluride, Colorado, in June, 1889, $22,000; Wallowa National Bank, Wallowa, Oregon, October 8th, 1891, $3,450; Farmers' Mortgage and Savings Bank, Somerville, Oregon, November 3d, 1891, $5,000."

This is the story of the Roslyn bank robbery, which in connection with a combination of circumstances was responsible for the failure of the banking house of Ben E. Snipes & Company, of which the Roslyn Bank was a branch. The Yakima Herald of June 15, 1893, contained the following item:

"The banking houses of Ben E. Snipes & Company at Ellensburg and Roslyn closed their doors on Friday last, June 9th, being unable to weather a run made on the Roslyn Bank. The Ellensburg fire, business depression, a heavy judgment against Mr. Snipes in the Bunner-May case, extensive purchases of Seattle real estate on a dull market, loss of cattle and low prices of beef, the Roslyn bank robbery and cost of prosecution, together with inability to realize on securities, all contributed to bring about the suspension. The liabilities of the Roslyn and Ellensburg banks are $192,000, while the assets are estimated as $310,000. Much sympathy is expressed here for Mr. Snipes."

When the Ellensburg Bank failed to open its doors the company posted the following notice:

"This bank is temporarily suspended owing to other bank failures. Deposits have been steadily decreasing and money is so scarce that it is impossible to realize on anything at present. No depositor will lose a dollar by our suspension as we have ample resources to cover all.

"We hope to resume in a short time.

"Ben E. Snipes & Company."

Mr. Abrams, junior member of the firm, made the following statement about the failure:

"The story is a long one and goes back to the beginning of the hard times which in this locality was precipitated by the big fire of 1889. The main cause which has led to the climax is the stringency of the money market, which is similar to that of 1873. Were the times ordinarily good, the present condition of the bank would be considered sound and business could proceed without embarrassment. We have had a series of misfortunes that aided in precipitating the suspension. First, the loss by robbery to the Roslyn branch bank, which was no greater than the effect it had on the credit of the bank as a depository. To this add $8,000 expense in the prosecution of the robbers. Second, an ugly rumor was circulated last winter, seriously affecting the standing of the firm in this city, which at that time was gilt edge. Yet the story had its effect. Deposits have been steadily and constantly withdrawn, while but two small ones were made. I have felt for some time that there was an undermining, pernicious influence at work against us, but whether it is of a local nature or from elsewhere I am unable to say; neither do I understand the nature of it. Yet it has existed and has made the struggle all the harder to bear. Lastly, a run on the branch bank at Roslyn began Wednesday (June 7th) and culminated yesterday in drawing our funds from this bank to meet the demands there. I have no idea what caused the run, but it came and crippled us. The affairs of the bank are such that all the depositors will be paid in full, and is expected will resume business in a week or ten days at the outset."

Early in December, 1893, I. N. Powers, of Ellensburg, was appointed receiver by Judge Graves, of the Superior court, and he took charge about the 19th of that month. His annual report, dated March 20, 1894, shows the total assets of the estate of Ben E. Snipes and Ben E. Snipes & Company to be $354,805.43, and the total liabilities, $280,054.89. From this it would seem that the creditors in course of time would surely receive all that was due them, and that some would be left for Snipes and his partners. Not so, however.

In his report dated December 31, 1896, Receiver Power estimated the total assets at that time at $310,189.35 and the total liabilities $246,463.54. March 1, 1898, Dr. P. P. Gray, also of Ellensburg, succeeded to the receivership, Dr. Power having resigned. March 29, 1900, Gray reported that, acting under orders of the court, he made repeated efforts to dispose of all the assets in his possession at both public and private sale, that on a portion of the real estate he could get no bid whatever above the taxes then due; that $9,962 of warrants and $19,957.10 of asset notes, shown as credit balances on the books of Receiver Power were in the hands of the Merchants' National Bank of Seattle, and never came into his possession; and that $8,147.34 in notes reported in possession of the Washington National Bank of Seattle proved a total loss to the receivership, as did some rents due. "The results," said Gray, "of the efforts to sell the asset judgments, overdrafts Ellensburg, overdrafts Roslyn, cash items, Roslyn, and bills receivable, Ellensburg, proved very unsatisfactory in the amount obtained for the receivership. Where any bid could be secured it was for a very small fraction of the listed values and for a great portion the only bid obtained was one of two dollars for the unsold lot."

The Ellensburg bank property, listed at $22,500, was sold by Gray for $10,350; the balance of the May ranch and North Yakima lots, listed at $9,830, sold for $1,500; a number of pay checks drawn on Railroad Contractor G. W. Hunt, listed at $2,015.40, sold for $1.50; asset judgments, Ellensburg bank overdrafts, Roslyn bank overdrafts, Ellensburg bank bills receivable and other items amounting in all to $140,815.07, were disposed of for $564.41. March 1, 1900, according to official figures, the aggregate liabilities were $234,062.72, while the resources had dwindled to $42,369.93, of which $33,568.98 were in real estate. None of the creditors received more than 9.55 per cent. of their claims.

While it is said that the Snipes banks loaned money recklessly, it is still hard to understand why assets of such great apparent value should, in such good times as prevailed for years before the receivership ended, return so little in actual cash. The failure caused much distress in Kittitas county, probably a majority of whose citizens were directly affected by it. Many have severely criticised the judges, receivers and all others connected with the management of the estate.

Unfortunately the failure of these banks was but the beginning of financial disaster and business depression, which was general throughout the country, and from the effects of which no section wholly escaped. The next bank to close its doors in the county was the Ellensburg National. Thursday morning, July 27th, H. W. Thielsen drew the curtains and posted the following notice on the door:

"Owing to continued shrinkage in our deposits, and our inability to realize on our securities, this bank is obliged to temporarily suspend payment. Our resources are ample and no depositor will lose a dollar."

As a result of the business energy of the bank officers, the Ellensburg National was able to resume business by October 23, 1893. The manner in which it recovered its standing in the face of financial depression of the time reflects great credit on the management. We are informed that at the time of suspension the bank stood a drain of seventy-five per cent. of the deposits, having paid $140,000 in cash within that year.

It was not alone the financial interests of the county that suffered from the panic of 1893 and the hard times ensuing. The farmers and stockmen were also greatly affected by the low prices and poor market for their products. Especially did the sheep industry suffer during this year of unprecedented financial depression. The Wilson bill, practically placing wool on the free list, had struck a blow at the sheep raising business from which it would take years to recover. The Capital, of November 30, 1893, gives the following interview with J. H. Smithson:

"Speaking of my own case, and every sheep man's experience has been the same, last year I sold my clip for $3,600 without any trouble. This year the clip from the same band netted $1,260. Besides this the price of mutton is extremely low now; in fact, it can scarcely be sold at any price. Contrast the price of wool last year, 15 cents, with the present price of 5 cents, and you can easily see the sheep men cannot afford to feed, because, cheap as feed is, it does not take a sheep long to eat its head off. The sheep men will naturally take chances and turn the animals into the hills. If the snow is not too deep, they will come out all right; but a deep, lasting snow will practically wipe them out."

The crops for the year were exceptionally good, a fact which in part compensated for the exceptionally low prices. "The Register of July 29, 1893, informs us that: "Kittitas county will harvest this year the biggest crop ever raised within its confines. Wheat is headed out in large full heads and upon good stocks. Never in the history of this valley has vegetation been so rank. The yield per acre in hay and all cereals promises to be phenomenal, and it will require every moment of time until winter sets in to handle the crop. The snowfall last winter, the late spring with considerable rain are conditions that have proven what water will do in Kittitas county, and although the natural supply has not quite met requirements, the result is the biggest crop ever known here."

That the people elsewhere were feeling the condition of financial depression was impressed upon the minds of the settlers of Kittitas valley early in the spring of 1894. It will be remembered that about this time a man named Coxy had conceived the idea of making a personal appeal to congress for help for the unemployed. He thought to back up his appeal by an organized army of petitioners who should accompany him to Washington and personally second his demand. The people of Ellensburg and the surrounding country made their first acquaintance with this army of unemployed on their march to the National capital, on Friday, May 4th, when a few straggling members of the advance guard reached town. Saturday increased the number materially and by Sunday about two hundred had arrived. Among these was "Jumbo" Cantwell, the commander of the Tacoma legion. The men were without supplies, or any means of providing them, except by begging, tramp fashion, as they went along.

Donations were made by the meat markets and bakery; farmers and business men gave flour and vegetables and a dinner was served on Sunday, May 6th, to about two hundred and fifty men. On each day following they were similarly fed by the townspeople and farmers. For about ten days they continued to arrive and depart, although they experienced some difficulty in boarding outgoing trains, as the railway officials took to running their freight cars through at a high rate of speed to prevent the men from stealing rides. A great many, notwithstanding, managed to get out on the trains, and some probably walked to Yakima.

Finally, to get rid of the remainder, the council in special session apportioned seventy-five dollars' worth of provisions for the Industrial Army, and with these the last of them departed, some drifting down the river on rafts and in boats.

One boat, containing eighteen men, was upset and four of its occupants were drowned, three swam ashore, and eleven were rescued from a log on which they found lodgment. One of the bodies was washed ashore below the scene of the wreck. On the following day it was recovered and interred by the county. The remains were identified as those of J. Werner, of Spokane, who had joined the army at Ellensburg.

"It has been estimated," says the Capital, "by those who watched the army closely, that from 1,200 to 1,500 men passed through Ellensburg in ten days. While here they lived as well as, if not better than, many of our workmen, and of course their sustenance was a heavy drain on the community, and their departure caused no regret. As a body they conducted themselves in a very orderly and lawful manner and our people have no cause for complaint on that score. We are well rid of them and should be thankful for our fortune."

In June of the disastrous year 1894 occurred the great railroad strike, which was called through sympathy with the strikers in the Pullman Car Company's works. This tie-up was so far reaching in its results as to almost completely block all land traffic throughout the country. The strike took effect at Ellensburg June 28th. Every train was deserted by its crew and both passenger and freight transportation was brought to a standstill. Among the delayed trains was a special of thirteen Pullman tourist sleeping cars, containing Brigadier General Curry and staff and eleven companies of state militia en route to Olympia to attend the state encampment. No trains were moved until July 30th, on which date a crew to man one was obtained.

For the most part the strike in the Kittitas section was conducted in an orderly manner and few deeds of violence were committed. After the strike had continued about fifteen days, however, it was found that some of the more lawless had burned a bridge near Thorp. To this act the Yakima Herald of July 11th made the following reference:

"The great railway strike now raging throughout the nation is making itself felt in Kittitas county. Another outrage perpetrated by the strikers was the wanton burning of the costly bridge at Thorp Monday night, July 9th. The structure was one known as a combination bridge, wood and iron, the span of which was two hundred and fifty feet long. It will take weeks to replace it, although it is thought that a crossing may be effected in a few days by means of false work. The disturbance of traffic is working a hardship on farmers and business men all along the line of the road."

On the 13th of July, traffic began to move again. In the evening two passenger trains that had been laying at Ellensburg pulled out for the west and that night the special with the militia left. At the same time a passenger started east.

Two companies, A and D, of the Fourteenth infantry from Vancouver were stationed at Ellensburg during the strike. Detachments of these went east and west on the trains as a guard, getting off at Hope or Tacoma, and coming back on the return trains. Every train was guarded and a sufficient reserve was left in camp to provide against emergencies. The troops were withdrawn July 29th, after three weeks' stay.

By degrees the strikers resumed work, and those that still held out were replaced by others, until finally about the last of July, conditions became normal once more. Those going into the service of the Northern Pacific were required to take pledges binding them to support the constitution of the United States and to obey all orders of the United States courts.

Later in the year a strike was instituted in the coal mining regions. It resulted from an attempt on the part of the Northern Pacific Coal Company to reduce the scale of prices for mining coal at the Roslyn mine twenty per cent. The proposition submitted by the company was that they would pay eighty cents instead of a dollar a ton, with one dollar for hand picked coal, and in turn they would agree to furnish five days' work a week instead of two. They stated as a reason for the proposed reduction that if accepted they would be enabled to close a contract with the Union Pacific Railroad Company for five hundred tons a day. The miners held a conference at which it was decided to offer a compromise. This offer being refused by the company, another conference was had at which it was voted to strike. The company allowed a certain time for the men to agree to their terms, at the end of which time, they said, they were determined to fill the places of the strikers from without, if such a course became necessary. The miners were steadfast in their demands. In its issue of July 26, 1894, the Capital said:

"Last Saturday (21st) was the time limit for signing the coal company's agreement at Roslyn, but not a miner signed. General Manager Kangley is now in Seattle consulting. The company states that the places of the strikers will be filled at once, as it intends to operate the mines before August 15th. A detachment of regulars was sent up to Cle-Elum from the camp here on the 24th. The miners have been drilling at Roslyn for several weeks past; and as they have not been in an amiable mood, trouble is expected."

When it was announced by Manager Kangley that new men would be put in the Roslyn mines, a number of the old miners declared themselves in favor of accepting the company's terms and returning to work. At a meeting held August 6th, ninety-four of them voted for a resumption of work at the wages offered. They were outnumbered, however, one hundred and seventy votes being cast against the proposed resumption, but on the following day another meeting was held at which a decidedly different conclusion was reached. This time only twelve out of a total of five hundred and seventy-two expressed themselves in favor of continuing the strike. As a result hundreds of applications for work were filed and on Wednesday, August 8th, operations were resumed after a suspension of three months' duration.

During the following year (1895) occurred in Kittitas one of those tragic and now rather rare outbreaks of the mob spirit which once was so rampant in western life. The two homicides which led to the sensational lynching of Sam and Charles Vinson, father and son, occurred in the Teutonia saloon, August 11th. About six o'clock in the evening Samuel Vinson, who was without doubt under the influence of liquor, followed John Buermlin into the saloon and tried to compel him to treat. Buermlin refused with the words, "I loaned you two dollars and you have not paid it. You cannot drink with me." A quarrel ensued which resulted in Buermlin's being stabbed and Vinson's being severely beaten over the head.

While Vinson, the father, was quarreling with Buermlin in an effort to get him to treat, Vinson, the son, looked in at the saloon door. Seeing the bartender come around in front of the bar, he walked in and with drawn revolver compelled him to retire. Then Michael Kohlhepp, one of the proprietors of the saloon, took a club and attempted to drive the young Vinson out, but when Kohlhepp got within four feet of him, he fired, shooting Kohlhepp through the lung. The latter, however, retained sufficient strength to throw and hold his assailant until the city officers arrived and took both Vinsons into custody. Michael Kohlhepp was shot a few minutes after six o'clock and died before eight. John Buermlin walked to the office of Dr. Newland, who after an examination of the wound, found reason to hope for his recovery. He died, however, on Tuesday afternoon, August 13th.

After the demise of Buermlin there was strong talk of a lynching, but the prevailing opinion among the law abiding citizens was that such extreme measures would not be resorted to. As the evening advanced, however, matters began to assume a serious aspect, and by ten o'clock the streets were crowded with men. Sheriff Stinson placed six guards on duty, remaining with them himself, while Deputy F. D. Schnebly, after locking the steel cage, took the keys and went away. It was believed that the sheriff and guards could keep off any ordinary crowd and it was thought that even if a mob should get possession of the jail, they would not be able to break in through the steel bars of the cage, which were warranted to be proof against tools.

Contrary to the general impression among the citizens that the agitation would end in talk, a determined mob had collected by eleven P. M., at the jail. About forty in number, all fully armed with guns, revolvers, sledge hammers and railroad iron, they appeared before the door of the sheriff's office at the courthouse. On being refused admission they smashed in the door, whereupon the officers were covered by the guns of the mob and compelled to surrender. The crowd demanded the keys of the cage. On being told that Schnebly had taken them with him one of the men remarked that it was unkind of him to be away with the keys when the people wanted them, but that they could get in just the same. Two men were sent with Sheriff Stinson for the keys but failed to find Schnebly; consequently it was determined by those in charge to break in. This was no small job, as it was necessary to destroy the jail lock which was protected by a small iron box. The mob, however, divided the work among themselves and for two hours wrought energetically. Inside the doomed men took matters calmly considering the circumstances. Young Vinson maintained his reputation for bravado, swearing occasionally at his "blood hunters," as he styled them, and fanning out the flickering candle flame with his hat whenever he felt like doing so, apparently enjoying the annoyance which he, in this way, caused the men at work. The father seemed more keenly to appreciate what was coming and for the most part maintained a sullen silence.

At last about one o'clock the bars surrounding the main lock were cut, the so-called chisel proof steel being in fact of poor quality: the door was broken down and the prisoners secured after a short struggle in which the old man's head was severely cut and bruised. Meanwhile efforts had been repeatedly made on the part of several citizens, to disperse the mob but without avail. Judge Graves came from his home in answer to a summons and vainly endeavored to induce the men to retire, and other attempts of similar character were likewise futile.

The cell door being at last forced open, ropes were speedily passed around the necks of the doomed men, who, surrounded by their guards, were led away to the residence lot of Ed. Dickson on the corner of Seventh and Pearl streets, where the mob intended to hang them to an electric light pole. Mr. Dickson strenuously objected, however, pleading the enfeebled and nervous condition of his wife, and presently the crowd moved one block farther east to Pine street. Here a small cottonwood tree was found, to the lower limbs of which the unfortunate father and son were soon hanging.

The street was so dark that only the vague outlines of the crowd could be distinguished, and although all but the leaders were unmasked, it was not possible to recognize any of them. Only a part of the city was aware of what was going on, and even some of the people who lived in the immediate neighborhood of the jail and the tree did not hear of what had happened until next morning.

Sam Vinson was fifty-five years of age at the time of the lynching and Charles was twenty-nine. They were a worthless pair. The father when sober was no worse than many other citizens who would not be classed as criminals, but the son was a thoroughly desperate man and had been arrested several times for stock stealing. There is no doubt that they were guilty of killing the two men in the Teutonia saloon, but it is not certain that a jury would have found either guilty of a capital offense.

"The lynching," says the Yakima Herald of August 22, 1895, "was no doubt largely due to the fiasco in which the trials of the Roslyn bank robbers resulted. The first trial terminated in a conviction, but it was subsequently proven that the convicted men were innocent, and they were given their liberty. Then the real criminals were arrested and a disagreement of the jury resulted. By this time the county was nearly bankrupt and there being no money with which another trial could be had, Judge Graves ordered the prisoners turned loose."

An attempt was made to overtake and punish the parties responsible for this outbreak of mob violence. Eight persons were arrested by Sheriff Stinson on evidence furnished by the prosecuting attorney, namely, William Kennedy, Mike Linder, ex-deputy treasurer; John Bush, a wagon maker; Frank Uebelacher, partner of Kohlhepp, who was killed by Charles Vinson; Frank Feigle, and Frank Groger, brewers; Robert Linke and Patrick Desmond, farmers. Bush, Desmond and Groger were discharged for lack of evidence. The five others were held for trial on information filed by Eugene E. Wager, prosecuting attorney, charging them with murder in the first degree, committed August 14, 1895, when in the language of the information, "they did purposely and of their deliberate and premeditated malice kill Samuel Vinson by means of a rope placed and tightly drawn around the neck of the said Samuel Vinson." Judge Graves being disqualified because of having witnessed a part of the affair, the accused were given a trial before Judge T. J. Humes, of King county. The case went to the jury September 20th, and on the 21st the matter was terminated as far as the judiciary was concerned by the rendering of a verdict of not guilty, contrary to what would have been expected from the evidence and the judge's charge.

The year 1895 was a year of small profits to both farmers and business men. Although crops were good in the valley, prices were extremely low. Barley sold at seventeen cents a bushel, the lowest price ever recorded in the history of Kittitas county, and on account of the exceptionally low price of wool, the sheep industry was badly demoralized. Thus it came to pass that many of the farmers and merchants found themselves in straitened circumstances. Dairy products, however, brought uniformly good prices throughout the year and indeed throughout all the hard times proved one of the main reliances of the farmers.

The winter of 1895-6 was unusually long, cold and disagreeable. Snow fell to the depth of twenty feet at the Stampede tunnel and to an exceptional depth throughout the valley. A late cold and frosty spring followed in which considerable damage was done to fruit. However, the early summer months were warm and favorable and in a great measure atoned for the severe winter and backward spring. Nevertheless, as the result of a hot, dry period in July, 1896, water for irrigation was scarce during the late summer, and in consequence, the cereal crop for the year was somewhat short as compared with former more favorable seasons. The loss on this account was mostly confined to the late sowing, however, as the fall grain was pretty well matured before the hot weather commenced and was much less affected by the drouth. In this respect Kittitas valley suffered less than many other sections of the country. The hay crop of the valley was exceptionally heavy and was harvested without any deterioration from rain. The prices of cereals reached a point much in advance of the previous season, wheat going up to seventy cents, and so the farmers were compensated in some measure for loss sustained by them through deficiency in yields.

The period between the 13th and the 18th of November, 1896, was one of exceedingly high water in the Kittitas valley. It began raining on Friday, November 13th, and continued with increasing force during Saturday and Sunday. On Monday it snowed all afternoon and most of the night. Such was the condition of affairs at Ellensburg and in the mountains the storm was no doubt much worse. Not a little snow was on the ground at the time, and when the heavy rains came, speedily melting it, a flood was the inevitable result. Throughout the whole of Saturday night, the river rose at a marvelously rapid rate and by Sunday morning it was over its banks in many places. All day Sunday it continued to rise. Many people in the vicinity of Thorp had to leave their homes for higher ground; all the lower levels were covered with water and the railroad track was threatened in many places. Ellensburg was cut off from all railroad communication for several days, bridges being washed out both above and below the town. Tuesday morning brought cooler weather and a consequently speedy amelioration of conditions. The water fell as rapidly as it had risen and in the afternoon traffic began to be resumed. This flood was regarded by many as phenomenal though it had its counterpart, according to the statement of an early settler, about twenty years previous, when under similar conditions a still harder rush of waters occurred.

The unusual flood of 1896 was followed by an exceedingly cold period of about ten days' duration. Eight inches of snow fell in the Kittitas valley and at other points much heavier falls were reported. The snow in the hills was so deep as to cause stock men much apprehension for the safety of their cattle. November 28th, the thermometer registered twenty-eight degrees below zero, indicating the coldest weather for that season of the year since the advent of white men into the valley. The weather during the whole month was very unusual.

Early in the year 1897 evidences of the return of prosperity to the country began to be everywhere manifested, and the Kittitas people were among the first to feel the effect of the new and improved conditions. The crops for the season were excellent and that coupled with the advanced prices due to the improved financial condition of the country gave a new impetus to business and brought prosperity to all classes.

The hay crop of the season was exceptionally heavy, in fact surpassed that of all previous years, and it sold readily in the local market for nine dollars and upwards a ton. Wheat also was a good crop, and early in the season reached the seventy cent mark. Oats, barley and other cereals were also a splendid yield and sold readily for fair prices. The wool clip of the county for the year, estimated at about 600,000 pounds, sold at seven and eight cents a pound, and remunerative prices, abundant crops and ready markets soon restored commercial faith and prosperity.

And it was not alone in the farming districts that good times were working out their beneficent results. In August, 1896, reports show that the Roslyn coal mines were working only one and a half and two days a week, and that all operations were confined to level No. 2, no coal being taken out below, although much money had been spent in opening up the shaft and preparing for work. In August, 1897, the mines were being operated to their fullest capacity and the railroad was being sorely taxed to haul away their product. The output for the month of November was 48,365 tons and the December product was close to 60,000 tons. All the miners were kept steadily employed; indeed, it was even found necessary to work overtime, that the demands might all be supplied.

Considerable excitement was occasioned during the early months of the year by the trial of Thomas Johnson for the murder of George Donahue, a homicide which had occurred in June of the preceding year. Briefly stated the facts in the case are these: Ill feeling of long standing had existed between the two men. This eventually led to a quarrel, the final result of which was the shooting. The tragedy occurred in Peshastin mining district. Donahue was shot three times, two bullets entering his leg, one above and one below the knee; the third passed through his body killing him. Johnson immediately gave himself up, and at the preliminary examination before Judge Boyle, in Ellensburg, was bound over to appear at the next session of the Superior court in January. The trial was postponed, however, on account of the serious illness of one of the jurors, until the 3d of the following March, when the case was again called. Some forty or fifty witnesses were examined during the trial. The crime charged was murder in the first degree. The defense admitted the shooting of Donahue but entered a plea of self defense. From a legal standpoint this trial was one of the hardest fought battles that ever took place in the Kittitas county courts. Much interest was manifested by the general public and during its progress the courtroom was each day filled with a crowd of interested spectators. While the attorneys were making their arguments, all available standing room was occupied and the court judging the building unsafe for such an assembly ordered the aisles cleared. The arguments of counsel lasted from nine o'clock in the morning of Saturday, March 13th, until ten in the evening, each attorney being allowed two and a half hours. On the morning of the 14th, after six or seven hours' deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

July 19th, 1897, an event occurred which thro' the entire northwest and many other parts of the United States and the world into the temporary madness of a mining excitement. On that date the steamer Portland drew quietly up to an anchorage in Seattle with over seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of gold from the far north safely stowed away in her hold. This was the first large shipment of treasure from the rich Klondyke gold fields, while stories of fabulous wealth together with this substantial earnest of the richness of the north land occasioned an excitement throughout the entire northwest unequalled since the days of the Idaho placers. The result was an immediate rush for the land of treasure, where according to reports from fifty to two hundred dollars had been taken out to the pan. Some of the people mentioned by the press as among those who returned with fortunes were from this valley, and that made the local interest all the greater. Within a week a large company of Kittitas citizens had set out for the rich Eldorado. But this was not the only effect of the gold strike, for it was soon found that to get supplies across the mountain passes on the road to the new gold fields pack horses were necessary. Thus a new market was created for all the small horses of the valley, which sold readily for from twenty to twenty-five dollars a head.

While the Klondyke was attracting the attention at home and abroad, the local mining interests were not being neglected entirely. For some time the Swauk country had been coming to the front as a gold producer, and according to the report of the director of the mint, Kittitas county had taken the lead in 1895 in mineral production in the state of Washington, having furnished one-third of all the gold mined in the state that year. One week in September, 1897, four bonds for deeds for mining properties in the Swauk country were filed. Clean-ups of one hundred dollars a week were common; some as high as three hundred and fifty dollars to the man were reported, and throughout the entire year the district yielded a goodly output of gold.

Great as was the excitement over the discoveries in the Klondyke, it was almost lost sight of in the stirring events which took place the following year. As soon as the news had reached Kittitas valley that the United States had taken up the cause of the struggling Cuban people and was resolved to punish Spain for her inhumanity, the whole county was aroused to a sudden burst of patriotic enthusiasm. The Capital of April 23, 1898, says: "The effect was like a fire alarm and the throng was soon surging around the Capital bulletin window. In less time than it takes to tell it, flags and bunting were fluttering in the air; patriotic excitement ran high, and for the rest of the afternoon little besides the war prospect was discussed."

At the outbreak of hostilities Kittitas county had but one military organization, Company A, officered as follows: Captain, A. C. Steinman; first lieutenant, S. C. Davidson; second lieutenant, E. E. Southern; sergeants, J. J. Charlton, L. L. Seely, Robert Murray, Ralph Brown, W. O. McDowell, Holly V. Hill; musician, Whit Church; corporals, C. A. Swift, Willis Gott, James Shaw, G. M. Hunter, John Hoskins, J. J. Putman; wagoner, Edwin Barker; artificer, Charles P. Morgan.

The company offered its services to the governor, who promptly accepted them, and early in the morning of the 30th of April, Captain Steinman received orders to have his company ready to take the train for the west at ten-twenty-five that evening. From Ellensburg the company proceeded to Camp Rogers where it was mustered in May 11th as Company H, First Washington Volunteers. Seventy-five of the company, including the officers, were taken from Kittitas county; the remainder were recruited at Tacoma and Seattle from all parts of the state. The personnel of this company was as follows:

Colonel, John H. Wholley, commanding; major, John J. Wesenburger; major, W. J. Canton; captain, Alfred C. Steinman; first lieutenant, Edward E. Southern, promoted December 9, 1898; second in action April 11, 1899; second lieutenant, John J. Charlton, promoted September 3, 1899; wounded in action April 13, 1899; sergeants, first, Robert Murray; quartermaster, Luke L. Seely; Ralph Brown, William O. McDowell, James Shaw, John R. Hoskins; corporals, Caddy Morrison, Carstens H. Junge, George M. Burlingham, wounded April 20, 1899; John Brustad, William M. Pearson, William George, George S. Smith, James A. Harris, Burrel B. Wright, Charles H. Eiselstein, William Chambers, Charles Hagenson, Bert Godanier (cook); artificer, Arthur E. Snyder; wagoner, William Craig; privates, John A. Alm, Fred L. Ballou, wounded July 26, 1899; Edwin Barker, George A. Clark, wounded by gun explosion July 27, 1899; John R. Clark, James Cross, Clark E. Davis, Sidney O. Dickinson, wounded March 7th and April 27, 1899; Arthur H. Ellis, wounded April 27, 1899; Alexander Fraser, Steven A. Griffin, Robert Hovey, wounded April 27, 1899; Philip W. Harner, William T. Hill, Ralph Hepler, Edward T. Johnson, Francis B. Jones, Thomas P. Kerwin, John Lundy, Arno H. Moeckel, wounded February 5, 1899; Vanrancelar Martin, George C. McCarthy, Lee M. Putman, Albert J. Paulist, Byars E. Romane, William F. Ritchey, Solomon Russell, wounded March 6, 1899; Arthur F. Ridge, William Ridley, Joseph Vomacka, Thomas Williams, Robert C. Wenzel; transferred, privates, George W. Fitzhenry, to company B; Martin Forrest, to hospital corps; Paul Roberts, to 10th Pennsylvania; died, Corporal George W. Hovey, wounded April 27, 1899, died April 28, 1899; Privates, Albert J. Ruppert, killed February 22, 1899; Joseph Eno, killed April 27, 1899; Clyde Z. Woods, wounded April 27, died April 28, 1899; Sherman T. Shepard, wounded April 27, 1899, died June 18, 1899; discharged, First Lieutenant, Samuel C. Davidson, October 29, 1898; Second Lieutenant Joseph Smith, wounded February 5, 1899, resigned September 2, 1899; Sergeant Holly V. Hill, resigned to accept commission in 11th U. S. Cavalry; Sergeant Willis L. Gott, re-enlisted; Corporals, George M. Hunter, Robert Bruce, James J. Putman, Charles A. Swift, William B. Tucker, wounded February 22, 1899; Corporal Israel F. Costello, re-enlisted; Musicians John L. Grandin and Louis G. Frenette, re-enlisted; Musician Joseph R. Whitechurch; Artificers Charles A. Morgan and Stephen S. Blankenship; Privates William H. Adkins, wounded June 5, 1899; William S. Bullock, Frederick Bollman, re-enlisted; Henry H. Cassriel, Clinton H. Campbell, John S. Ellis, Edward Friel, re-enlisted; Otto N. Gustavson, re-enlisted; Byron E. Hersey, William E. Howard, wounded April 27, 1899; William W. McCabe, Emmett C. Mitchell, Roland D. McCombs, re-enlisted; Fred Nelson, Abel Nilsson, wounded April 27, 1899; Frank E. O'Harrow, Frank Rothlisberger, Thomas Richardson, Arthur J. Stoddart, Victor E. Sigler, re-enlisted; Winford E. Thorp, Harvey R. Van Alstine, William Ward, re-enlisted; James W. Walsh.

The company was organized as Company A at Ellensburg, October, 1890. They were mustered into the United States service as Company H, at Camp Rogers, Washington, May 11, 1898; did garrison duty from that time until October 28, 1898, when the company embarked on the United States transport Ohio, arriving at Manila November 26th. The company went ashore November 30th, and did outpost duty until the outbreak of hostilities with the Filipino insurgents. While in the Philippines they took part in the following engagements: Engagements with the insurgents, 1899, around Manila; at Santa Ana, February 4-5; Pateros, February 15th; San Pedro Macati, February 17th; Guadalupe, February 19-22 and March 13th; in trenches at San Pedro Macati, February 15th to March 13th; Taguig, March 18th; Bay Lake, March 19th; Taguig, April 9th, 16th, 20th, and 27th, May 19th and June 12th; Calamba, June 26th, 27th and 30th (expedition); a detachment of scouts took part in an expedition to Santa Cruz, April 8th and in engagements at Santa Cruz, April 9th and 10th; at Pagsanyan, April 11th; at Lamba, April 12th, and at Paete, April 13th. Detachments also took part in engagements at Cainti, Tayti and Morong.

They embarked for San Francisco on the United States transport Pennsylvania, September 4, 1899. They sailed September 5th by way of Nagasaki, the Inland Sea and Yokohama, arriving in San Francisco bay October 9th. They were mustered out at the Presidio, California, November 1, 1899, after almost a year and a half of service. On being mustered out, Colonel Wholley presented the company with the sights of the Krupp gun captured in the big battle of February 5th.

Meanwhile, all necessary preparations were being made for receiving the returning soldiers at home with a formal welcome. The Capital, September 23, 1899, says:

"At a special mass meeting held Monday night, September 18th, the following committee was appointed to act in conjunction with the Red Cross society in welcoming our soldier boys; J. B. Davidson, W. H. Talbott, Austin Mires, E. H. Snowden and H. S. Elwood. The soldiers left Nagasaki, Japan, September 16th and should arrive at San Francisco about October 8th. The following sub-committees were appointed: Finance, G. E. Dickson, chairman; program, J. B. Davidson, chairman; decoration, S. P. Fogarty, chairman; speaking, Ralph Kauffman, chairman; music, C. V. Warner, chairman; reception, Dr. J. W. Bean, chairman; print and press, A. H. Stulfauth, chairman; house and hall, E. T. Barden, chairman; banquet, Mrs. P. P. Gray, chairman; hospital and memorial, Rev. J. P. Smith, chairman; marshal of the day, J. E. Frost."

A later issue of the Capital, November 11th, gives this further information about the arrival and reception of the returning soldiers:

"On a train of fourteen coaches, Company H, and other eastern Washington soldiers rolled into the depot at 5:50 Tuesday evening, the 7th. The time of arrival had been spread broadcast and the result was that such a crowd as gathered to welcome them has never been seen in Ellensburg. It is safe to say that between the depot and armory from 4,000 to 5,000 people were lined up and scattered, each trying to outdo the other in noisy demonstration. It was unfortunate that the train did not arrive in daylight as the demonstration could have been seen and better appreciated by the soldiers; nevertheless it was a magnificent affair and the reception was a success from every point of view.

"The public and private decorations were beautiful and the soldiers passed many compliments on the display. The evergreen arch on Fourth and Pearl was a beautiful structure, both by day and night, and was a handsome tribute to the good taste and industry of the decoration committee. The business men vied with each other in beautifying their windows and the result was creditable to all.

"All the efforts above referred to were good—above criticism, but to the women of Ellensburg and Kittitas valley, working under the direction of the Red Cross society, must the greatest credit be given. When the troops left the train Marshal Frost quickly formed the parade and the march to the armory, with the volunteers in the place of honor, began. Besides the returning soldiers there were several companies of militia and cadets, making in all about 300 men who were to partake of the ladies' hospitality. On reaching the armory, the volunteers, amid the playing of bands and a gorgeous display of fireworks, were admitted to the banquet hall; after them the militia and cadets went in.

"The sight that met their gaze as they entered the vast hall was a beautiful one. The long tables beautifully decorated and loaded with the choicest delicacies, presented an inviting appearance, under the brilliant electric lights and without a moment's confusion the soldiers were seated by companies and were soon enjoying the good things prepared for them. After they had been seated, the crowd was admitted and soon filled every inch of standing room. Large delegations were in town from Cle-Elum and Roslyn and the band from the latter place contributed no small amount to the enjoyment of the occasion."

While the country had been vigorously conducting the war abroad, the pursuits of peace had not been neglected at home. It has always been characteristic of the American Republic that it emerges from a foreign war stronger, more vigorous, more wealthy, more prosperous than at the beginning of hostilities. This was especially true of the Spanish-American conflict. The condition of prosperity which had its inception in 1897 continued unabated throughout the following year and the local prosperity was great. By April, 1898, wheat had reached the eighty cent mark, a price not before recorded in five years. In May of the same year it went up to eighty-four cents. All through the winter of '97-'98 the Klondyke country had continued to make levies upon the young men of Kittitas county. Roslyn especially lost many. But at the same time the mining interests of the county at home were continuing to attract a proportionately large measure of attention. The Capital of May 28, 1898, informs us that: "The largest sale in the mining history of the county has been consummated by L. H. Jansen, who sold to T. P. Carson, who in turn transferred the property to the Cascade Mining Company of which he is manager. The syndicate is made up of Wisconsin parties. The following named properties were conveyed to the syndicate: The Becker, Ritz, Eureka, Pat Hurley, Tenderfoot, Swauk and Williams Creek High Bar placers, Black, Halvor Nelson, Gustaf Nilson, Mascotte, High Stump, Lillie, Klondyke, Sunnyside, Bloomer, Why Not, Gold Channel, Fremont, Discovery and Theresa. Water rights, also a reservoir site, are sold with these. Some of the claims, notably the Black, Meagher and Nilson properties, have been among the greatest producers in the camp."

Although the numbers withdrawn to the gold fields and the war left a larger measure of labor to be performed by those remaining at home, never at any time did the people of the valley become so absorbed in business affairs that they could not pause for a few hours to celebrate the successes of our arms on land and sea. As the news of the victories came, each more overwhelming than the last, if such a thing were possible, it was met by spontaneous outbursts of enthusiasm throughout the whole county. A current newspaper gives the following account of the manner in which the news of Dewey's victory was received:

"Never have our people witnessed such a demonstration in the town (Ellensburg) as took place last Monday night, May 2d, after the news of Dewey's victory in the Philippines had been received. It was a spontaneous affair, there being no fixed program arranged. The ball opened with a parade of the drum corps, composed of boys, including Austin Mires, the standard bearer. Soon fire crackers began to pop, followed by the roar of bombs and anvils, and from all parts of the city came the people. The crowd entered on Pearl street between Ford's cigar store and Weed & Parker's market, and there they turned themselves loose. Fire crackers were burned by the armful, rockets were sent up, bombs rared, whistles were blown, and the ladies formed themselves into a large choir, singing patriotic songs in which the crowd joined. For three hours the racket lasted and the patriotic smoke curled high above the celebrators; indeed the revelry continued all night long, though with diminishing fervor. A feature of the demonstration was the active participation of the ladies."

In similar manner was the news of Admiral Schley's victory at Santiago received. A telegram dated July 3d from the Seattle Times, conveying the misinformation that the Santiago fight was another "Bull Run" caused a general depression among all the people, but when in the evening the true result was reported, the news was electrical in its effect. Few slept that night. The din was too great to permit of sleep, even had anyone thought of such a thing.

February 10, 1899, the county was aroused to a high pitch of excitement by a daring and ingenious jail break. The three men responsible for the successful attempt were Arthur Harris, Charles Ray and Frank Thomas. The men were held for highway robbery, and were recognized as desperate characters, being allowed only a few hours' freedom a day during which time they were always closely guarded. The Capital of February 18th gives the following account of their escape:

"About 8:30 the janitor, W. J. Boyd, who sleeps in a room off the sheriff's office, heard the men in the cells call for more fire. He responded at once. As he stepped inside of the jail proper two of the men jumped upon him and quickly had him tied and gagged, using a towel with a stick as a gag. He was taken completely by surprise.

"As they were binding him, Charles Ray, the 'big one', appeared on the scene. The two others wanted to kill Boyd and one of them had an open knife in his hand, but Ray forbade it. After inspecting the helpless man, he thrust a piece of paper into Boyd's pocket; then the three walked out of doors. They took nothing from him.

"Boyd soon managed to get free and to give an alarm. The note left in his pocket was to Attorney C. V. Warner, who was appointed by the court to defend them during the trial last month, when the jury disagreed. Charles Ray, in it, informs Warner that he shall be paid for his good services.

"On investigation it was found that the criminals had sawed off eight plates two and a half by one and a half inches in size, leaving an opening about twelve inches square, through which they all crawled, although Ray weighs 100 pounds. These plates are fastened with heavy rivets, so that the section came out in one solid piece. The steel is guaranteed to be hardened so it is tool proof, yet the bars were sawed off as smooth as wood. So neatly was it done that when put back in place five men were over five minutes locating the section. How they did the work is a mystery as they left no tools behind. The section sawed out was at the bottom of the cage behind the bunk." The men were never caught despite a most thorough search.

In compliance with the prayer of a large body of petitioners from the inhabitants of the locality directly affected, an act was passed February 27, 1899, by the state house of representatives, creating the new county of Chelan. The same bill passed the senate March 8th, and it having met with the approval of the chief executive, Kittitas county's territory was curtailed by the cutting off of the Wenatche valley. The portion of the act establishing the boundaries is as follows:

"Section 1. All these portions of the counties of Kittitas and Okanogan described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the point of intersection of the middle of the main channel of the Columbia river with the fifth standard parallel north, thence running west along said fifth standard parallel north to the point where said fifth standard parallel north intersects the summit of the main divide between the waters flowing northerly and easterly into the Wenatchee and Columbia rivers, and the waters flowing southerly and westerly into the Yakima river, thence in a general northwesterly direction along the summit of said main divide between the waters flowing northerly and easterly into the Wenatchee and Columbia rivers and the waters flowing southerly and westerly into the Yakima river, following the course of the center of the summit of the watersheds dividing the said respective waters, to the center of the summit of the Cascade mountains at the eastern boundary of King county; thence north along the eastern boundary of King, Snohomish and Skagit counties to the point on the said eastern boundary of Skagit county where said boundary is intersected by the watershed between the waters flowing northerly and easterly into the Methow river and the waters flowing southerly and westerly into Lake Chelan; thence in a general southeasterly direction along the summit of the main divide between the waters flowing northerly and easterly into the Methow river and the waters flowing westerly and southerly into Lake Chelan and its tributaries; following the course of the center of the summit of the shed dividing said respective waters to the point where the seventh standard parallel north intersects said center of the summit of said watershed; thence east along the said seventh standard parallel north to the point of intersection of the middle of the main channel of the Columbia river with said seventh standard parallel north; thence down the middle of the main channel of the Columbia to the beginning."

Some events that took place during the year go far to show the degree of importance to which the coal mining industry had developed in the county. In April the Cle-Elum coal mines passed under the control of the Northern Pacific Coal Company, that corporation obtaining the forty-year lease granted by Thomas L. Gamble in 1894 to Oscar James, James Smith, Isaac Davis and Charles Hamer. These men, it is understood, had transferred their rights to the Spokane Gas Company and from this corporation the coal company in its turn obtained them. The Northern Pacific Coal Company already owned the Roslyn mines; therefore, by this transfer, the coal mining industry of the county was united under one management. In 1898 about thirty men were employed in the mine and the output was between 10,000 and 15,000 tons a month. Again, in September, by a double transfer, the property of the Northern Pacific Coal Company was conveyed to the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey. The consideration named was $109,532.26. The object of this reorganization was to enlarge the field of operations and deal in other industries connected with the production of fuel. This new company had a capital of $4,000,000, and was prepared to operate on a new and more extensive basis.

Within a month or so it concluded a contract with the Union Pacific Railroad Company to furnish that road with 110,000 tons of coal from the Roslyn mines. The demands upon these mines had never before been so great and it is said that the company was compelled to refuse a 50,000 ton order from Honolulu. The output was 4,000 tons per day and the whole Northern Pacific system from Livingston, Montana, to Portland, was using Roslyn coal.

In concluding the annals of the year 1899, it is safe to state that the whole year was a period of continuous prosperity for the valley. Good crops and good prices were together responsible for this condition. "To the people of Kittitas valley," says the Capital of January 6, 1900, "the year just passed will be a pleasant memory. Under its benign rule prosperity came to the homes, bringing a cheer that dispelled the gloom which came with the panic. Good times are now with us; our people are all employed and the jingle of the dollar makes music on all sides; good prices are realized for the products of the farm, and all have some to sell; nature has invited an abundant crop; the seasons have been congenial and success has crowned our efforts."

When Austin Mires, supervisor of the census for 1900 in the district of eastern Washington, made out his list of appointments of enumerators, the following were named for Kittitas county: John Lindley, M. Hull, Agnes M. Hinman, Alonzo E. Emerson, Louis L. Sharp, James A. Piland, Hoyt F. Blair, Joseph L. Chisholm, William Adam, John Donivan, Byars E. Romane, and James S. Dickson. The official census enumeration for Kittitas showed the population as 9,708 as compared with 8,761 in 1890, an increase of ten per cent. in the decade. The creation of Chelan county accounts for the small gain.

The crop of hay in the valley for the season of 1900 was estimated by R. P. Tjossem to be 50,000 tons. Timothy was worth eleven dollars and alfalfa five dollars in the stack. He further estimated that 15,000 tons would be required for home consumption. This estimate would allow 35,000 tons for export, which at an average price of eight dollars a ton would bring the substantial sum of $280,000 to the valley for hay alone. Certainly no other county in the state could make as good a showing.

The first event that occurred in this county in 1901 of sufficient general importance to be noted in our review was of a criminal nature. As nearly as can be ascertained, the remote cause of the trouble which led to the shooting and fatally wounding of G. Huhn by W. R. Crawford was an old feud over a line fence, but the immediate cause, it is claimed, was an effort on the part of Huhn to drive over Crawford with a load of hay. Crawford, it is said, warned Huhn, who was continually abusing him, to cease. The latter paid no attention, and after enduring insult and contumely as long as he could, Crawford fired. Huhn was shot on the 11th of January and died three days later. All contemporaneous reports of the affair seem to indicate that public sympathy was very generally with Crawford, who had been a resident of the valley for about twenty years. He was tried, however, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to a year in the penitentiary. Upon appeal he secured a new trial in February, 1903, but it had exactly the same outcome as the first one and the defendant was compelled to go to the penitentiary for a twelvemonth.

A pleasant event of the year 1901 was a pioneers' picnic, held at Slinger's grove, about four miles east of Ellensburg, August 22d. About one thousand and people, it is estimated, were present. Edward Whitson, a resident of North Yakima, but a pioneer of Kittitas county, addressed the assembly on events of early days, after which a register of those coming to the county previous to 1886 was prepared. A pioneer association was organized by the election of the following officers: President, J. F. LeClerc; vice-president, Tillman Houser; secretary, Robert A. Turner; directors, A. J. Slinger, Matthew Bartholet, M. M. Dammon, W. L. German, J. W. McDonald, John Packwood, Frank Bossong, and J. G. Olding. The membership roll is here reproduced from the secretary's record book that as many as possible of the names of those who fought the first battles in the subjugation of the county and the development of its resources may be preserved. Some of these people did not become permanent settlers during their respective years:

1860—Louis Oueitsch.

1867—Mrs. Eliza Schnebly, Milford A. Thorp, and Mode Cooke.

1868—Tillman Houser, Mrs. Louisa Houser, Harrison Houser and C. J. Houser.

1870—William Lewis, Harry M. Bryant, Elias Messerly, George Wheeler, William Taylor, Mrs. Carrie Erickson, Edward H. Whitson.

1871—Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Olding, J. M. Perry, C. A. Sanders, Milton Kertley, Mrs. N. J. Durgan, F. D. Schnebly, Mrs. William L. German, J. H. McEwen, Catherine Morrison, Emma J. Bartholet, J. D. Dysart.

1872—Mrs. J. D. Dammon, M. M. Dammon, J. P. Becker, P. H. Schnebly, Jesse McDonald, Olive

F. Montgomery, Jennie Ford, C. B. Walker, Mary Erickson Burroughs, James H. McDonald, Martha D. McDonald.

1874—Samuel T. Packwood, M. F. Packwood, Collie Bradshaw, John I. Packwood, Lora Erickson Shirrell, E. A. Murray.

1875—Eva Olding Shaw, R. Lee Purdin, William B. Price.

1876—Phil. Olmstead, Amelia Houser Churchill, Louis L. Sharp, Rose Carver, Maude Voice Gault, Mara Voice Yocom.

1877—Burt Pease, George W. Smith, Mrs. G. M. Burlingham, Mrs. V. S. Pease, A. T. Mason.

1878—E. B. Pease, Mrs. A. M. Pease, C. M. C. Pansing, M. V. Amen, Mrs. Ellen B. Rader, Matt Bartholet, Mrs. J. B. Jones, G. B. Robbins, Charles Bull.

1879—Mrs. R. N. Bull, Rose Rader Huss, J. M. Prater, Jennie Rader Bailes, W. H. Rader.

1880—W. J. McCausland, J. F. Montgomery, A. Welty, T. M. McCandless, William T. Montgomery, Melissa M. Welty, Virginia Gilmour, Lottie H. Becker.

1881—L. F. Ellison, R. H. Drew, J. A. Davis, C. F. Wilson, T. T. Wilson, Maria Davis, Mrs. Susan A. Montgomery.

1882—Isaac B. Taylor, Mrs. Cox, M. D. Cox, Martha E. McCausland, Moses Peffer.

1883—L. P. Burk, Horton Crandall, John W. Dixon, George W. Weaver, Mrs. E. E. Weaver, Mrs. S. S. Kiester, James Irwin.

1884—Mrs. Ella Wilson, Mrs. N. E. Smith, Mrs. Mary Phelps, Belle Cooke, C. S. Palmer, Phil. A. Ditter, Sven Pearson, Howard Ebert, Agnes Damm, Mrs. William L. German, Jerry Pattenaude, Carrie McDowell, J. G. McDowell, Edwin A. Carpenter.

1885—John Voice, E. A. Willis, Lucetta E. Garrison.

1886—A. O. Wishard, Simon P. Fogarty.

1890—Robert A. Turner, by special permission.

The following figures from the assessor's rolls for 1907 will show something of the extent and value to which the property interests of the county had grown at that time: Horses, 4,840, valued at $120,000; cattle, 14,290, valued at $262,835; sheep, 52,496, valued at $104,969; hogs, 2,308, valued at $9,881; vehicles, 1,540, valued at $41,450; sewing machines, 999, valued at $9,212; merchandise, valued at $143,783; farm products, valued at $481,850; Northern Pacific property, rolling stock and personal, valued at $155,676; Northern Pacific track, 93 miles, valued at $603,800; 429,040 acres of land, valued at $1,862,541; total value of city property, $316,302; 77 miles of telephone wires, valued at $8,085; total assessed value of personal property, $1,303,064.

As irrigation became more common in the valley it is noticeable that the cereal crops were more and more abandoned to the less fertile districts, and crops that yielded a larger revenue per acre took their places. In 1901 only one-eighth as much wheat was sown in Kittitas county as in 1896. For the most part hay had taken the place of the grain crop, because of the immense returns derived from this product in the rich valley. Good crops and good prices prevailed throughout the year, although times were quieter than during the preceding twelvemonth.

Early in 1902, a movement was set on foot to again bring before the people a proposition to construct the high line ditch. Several times before this enterprise had been under consideration but something occurred each time to prevent it from materializing. With the advent of the new year agitation of the matter was resumed and on January 9, 1902, a mass meeting was held in the courthouse, at which Austin Mires was chosen president and Frank N. McCandless secretary. A permanent organization was effected, the officers being: President, Austin Mires; secretary, Frank N. McCandless; assistant secretary, Harry W. Hale; treasurer, James Ramsay. The association chose as a name the Intermountain Irrigation Association. A committee on ways and means was appointed, namely, J. E. Frost, W. D. Bruton, J. L. Mills, J. E. Burke, W. T. Morrison, Herman Schwingler, Jacob Bowers, Sherman Smith, S. T. Packwood, and Frank N. McCandless. After organizing, the association adjourned until January 18th.

On that date another large mass meeting assembled at the courthouse and listened to reports. The committee appointed to appropriate water rights reported that it had secured 50,000 inches, at or near the mouth of the Cle-Elum river and 25,000 at Easton. Further time was requested in which to perfect the plans.

Again on March 4th, a meeting of the Intermountain Irrigation Association was held at the courthouse, and Ralph Kauffman, chairman of the ways and means committee, made a written report which declared against the practicability of constructing a canal along either of the so-called high line or district routes, proposing instead the old Burlingame line, surveyed in 1862. The report also urged that the county look for outside capital to take up the proposition, thus declaring against the co-operative scheme advocated by the editor of the Dawn and by many others.

About this time a number of local business men met in Kauffman & Frost's office and organized a ditch corporation with a capital of $250,000. The company was composed of S. T. Packwood, John H. Smithson, Ralph H. Kauffman, J. C. Hubbell and John E. Frost, and was called the Cascade Canal Company; officers were elected as follows: President, Samuel T. Packwood; vice president, J. H. Smithson; treasurer, J. C. Hubbell; secretary, J. E. Frost. It was resolved to follow the old Burlingame route except that instead of following that survey down the east side of the river from Cle-Elum, the ditch should come down the west side to a point above Thorp, on John Yearwood's ranch.

This plan would give water for about 6,000 acres on the west side and about 20,000 on the east side of the valley. At a meeting of the Intermountain Association held March 15th, the report of the committee on ways and means recommending the Burlington route, if any, was adopted and the meeting resolved to support the Cascade Canal Company in its effort to construct the ditch, although many condemned the abandonment of the scheme which would allow all to take a part in the enterprise.

The Dawn informs us that during the following year contracts were let by the Cascade Canal Company for the construction outline work and excavation of the canal. The contract for fluming was awarded to George Milton Savage & Company, of Tacoma, and the contract for excavation was given to Nelson & Heavey, also of Tacoma, the work to be completed by April 1, 1904.

Meanwhile another plan for the construction of the high line ditch was being brought to the consideration of the people of the valley. At the request of Messrs. Wells and Lee a meeting of the Intermountain Irrigation Association was called by the president, Mr. Austin Mires, at the courthouse. The object of the meeting was to listen to a proposition of Wells and Lee looking to the construction of a high line ditch. Mr. J. H. Wells had hitherto been connected with a plan for the construction of such a canal, but the proposition had failed because of the financial crash. Mr. Wells' proposal was as follows:

"I may state at the outset that the building of a high line ditch is of vast importance to this valley. I shall not enter into any elaborate statement. This meeting is for the purpose of hearing what we may have to say and for you to accept or reject our proposition. In the first place in promoting any proposition of large dimensions you must first look to its finances and I will now ask Mr. Lee to present them to you."

Mr. Lee said: "Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. About five or six months ago while in New York Mr. Wells and myself took up the question of building the high line canal. We could not make any satisfactory arrangements at that time for we had to have certain securities before we could place the bonds. On presentation of the enterprise we were told that under certain conditions the money would be forthcoming to carry our enterprise to a successful issue. Our next step is to raise the necessary securities to protect and get the capitalist to take hold. We have the capital. We also have a contractor who stands ready and willing to build the canal and give the necessary bonds for the faithful performance of the work as soon as the necessary securities have been raised."

Mr. Lee then handed the chairman the following letters which were read by the secretary:

JAMES D. HOGE JR., ESQ.,

First National Bank, Seattle, Wash.

Dear Sir: Would you be so kind as to give me all the information you have as to the responsibility of Turner A. Beal, Banker, No. 16 Broadway, New York. We are informed by Mr. J. H. Wells that he has disposed of all the bonds necessary to build the irrigation canal in our county, providing Mr. Wells secures certain contracts and concessions from our people. We wish to be in a position to recommend the enterprise. A letter from you would be accepted as authority.

Very respectfully,

E. H. SNOWDEN.

Ellensburg, July 17, 1902.

E. H. SNOWDEN, ESQ.,

President Bank Ellensburg, Ellensburg, Wash.

Dear Sir: I acknowledge receipt of your favor 17th inst., and will say that my acquaintance with Mr. Turner A. Beal, No. 26 Broadway, New York, has been of short duration and but slight. He is known to be identified with many strong institutions and from all that I have heard believe him to be absolutely reliable. He wrote me about the proposition you refer to and I gave him all the information I could obtain. I think that you can safely feel that you are taking no chances in dealing with him, but if you want absolute information let me know and I shall be pleased to take it up for you.

Yours truly,

JAMES HOGE JR.

Seattle, July 18, 1902.

"Now, Mr. Chairman," then continued Mr. Lee, "a few words in regard to floating bonds in the eastern market. There is not a purchaser east of the Mississippi river who will buy a bond until the canal is built. After the enterprise is completed the bonds have then a financial standing and the banks will then take them off our hands. However, we stand here ready to give you the high line canal."

Mr. Wells then said: "Mr. Lee spoke of securities. Securities placed in banks are not worth anything until you create a value for them. When you go to create a value for securities the capitalist or banker always wants something for it. Now I think we have satisfied you in regard to our financial standing. As Mr. Lee has said we have sold our bonds. We have also made arrangements with the contractor to build this canal and now we are ready to hear from you. I came here in 1892 and made you a proposition and raised all the necessary money to complete this canal but the panic of 1893 knocked me out."

"On unimproved property, such as government land, etc., we want half of the property or its equivalent in a mortgage. On partly improved land we want one-third of the land or its equivalent in a mortgage. We propose to place these mortgages in a bank, and when we have completed our canal they become our property. We propose to classify the land. If we cannot come to terms as to valuation we will arbitrate the matter. The mortgages will run from five to twenty-five years, redeemable at any time and the interest will be seven per cent. We will charge $1.50 per acre for the water,—half-inch to the acre measured in your own lateral. I have maps, profiles, etc., that will convince the most incredulous as to the possibility of the work. The high line canal covers 110,000 acres.

"Mr. William Ham Hall, state engineer, gave us a very favorable report. Engineer Anderson, of Campbell & Anderson, then of Denver, Colorado, who was at the head of the engineering irrigation bureau, and who passed on all irrigation bonds sold to foreign buyers, gave us a thirty-four page report in which he spoke in the highest terms of our Chief Engineer Owens' work, extracts from which are as follows:

"With more than the ordinary difficulty met with from the engineering point of view in enterprises of this character, it is more than satisfactory to find upon examination that the surveys now made have exhausted the possibilities and present the best possible proportions in a thorough and comprehensive manner. With the difficulties surrounding the location of a suitable canal, that is, to the river crossing, it reflects great credit upon the engineering force to be assured at this early stage of the operations that the best line has been secured, as I believe it has, and it is still more creditable that the data affecting the cost, etc., of such a line have been carefully prepared so that reasonable accuracy may be secured in the estimation of cost."

The scheme proposed by Wells was a mammoth one. The Kittitas Irrigation Company, of which he was manager and promoter, contemplated the construction of a canal which was to be twenty-four feet wide on the bottom, forty-eight feet on top and ten feet deep near the intake, and approximately 110 miles in length. Nearly $1,500,000, it was estimated, would be required to build the great ditch. The Ellensburg Commercial Club endorsed the company's plan and appointed a committee, consisting of Frank Bossong, chairman, James Burke, Thomas Haley, W. J. Peed, and Clarence Palmer, to assist in carrying out the work of securing the desired support. The company appropriated 1,000 second-inches from the Yakima river, to be taken from the river just below Easton, but the road of the promoter is usually beset with obstructions and the pathway of this one was by no means smooth. Strong local opposition developed during the fall and winter which finally gained strength enough to practically kill the project, though many contracts for water rights had been secured. This opposition was mainly of a personal nature.

Apathy was rapidly gaining a firm hold on the people of the county when a new promoter appeared with a plan that seemed certain of success. A. S. Black, a Colorado irrigation expert of pre-eminent ability and a practical builder, is the man referred to. At the National Irrigation Congress held in Colorado Springs early in 1903, Mr. Black had become interested in the Kittitas project through the representations of Delegate

P. A. Getz, of Ellensburg. In April he appeared before the citizens of this county and late in the same month the Ellensburg Commercial Club appointed a committee consisting of Chairman Briggs F. Reed, W. J. Peed, Dr. J. A. Mahan, Andrew Olson and C. H. Flummerfelt, to investigate the scheme. A citizens' committee, of which Dr. J. C. McCauley was chairman and C. R. Hovey secretary, was also appointed at a mass meeting.

Both committees recommended a general indorsement of the enterprise as feasible, timely and substantially backed. Mr. Black's proposition appeared to contain all the elements necessary to immediate success. In brief it was as follows:

For a consideration of $35 per acre, payable in ten annual installments without interest or other charges, provided contracts were signed for not less than 30,000 acres of irrigable land, he would build a satisfactory canal within a reasonable length of time. Upon the expiration of ten years, the water right owners should have the privilege of purchasing the canal and its franchises at cost with ten per cent. added, and thereafter maintain it themselves. If not so purchased at that time, the contracts to remain in force as formerly except that an annual maintenance fee of $1.50 per acre should be paid. The legal standard of water measurement in Washington, the second foot or one cubic foot per second of time, was to be used and rights were to be sold on the basis of one cubic foot per second of time for each one hundred and sixty acres of land. As customary in all such cases, Mr. Black was to have a legal first lien on the lands supplied with water, and purchasers of water rights were to furnish abstracts of title to their lands. Mr. Black covenanted that when contracts for 30,000 acres were ready for record, he would furnish written evidence from some reputable bank in Colorado that he had had practical experience in the construction and maintenance of irrigation canals and that he and his associates had the necessary financial backing to complete the works proposed. He agreed further that within thirty days after the abstracts were furnished and duly prepared for record that work should be commenced on the canal and carried to completion within a specified time.

An appeal went forth from the committees the last of April asking the people of the valley to accept the offer at once, and within a few days persons holding more than 5,000 acres in the aggregate had entered into the required agreement. The Commercial Club committee, whose members were among the leading citizens of the county, opened headquarters in the office of P. A. Getz for the receiving of land pledges. The time limit fixed by Mr. Black for securing the necessary 30,000 acres was thirty days from May

1st. All interested in the project labored with unusual energy. Many gave days of their time to securing the desired contracts, and Palmer Brothers' livery stable, of Ellensburg, furnished free transportation to all who would take up the matter with land owners. The newspapers accorded considerable space to furthering the proposal; in fact, never before in the county's history was so much interest manifested in irrigation matters.

But the hopes of all were to receive a sudden setback. Friday afternoon, May 29th, all business houses were closed and business generally suspended that all might attend a mass meeting called by Mr. Black in the opera house of Ellensburg. Several hundred citizens gathered, believing that the long-sought high line ditch was now an assured fact and that at the meeting Mr. Black would set in motion the plan outlined. Instead, he stated that he was unable to do anything for them and so far as he was concerned, the matter was ended. His explanations were plainly without substantial foundation; the true reason of his action lay deeper.

A more astonished and crestfallen audience than his was after this unexpected announcement probably never confronted a public speaker. The committees of citizens, which had so proudly taken their seats upon the platform in anticipation of the victorious ending of their work—and better work was never before done in Kittitas county by committees—were utterly crushed by the turn events had taken. Indignation blazed from every eye. A few denunciatory speeches by wrathful citizens followed. Prosecuting Attorney Warner taking the lead, after which the meeting adjourned amid confusion.

While Black withheld the real explanation of his remarkable action from the general public, he subsequently made the matter clear to at least two reliable, interested citizens. The man from Colorado, it seems, had attempted to carry out a scheme of unusual boldness. He never for a moment intended to desert his irrigation project in this county, but was simply playing to secure better terms than his original proposition gave him. He thought that when he had thrown the people into the slough of Despond by his sudden and radical coup, they would be ready to accept any proposition he might make. The result showed that he had completely mistaken the temper and spirit of the Kittitas citizens.

The people rallied forthwith from the confusion into which Black's shameful conduct had thrown them, reconvened and chose M. E. Flynn and S. C. Boedcher chairman and secretary respectively of their meeting. A committee was appointed consisting of A. L. Slemmons, Jerry Vanderbilt, W. M. Kenney, James Burke and C. V. Warner to confer with Mr. Wells or others regarding canal matters. This committee, however, never received any substantial encouragement and the high line ditch still exists in prospect only.

Whatever help has since come to the people of Kittitas valley in the way of irrigation canal construction has resulted from the efforts of Samuel T. Packwood and his co-laborers of the Cascade Canal Company, heretofore mentioned. They are just completing a ditch to cover 15,000 acres. The same company is now considering the matter of constructing a high line canal somewhat lower than the proposed Wells ditch, and as this corporation and its president, Mr. Packwood, have invariably carried through everything they have undertaken, there is every reason to believe that if the construction of the proposed canal is found practicable under existing conditions, it will soon be undertaken and pushed to a successful issue.

One melancholy event of the year 1902 may perhaps be noticed briefly. On May 10th, Oscar Rentszche's saloon, Ellensburg, became the scene of a sensational tragedy, in which John B. Stanley lost his life. His slayer, John W. Ellis, walked through the front door opening on Third street, and called Stanley to him, presumably to speak to him. Stanley came out from behind the screen and was shot down without warning by Ellis in the presence of a score of people. The latter immediately gave himself over to the authorities. Both men were gamblers and well known in sporting circles. Each had a sanguinary record and the testimony showed that a long standing feud existed between the men; also that Stanley had repeatedly said that he and Ellis must separate or one of them must die. A few days previous to the shooting the men met on the ball grounds near Ellensburg and a shooting affray in the presence of several hundred people was narrowly averted.

Ellis was at once tried in the superior court for the murder of Stanley, convicted of manslaughter and sentenced by Judge Rudkin to eleven years in the penitentiary. On appeal Ellis secured a new trial and in May, 1903, was acquitted and discharged from custody.

Events of the last year or two are too fresh in the memories of all to require detailed narration here. Crops were excellent in 1903, prices good, conditions propitious, prosperity universal and progress the watchword everywhere; and the current year gives promise of being superior even to its predecessor. The development of Kittitas county, begun under unfavorable conditions and carried on in the face of obstacles and discouragements, continues to go forward with ever increasing momentum, keeping pace with the advance of this great commonwealth of Washington and the rapidly expanding Pacific.

Perhaps the most pleasant, inspiring and universally interesting of recent occurrences was the President Roosevelt reception, May 25, 1903. The president's train pulled into the station at nine o'clock A. M., amid the wildest demonstrations of the thousands of people who had gathered from the stores and shops and homes of Ellensburg, from other towns of mountain and valley, and from farms far and near. The school children, the band, the Grand Army of the Republic and the Spanish war veterans were all in evidence and aglow with his reception. He addressed to the assembled multitudes the following words of greeting and sound wisdom:

Mr. Mayor, my fellow citizens, my fellow Americans: It is the greatest pleasure to be with you today. First of all let me greet those whom I know. Others will not specially grudge my specially greeting the men of the Grand Army and representatives of those who did even more than the men of the Civil war, the women. (Cheers and applause). For while the men went to battle, to the women fell the harder task of seeing husband or lover, father or brother, going to war, and she herself having to stay behind with the load of doubt, anxiety, uncertainty, and often the hard difficulty of making both ends meet in the household while the bread winner was away. In a state like Washington with its record of active, vigorous life, its representatives of the men who fought, I do not wonder that her sons did so well in the Philippines. I am not surprised that you here should have sent a company which, as I understand, lost more than almost any other company of all the troops in the Philippines. They were my brethren, my comrades in our war, which was a very little war compared to yours, but still we had a job to do, and we did it. (Applause).

Let me say a special word of greeting to those at the other end, the children. I have greeted the veterans; now I want to greet the children specially. I am very, very glad to see you. I have just one word to say to you. It applies almost as well to your elders. I believe in play. I believe in work. Play hard while you play, when you work do not play at all. (Applause).

In congratulating you of Washington upon your lumber, your commerce, upon your great coal fields, upon cattle upon a thousand hills, in congratulating you upon all your products I congratulate you most upon the children. They seem all right in quality and in quantity. I believe in your stock, and I am glad it is being kept up. (Applause).

It has pleased me particularly, coming through this mighty state with its extraordinary capacity for industrial development, to see your men and women, who are developing it, and at the same time that you are taking the fullest advantage of your material resources, are taking care to build upon those as a foundation for a higher life, that you are taking thought for the next generation, taking thought for the country, and for the people that are to come after you.

No men do their duty if they simply think of their own interests, if they do not shape governmental policy, their social policy for the country as a whole, the country that is to come after them. Exactly as every man worth his salt or woman worth her salt, will care even more for their own children's well being, so in this nation we are bound in honor to shape our present policy with a view to the nation's future needs, to do as you did in the Civil war. You went to war, you faced four years of conflict that generations that come after you for centuries to come should live in union, in peace within our borders. (Applause). So when you provide for training, upbuilding of children, when you provide for schools—high schools, normal schools, academy, college—you are building firm, wide, deep foundations for right and greatness of the future; for, after all, important though material resources are, important though your wheat, your lumber, your fisheries, your cattle, your mines, your commerce, your factories are, most important of all is the standard of good citizenship which you produce.

I congratulate Washington upon its school system, upon all its schools from the simplest to the highest; I say a word of special greeting to those engaged in teaching. No other body of men or women in time of peace does a more important work than those upon whose teaching the example of sympathy, self abnegation, enthusiasm, so much for the future generations depends.

Yet men and women must remember that you cannot put off upon teachers the whole duty of educating the next generation. Fathers, mothers, must educate their children in their own homes by precept, by example. Just let me say this, that if your precepts and your examples differ you cannot expect good results for children. There is no use preaching unselfishness if father consistently leads a selfish life. There is no use preaching the gospel of work if the father or mother shirks work. There is no use preaching the gospel of duty if there is no attempt to perform duty on the part of those who preach it. A father and mother have a duty in educating their children of which no one can relieve them. Teachers can do much, but, after all, it is the help in the home which can do most.

I also want to say a word upon the kinds of quality which we need in citizenship, for we need more than one kind. In the first place you need decency, honesty, the spirit of fair dealing, the spirit that makes a man a good neighbor, a good friend, the spirit that makes a man do his duty by the state. If you have not the foundation for clean living and fair dealing in you, then the greater a man's ability is, the worse he is for the community. It is just as it was in the Civil war; if a man had not the spirit of loyalty, of obedience, of faith to the flag, of faith to the nation, then the stronger, abler, more cunning he was, the more dangerous he was. In his regiment he was the cause of disturbance; outside the regiment he would come very near being a traitor to the nation.

So in civic life, exactly as bodily strength if unaccompanied by spirit of self restraint, makes a man a dangerous brute, while at the same time if guided in the right, it makes him a most valuable citizen, so mere intellectual ability, power that makes a man able to rise in the world, his smartness, his business capacity, his shrewdness, if there is not a backing of moral sense behind it, make him more dangerous.

In this country we urgently need to have it established that weight of public opinion shall be felt just as heavily against the scoundrel who succeeds as against the scoundrel who fails. (Applause). But that is not enough. Exactly as in the Civil war, you need patriotism first, but patriotism did not count if the men ran away. So it is in civil life. In addition to the spirit of decency, of fair dealing, of honesty, you must have strong virtue virtues; virtues that make a man able to hold his own in the world; to make his weight felt as of moment in the larger life of the nation. It is not enough to mean well when you sit at home. You have to be able to do well when you get out into the actual field. You have to be able to do well in your trade, in business, to keep your family, to make yourself felt; to bring up your children so that they shall go upward a little, to make yourself count, whatever your part.

Virtue that sits at home in its parlor and bemoans how bad the world is never yet benefited anyone. What we need is a type of decent man who can go out, hold his own against all comers; who, without losing his sense of decency, can make himself felt as a man of weight wherever he is put. That applies in the education of children.

Let me come back to that for just one moment. One thing that always makes me feel a little melancholy is to see fathers and mothers who themselves have worked hard, led useful lives, but who, in a queer, misguided spirit of foolish affection, try to save their children from trouble by also saving them from being of any earthly use in the world. That is not affection; that is folly.

You all know, among your own neighbors, the man, I am sorry to say, who will say, "Well, I have worked hard; my boys shall enjoy themselves;" or if a woman, she will say, "I have had to work hard; my girls shall be ladies," under the foolish belief that to be a lady means that you are not to work, not to do, not to be of any use in the world. Those parents are preparing for their children a life of misery, a life of uselessness; because of all form of life, that which on the whole is least attractive, which has least real joy in it, is the life conscientiously devoted to nothing but the pursuit of pleasure. It is the meanest type of life that there is to lead.

In '61 there were lots of people in the country who were too fond of ease to go into the war; the easy thing to do was to stay at home and say the country could not be saved; the hard thing to do was to get out and save it. Those men stayed at home; they walked delicately; they lived on the earth's soft places while you had what you could carry on your back, and lay where night overtook you, marched until you were so footsore and weary that you thought you could not keep up any longer. You found the blanket so heavy that if you were a recruit, you threw it away and at midnight wished you had two. You did that for four years while others lived at ease. Which had the real life—had the life that was worth living; which is proud now to stand on the heritage of what was done? The man that risked, fought, labored, shed his blood—he is the man who counts; he is the man who had a good time in life.

I do not pity any man because he has had to work at something worth doing and did it well. I admire him; so it is in civil life. Train your children, not how to avoid difficulties, but how to overcome them; train your children not to shirk what is hard, disagreeable, but to do it well. I believe in this country; I believe in you and those like you, because I know that in this country the average citizen has in him or her the power to lead just that kind of a life; has worth in his soul; the spirit that drives him on to work for worthy ends and to win triumph as a result.

My fellow citizens, I have enjoyed to the full coming here to greet you this morning—the men, the women, the children. It has done me good to see you. (Cheers and applause).

CHAPTER III.

POLITICAL.

As told elsewhere in this volume, Kittitas county came into existence late in the fall of 1883, the creating act being approved by the governor November 28th. Upon that memorable day in local history Yakima county lost nearly 3,000 square miles or more than a third of its territory, several hundred of its population, and dominion over one of the largest and fairest valleys in the Northwest. The new political division thus erected was a strong one from the beginning and capable of sustaining a much greater population. So rapid was its development during the first years of its life that it soon attained to a more prominent position in territorial affairs than did the mother county itself. The two campaigns preceding the organization of the new county were lively ones for the citizens of this region, the overshadowing issue being whether or not the people of the Kittitas should be citizens of a new political division or remain citizens of Yakima county. John A. Shoudy, the father of Ellensburg, was elected territorial representative in 1882 and at the next session of the legislature succeeded in securing the passage of his county bill.

By virtue of section two of the creating act, the board of commissioners of Kittitas county, consisting of Robert N. Canaday, Republican, Samuel T. Packwood and Charles P. Cooke, Democrats, met in called session in Ellensburg, December 17, 1883, for the purpose of organizing the county government. Commissioner Canaday was elected chairman of the board. The board then proceeded to appoint the following officials, all of whom qualified and entered upon the administration of their offices: Auditor, W. H. Peterson, Democrat; probate judge, Walter A. Bull, Republican; treasurer, Thomas Johnson, Republican; sheriff and assessor, John C. Goodwin, Republican; superintendent of schools, Miss Irene Cumberlin, Democrat; surveyor, John R. Wallace, Republican; sheep commissioner, E. W. Lyen, Democrat; and Dr. Newton Henton, Republican, coroner. The following day the board authorized the auditor to purchase the necessary office supplies for county purposes, and adjourned sine die.

The board met in first regular session, Monday, February 4, 1884, all being present. B. D. Southern and others presented a petition praying for the resurvey and establishment of the Durr bridge and Tanum creek county road with the following changes, to-wit: "Leaving the line of the county road some forty or fifty rods west of the Robinson schoolhouse, to run in a northwesterly course to the north side of a grove on S. T. Packwood's land claim; thence to continue and run due west until it intersects the county road; and that the road be located as it is now traveled through Mr. Hayworth's land claim, B. D. Southern's claim, thence within thirty feet of Seward Southern's pre-emption claim and thence north to the aforesaid road." J. H. Stevens and J. L. Vaughn were appointed viewers and J. R. Wallace surveyor of the proposed road. The road was officially accepted by the county at the May term. Although not the first road established within the county's boundaries, this road was the first one established by Kittitas county officials.

The same day the board appointed F. M. Thorp and O. Hutchinson as viewers for a new county road to run from George Ellison's place to Mat. Becker's old sawmill site. This road was known as the Watt canyon road; it was duly established in May. On the following day the board acted on still another road petition, one presented by F. Leonhard and others for a road beginning at the south end of Pearl street, Ellensburg, and terminating at or near the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section twenty-two, all in township seventeen north, range eighteen east. E. R. Yocum and B. W. Frisbie were appointed viewers. This road and a relocation of the old Nanum creek road were also established at the May term.

The board next directed its attention to a division of the county into twelve road districts, the names of the first supervisors, in the numerical order of the districts, being as follows: Tillman Houser, T. T. Wilson, Thomas Haley, Jacob Bowers, W. H. Stoddard (elected), J. J. Suver, David Freer, Elmer Lockwood, Joseph Stevens, J. Jostes, William Briggs (elected), and W. A. Stevens.

On February 7th the board divided the county into three commissioners' districts:

"No. 1. Commencing on the Yakima river at the mouth of the Nanum creek; thence up said creek to the head of same; thence in a northerly direction to the mouth of Nigger creek on the Wenachie river; thence down the Columbia river to the south line of Kittitas county; thence west on said line to the Yakima river; thence up said river to the place of beginning.

"No. 2. Commencing on the Yakima river at the mouth of Nanum creek; thence up said creek to its head; thence northerly to the mouth of Nigger creek on the Wenachie river; thence up the Wenachie river to the summit of the Cascade mountains; thence westerly to the headwaters of the Yakima river; thence down said river to the place of beginning.

"No. 3. Shall be and comprise all that part of Kittitas county on the west side of Yakima river."

At the May term the board authorized Auditor Peterson to enter into a contract with A. W. Engle, cashier of the First National Bank of Ellensburg, for the rent of rooms adjoining the office room and vault of that bank as offices for the auditor and sheriff; the auditor was also authorized to rent a portion of the bank's vault. Accordingly a six months' lease at $25 a month was entered into between the bank and the county and the latter's officials at once occupied their temporary courthouse.

The August term was a busy and an important one. The first business of consequence to come before the board was the laying out of six election precincts, which was done August 5th as follows: Whitson or East Kittitas, with voting place at the Grange schoolhouse; Ellensburg; Wenas, with voting place at Henson's sawmill; West Kittitas, with voting place at the Bond school; Swauk, voting place at the Virden schoolhouse; and Wenatchee, voting place in Miller & Greer's store. Then grand and petit jurors were drawn for service at the county's first term of court, and principally that the names of as many pioneers as possible may be preserved we give the list of those drawn: Grand jury, A. Burge, William Briggs, C. C. Coleman, G. W. Carver, H. M. Cooper, John Davis, B. W. Frisbie, J. F. LeClerc, David Freer, R. F. Montgomery, J. L. Mills, and J. H. Stevens; petit jurors, John Amlin, John Catlin, J. S. Dysart, William Grim, O. Hutchinson, Henry Knight, T. D. Quinn, T. O. Stepp, Braxton D. Southern, J. P. Sharp, David Wheaton, J. L. Vaughn, Jacob Bowers, James Curtis, Tom Doke, James Ferguson, E. G. Grindrod, John Haley, William J. McCausland, B. S. Pease, S. T. Sterling, William Taylor, V. C. Wynegar, and J. R. Van Alstine. The contract for county printing was awarded D. J. Schnebly, proprietor of the Localizer. The application of the Seattle and Walla Walla Trail and Wagon Road Company for the privilege of maintaining a toll road from the summit of the Cascades down to Tanum creek over their old route was favorably acted upon at this same session. Before adjourning the board rented, for $15 a day, Elliott's hall, in the First National Bank building, for use as a courtroom; agreed upon and levied the following tax assessment: territorial two and a half mills, penitentiary one-quarter mill, county eight mills, school three mills, road and bridge one mill, property road one mill and poll four dollars; and authorized the issuance of warrants to the amount of $15,407.62, payable to Yakima county as Kittitas county's share of the mother county's indebtedness, agreed upon by the respective auditors.

Sheriff Goodwin presented his resignation to the board November 7, 1884, whereupon Commissioner Packwood, having also resigned, was appointed to fill the unexpired term of the former.

Kittitas county's first general election was held in November, 1884, and was an event of great importance in local history. There were no local issues of special importance involved, the contest being overshadowed by the presidential struggle, though Washington as a territory could take no deciding part in the greater campaign. The Republicans gathered in county convention at Elliott's hall, Saturday afternoon, August 23d. Dr. I. N. Power was chosen chairman; R. Price, secretary. The following delegates were seated: Nanum, B. W. Lewis, Thomas Haley, James Dysart and S. T. Sterling; Wenas, Charles Pressey; West Kittitas, J. P. Sharp, R. G. Hawn, B. D. Southern and W. A. Stevens; Ellensburg, Austin Mires, I. N. Power, Thomas Johnson and S. C. Davidson; Swauk, M. C. Giles, R. Price and T. Caster; Wenatchee, unrepresented. The convention adopted the short but strong platform given below:

"Resolved, That we indorse the platform of the National Republican convention, adopted at Chicago in 1884, and the nominees thereof for president and vice-president, James G. Blaine and John A. Logan.

"Resolved, That we demand an economical administration of all public offices, both territorial and county.

"Resolved, That we favor the speedy admission of our territory into the union."

Dr. I. N. Power, S. T. Sterling, R. Price and Thomas Haley were chosen as delegates to the territorial convention, while the county ticket was selected as follows: Probate judge, W. A. Bull; auditor, J. R. Wallace; sheriff-assessor, J. J. Imbrie; treasurer, E. Dickson; commissioners, W. A. Stevens, Thomas Haley and J. S. Dysart; surveyor, B. E. Craig; superintendent of schools, Rev. J. A. Laurie; coroner, Dr. T. J. Newland; sheep commissioner, Mat. Becker.

The Democrats met in the same hall, August 30th, the officers of the convention being John Amlin, chairman, and G. W. Seaton, secretary. The delegates present were: Ellensburg, James J. Hart, Nick Rollinger, John Cato, Harry Simpson, M. C. Sprague, L. Pool, G. W. Seaton; Whitson, A. A. Meade, John Davis, R. F. Montgomery, W. Taylor, John Thompson, Daniel Gaby, Jesse McDonald; West Kittitas, S. T. Packwood, J. M. Shelton, O. Hutchinson, John Amlin, P. Barnes, John Neuman, James Brooks; Wenas, Jacob Somers; Teanaway, S. S. Bates, James Stevens, B. K. May, Peter McCallum. The platform adopted read:

"Resolved, That we approve the platform of the Democratic National convention and indorse the nomination of Grover Cleveland and Thomas A. Hendricks for president and vice-president.

"Resolved, That to insure an economical administration of public affairs in all public offices it is necessary to put Democrats into office.

"Resolved, That we favor the regulation of railroad traffic to avoid discrimination in favor of Portland, and against the people east of the Cascades."

The county ticket placed in the field by this convention consisted of John Davis for probate judge; W. H. Peterson for auditor; Samuel T. Packwood for sheriff; J. J. Mueller for treasurer; Miss Irene Cumberlin for superintendent of schools; George W. Seaton for surveyor; C. C. Coleman for sheep commissioner; Dr. M. V. Amen for coroner; and C. P. Cooke, J. R. Van Alstine and J. M. Shelton for county commissioners.

There were some dissatisfied Democrats and Independents, however, and these met September 29th in Elliott's hall. They nominated E. N. Cooke for sheriff; A. Whitson for commissioner from district No. 1; and B. E. Craig for surveyor; the Democratic nominees for the other offices were indorsed.

From the official vote, given below, the rest of the story may be read:

Delegate to congress, Voorhees, Democrat, 551, Armstrong, Republican, 345; adjutant general, Anderson, Democrat, 485, O'Brien, Republican, 412; brigadier general, McAuliff, Democrat, 485, Peel, Republican, 411; commissary general, Berg, Democrat, 466, Livingston, Republican, 410; quartermaster general, Hand, Democrat, 485, Jackson, Republican, 411; prosecuting attorney, Dustin, Democrat, 520, Smith, Republican, 458; joint councilman, J. B. Reavis (elected), Democrat, 451, John A. Shoudy, Republican, 410; joint representative, Yakima and Kittitas, C. P. Cooke (elected), Democrat, 639, W. L. Stabler, Republican, 336; sheriff, Samuel T. Packwood, Democrat, 441, J. J. Imbrie, Republican, 318, Ed. Cooke, Independent, 52, Tillman, also an Independent, 50; auditor, W. H. Peterson, Democrat, 722, J. R. Wallace, Republican, 145; treasurer, J. J. Mueller, Democrat, 604, E. Dickson, Republican, 267; probate judge, John Davis, Democrat, 482, W. A. Bull, Republican, 382; commissioners, R. F. Montgomery, Democrat, 466, J. S. Dysart, Republican, 505, J. R. VanAlstine, Democrat, 498, Thomas Haley, Republican, 405, J. M. Shelton, Democrat, 475, W. A. Stevens, Republican, 397; surveyor, G. W. Seaton, Democrat, 330, B. E. Craig, Republican, 240, J. R. Wallace, Independent, 278; superintendent public schools, Miss Irene Cumberlin, Democrat, 606, J. A. Laurie, Republican, 265; coroner, Dr. M. V. Amen, Democrat, 479, T. J. Newland, Republican, 397; sheep commissioner, C. C. Coleman, Democrat, 477, Mat. Becker, 379; church property tax, yes 438, no 256. Of course, the electors were asked to permanently locate the county seat. Ellensburg, being practically the only candidate in the field, easily carried off the prize, receiving 630 votes out of a total of 760. The proposition submitted by the commissioners to spend $4,000 in the erection of a small county building and vault was received with general disfavor, the vote standing only 133 affirmatively, while 489 voted negatively. So the county remained without a courthouse three years longer.

During the ensuing two years Kittitas county enjoyed a wonderful growth, which resulted in a general shaking up of county affairs. In March, 1886, Miss Cumberlin and J. J. Mueller resigned their respective offices. The board appointed D. G. C. Baker as superintendent of schools and Henry Rehmke to succeed Mueller as treasurer. June 28th local option elections were held in several precincts. Whitson precinct alone refused the saloon admittance to its territory, Ellensburg, West Kittitas and Swauk defeating the prohibition movement by large majorities. J. R. Wallace, who had become surveyor in the meantime, resigned his office in November, 1886, and the office remained vacant until the first of the year 1887. The general election was held November 2, 1886, seven precincts participating, Whitson, Ellensburg, West Kittitas, Tunnel City, Wenatchee, Mission Creek and Teanaway. No local issues of special importance distinguished the campaign. As a thorough search through the records fails to discover those relating to the election of 1886, we are unable to present other than a list of the county officers elected:

Joint councilman, Charles P. Cooke, Democrat; representative, T. J. V. Clark, Republican; county commissioners, James S. Dysart, A. T. Mason, Republicans, S. L. Bates, Democrat; sheriff-assessor, Samuel T. Packwood, Democrat; treasurer, Henry Rehmke, Democrat; surveyor, E. J. Rector, who failed to qualify and was succeeded by C. R. Smith, appointed in March, 1887; auditor, W. H. Peterson, Democrat; probate judge, John Davis, Democrat; superintendent of schools, Clara V. Peterson, Democrat; sheep inspector, E. W. Lyen, Democrat; coroner, Dr. N. Henton, Republican. Thus it will be seen that the county was still in the Democratic column. The unofficial returns from Kittitas on territorial officers shows that Charles S. Voorhees, the Democratic candidate for delegate, received 888, while his Republican opponent, C. M. Bradshaw, received 567 votes. These figures give us some idea of the enormous gain in population that the county experienced in the years 1885 and 1886.

National issues predominated in 1888 in view of the fact that early statehood was expected by

Washingtonians and each party in the territory wished to make as imposing a showing as possible. The territory went Republican by a large majority. "Tuesday, November 6th, election day," says the Ellensburg Localizer in its issue of November 10, 1888, "opened fine, but a light rain set in and made the weather disagreeable for a short time, after which it cleared up. Voting commenced as soon as the polls opened. The election was a very quiet one, there being no fighting, no boisterous talking, everybody being on his good behavior. There was considerable scratching done. The vote in the Ellensburg precinct reached 648. Considerable money was staked on the results of the election this year. C. S. Voorhees, Democrat, was beaten in this county by a majority of sixteen, and Allen carried almost every other county in the territory, being elected by a majority of between 5,000 and 7,000. In Kittitas the Republicans elected the auditor, sheriff, and two commissioners, and gave a majority for Snow as joint councilman, as did Yakima and Douglas also. Fruit carried Franklin, but Lincoln will have to give him a plurality or he is defeated. Dr. Power is elected joint representative of Yakima and Kittitas counties." Saturday night, the 17th, the Republicans of Ellensburg and surrounding country made a memorable one for that city. The demonstration was in honor of the election of General Harrison and Levi P. Morton. The torch light procession was introduced for the first time to the people of this region, while the blowing of horns, cheering and the firing of anvils intermittently gave the city a sensation that it had never before witnessed. Speeches followed the parading. The official vote cast in this county follows:

For delegate, John B. Allen, Republican, 792, majority in the territory 7,371; Charles S. Voorhees, Democrat, 776, Roger S. Greene, Prohibitionist, 51; brigadier general, A. P. Curry, Republican, 778, J. J. Hunt, Democrat, 778, S. B. Vrooman, Prohibitionist, 66; adjutant general, R. G. O'Brien, Republican, 772, Hillory Butler, Democrat, 777, Henry M. Brown, 70; joint councilman, Lincoln, Douglas, Franklin, Adams, Yakima and Kittitas counties, J. M. Snow, Republican, 831, majority over Fruit in the district 161; Clay Fruit, Democrat, 606, H. C. Walters, Prohibitionist, 86; joint representative, Yakima and Kittitas, Dr. I. N. Power, Republican, 771, majority in district 57; Daniel Gaby, Democrat, 760, J. W. Brice, Prohibitionist, 69; prosecuting attorney, W. J. Milroy, Republican, 612, H. J. Snively, Democrat (elected), 958; sheriff, J. L. Brown, Republican, 707, A. A. Meade, Democrat, 701, S. T. Packwood, Independent, 159, L. L. Palmenter, Prohibitionist, 46; auditor, H. M. Bryant, Republican, 848, Charles Miller, Democrat, 661, W. R. Newland, Prohibitionist, 102; treasurer, P. C. Williams, Republican, 723, Henry Rehmke, Democrat, 823, R. Breese, Prohibitionist, 57; probate judge, F. S. Thorp, Republican, 620, John Davis, Democrat, 805, D. G. C. Baker, Prohibitionist, 61; commissioners, 1st district, W. J. Gray, Republican, 746, J. W. McDonald, Democrat, 807, A. J. Rader, Prohibitionist, 61; 2d district, T. L. Gamble, Republican, 762, J. W. Wilmot, Democrat, 716, T. T. Wilson, Prohibitionist, 92; 3d district, J. N. Hatfield, Republican, 788, John L. Amlin, Democrat, 739, J. L. Mills, Prohibitionist, 80; surveyor, B. C. Bonnell, Democrat, 692, A. F. York, Republican, 870; coroner, Dr. N. Henton, Democrat, 751, Dr. W. H. Harris, Republican, 817; superintendent of schools, J. L. McDowell, Republican, 766, George W. Parrish, Democrat, 754, J. E. Denton, Prohibitionist, 89.

Again, for the year 1889, the year that brought statehood to the territory, and with that dignity a special election in October, the election records in this county are missing. This election was of especial interest to North Yakima and Ellensburg, because of their candidacy for the honor of being the state's capital. Had Ellensburg received the united support of the region east of the Cascades, there is little doubt but that today Kittitas county would possess the capital, but the candidacy of North Yakima and the political deal made by the southeastern portion of the state with the Sound region, threw the prize to Olympia. Of course, Kittitas county, almost as a unit, voted for Ellensburg. The total vote received throughout the state by the three leading candidates was: Olympia, 25,488, North Yakima, 14,707, Ellensburg, 12,833. E. T. Wilson, Republican, was elected state senator from Kittitas county; I. N. Power and J. P. Sharp were elected representatives; all three were Republicans. Carroll B. Graves, of Ellensburg, a Republican, was chosen district judge, Hiram Dustin, Democrat, of Goldendale, being his opponent. The county went strongly Republican; no county officers were elected at this election.

Both the Republican and Democratic parties held their state conventions the week beginning September 8, 1889, the former meeting in Walla Walla, the latter in Ellensburg. The Ellensburg convention placed in nomination the following ticket: Member of congress, T. C. Griffiths, Spokane; governor, Eugene Semple, Pierce; lieutenant governor, L. H. Plattor, Whitman; secretary of state, W. H. Whittlesey, Jefferson; auditor, John Miller Murphy, Thurston; treasurer, M. Kauffman, Pierce; attorney general, H. J. Snively, Yakima; commissioner public lands, M. Z. Goodell, Chehalis; superintendent public instruction, J. H. Morgan, Kittitas; supreme judges, W. H. White, King, J. L. Sharpstein, Walla Walla, John P. Judson, Pierce, John B. Reavis, Yakima, Frank Ganahl, Spokane; superior judge, Kittitas, Yakima and Klickitat counties, Hiram Dustin, Klickitat. The Walla Walla convention nominated the following candidates: Member congress, John L. Wilson, Spokane; governor, E. P. Ferry, King; lieutenant governor, C. E. Laughton, Okanogan; secretary of state, Allen Weir, Jefferson; treasurer, A. Lindsey, Clark; auditor, T. M. Reed, Thurston; attorney general, W. C. Jones, Spokane; superintendent of public instruction, R. B. Bryan, Chehalis; commissioner public lands, W. L. Forrest, Lewis; supreme judges, R. O. Dunbar, Klickitat, Theodore L. Stiles, Pierce, John P. Hoyt, King, T. J. Anders, Walla Walla, Elmer Scott, Garfield; superior judge, Kittitas, Yakima and Klickitat counties, Carroll B. Graves. In the election the Republicans secured majorities for all their nominees.

In 1890 the Republican county convention was held in Ellensburg, September 21st; the Democrats convened at the same place September 2th. Both conventions adopted resolutions indorsing the national policies of the parties they represented, and it was along these general lines that the campaign was waged. The second and final capital election took place at this time, Olympia being victorious. Hopeless disorganization in eastern Washington and a well-planned, energetic campaign on the western slope decided the result. Olympia secured 37,413 votes, Ellensburg 7,722, and North Yakima 6,276. The vote cast in this county election day, November 4th, was as follows:

Permanent location of the state capital, Ellensburg, 1,319, North Yakima 160, Olympia 91; issuing bonds to fund the county debt, yes 924, no 521; congressman, John L. Wilson, Republican, 878, Thomas Carroll, Democrat, 791, Robert P. Abernathy, 68; representatives in legislature, Nineteenth district, John Davis, Democrat, 940, J. M. Ready, Republican, 878, W. H. Hare, Republican, 762, A. L. Slemmons, Democrat, 736; county attorney, D. H. McFalls, Republican, 974, C. V. Warner, Democrat, 829; county clerk, T. B. Wright, Republican, 1,009, E. J. Mathews, Democrat, 813; county auditor, J. E. Frost, Republican, 1,050, Martin J. Maloney, Democrat, 781; sheriff, Anthony A. Meade, Democrat, 990, J. L. Brown, Republican, 868; treasurer, John F. Travers, Democrat, 947, O. Peterson, Republican, 839; commissioners, 1st district, M. Haran, Republican, 909, Martin Michels, Democrat, 798; 2d district, J. W. Richards, Republican, 835, James Heron, Democrat, 732; 3d district, J. C. Goodwin, Republican, 893, A. M. Stevens, Democrat, 744; assessor, P. M. Morrison, Republican, 897, John Foster, Democrat, 828; superintendent of schools, J. H. Morgan, Democrat, 959, W. T. Haley, Republican, 817; surveyor, E. I. Anderson, Republican, 918, A. F. York, Democrat, 890; coroner, J. H. Lyons, Republican, 950, A. F. Fox, Democrat, 816.

A special election was held in this legislative district, February 7, 1891, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Representative John Davis, who died January 17th preceding. It was estimated that only half the normal vote was cast, W. H. Peterson, Democrat, being elected by a vote of 545 to 405 for J. P. Sharp, the Republican. Both candidates were placed in nomination by the county central committees.

It is said by those competent to judge that the campaign of 1892 was the hottest, not excepting that of 1896, ever witnessed in Washington. Many circumstances combined to make this so. First, it was a presidential year, and Washington was taking its first part in a national campaign; second, Populism swept into Washington that year with a tremendous impetus that shook the very foundations upon which the old parties rested, and immediately attained such growth as to give it rank with its older opponents; third, the gubernatorial fight between Snively of North Yakima and McGraw of the Sound reached fever heat through the bitterness of the personalities indulged in; and fourth, the election of a United States senator was scheduled for an early date. The campaign was a spectacular one and no one who passed through it has any difficulty in recalling it to mind. The Populist party that year received the largest vote cast by any third party in a quarter of a century.

The People's party was organized in Kittitas valley early in the year, and June 8th held its first county convention, nominating a full county ticket. On the 25th of the month following the state convention was held in the Ellensburg armory, and a state ticket nominated. The convention adopted an exceedingly strongly worded, scathing platform, demanding a host of reforms in both state and nation. The Kittitas county Democrats met August 20th, the Republicans July 30th, both convening in Ellensburg as usual. The official canvass of the vote cast follows:

For presidential electors, Republican, 855; Democratic, 789; Populist, 569; members national house of representatives, Thomas Carroll, James A. Munday, Democrats, 771 and 719 votes respectively; John L. Wilson, William H. Doolittle, Republicans, 873 and 828 votes respectively; M. F. Knox, J. C. VanPatten, Populists, 593 and 586 votes respectively; justices state supreme court, William H. Brinker, Eugene K. Hanna, Democrats, 723 and 717 votes respectively; Thomas J. Anders, Elmon Scott, Republicans, 849 and 821 votes respectively; G. W. Gardiner, Frank T. Reid, Populists, 584 and 486 votes respectively; governor, Henry J. Snively, Democrat, 783; John H. McGraw, Republican, 774; C. W. Young, Populist, 724; lieutenant governor, Henry Willison, Democrat, 743; Frank H. Luce, Republican, 813; C. P. Twiss, Populist, 631; secretary of state, John McReavy, Democrat, 743; James H. Price, Republican, 868; Lyman Wood, Populist, 607; treasurer, Harrison Clothier, Democrat, 728; Orno A. Bowen, Republican, 854; W. C. P. Fogh, Populist, 536; 3d district, Adam M. Stevens, Democrat, 748; Herman Page, Republican, 746; William F. Lewis, Populist, 583. • The Republicans carried the state by a majority averaging 2,500.

By 1894 the Populist party in Kittitas county had so gained in strength that it was able to capture three important county offices and one legislative office, distancing the Democratic party and running neck and neck with the Republican.

Compared with the previous and the succeeding campaigns, that of 1864 was of only ordinary interest, its one phase of special interest being the rapid ascendancy of the People's party. The People's party held its county convention September 8th; the Republicans convened next, September 13th, and the Democrats met September 22d, all in Ellensburg. November 6th was election day. The vote was as follows:

For representatives to congress, William H. Doolittle, Samuel C. Hyde, Republicans, 851 and 820 votes respectively, N. T. Caton, B. F. Heuston, Democrats, 383 and 394 votes respectively, W. P. C. Adams, J. C. VanPatten, Populists, 794 and 780 votes respectively; supreme court justices, Ralph O. Dunbar, M. J. Gordon, Republicans, 859 and 816 votes respectively, Thomas N. Allen, John L. Sharpstein, Democrats, 439 and 462 respectively, H. L. Forrest, J. M. Ready, Populists, 745 and 607 votes respectively; state representatives, B. F. Barge, F. M. Scheble, Republicans, 882 and 801 votes respectively, John J. Jones, Clyde V. Warner, Democrats, 395 and 600 votes respectively, John Catlin, J. J. Leavis, Populists, 820 and 656 votes respectively; sheriff, P. C. McGrath, Republican, 687, C. S. Palmer, Democrat, 706, W. M. Stinson, Populist, 811; treasurer, Dexter Shoudy, Republican, 893, Michael Linder, Democrat, 619, John C. Ellison, Populist, 643; auditor, J. M. Baird, Republican, 908, John J. Montgomery, Fusionist, 813; assessor, W. A. Stevens, Republican, 877, Charles Kenneth, Democrat, 409, I. E. Curtis, Populist, 766; surveyor, A. F. York, Republican, 894, Andrew Flodin, Democrat, 365, L. F. Ellison, Populist, 751; commissioners, 2d district, L. W. Kribbs, Republican, 172, Peter McCallum, Democrat, 241, J. F. Brown, Populist, 333; 3d district, John C. Goodwin, Republican, 306, Adam Stevens, Democrat, 214, S. T. Packwood, Populist, 301; coroner, I. N. Power, Republican, 777, Charles E. Finberg, Democrat, 459, Theron Stafford, Populist, 780.

There have been few more exciting or spectacular campaigns in the United States than that of 1896. For the first and only time in its history as a state, Washington went out of the Republican column: Kittitas county went completely under the control of the Fusionists, they electing every candidate and carrying the county for the state and national tickets by majorities varying from 200 to 300. The state gave Bryan 50,643 votes, as against 38,573 for McKinley, and elected both Fusion candidates for congress.

The opening note in the local campaign was sounded by the Republicans May 9, 1896. On that day they organized the Lincoln Republican club, electing as officers: Dr. Bean, president; C. R. Hovey, vice-president; J. G. Boyle, secretary; Albert Tjossem, treasurer; there were twenty-nine charter members. The Republicans held their county convention at the courthouse Friday, August 21st; the ticket was nominated upon a platform indorsing the national one adopted at St. Louis.

The silver forces, as had been expected, united, forming a fusion party composed of Populists, Democrats and Silver Republicans. Each party elected delegates to a county convention, the three meeting in Ellensburg, Monday, August 10th. After a two days' session, prolonged by a disagreement regarding a division of the offices, the conference report was accepted and the interests of all merged. According to this agreement the joint convention nominated Populists for one representative, sheriff, auditor, clerk, a commissioner, county attorney and assessor; the Silver Republicans received the nominations for superior judge and state senator; and the Democrats were represented by one candidate each for representative and commissioner, and candidates for treasurer, surveyor and coroner. The latter party held a ratification convention September 12th.

But the great event in Kittitas political history in 1896 was the fusion convention held in the city of Ellensburg. This convention was composed of more than 1,200 delegates alone, divided into three sub-conventions, those of the Populists, the Democrats and the Silver Republicans, meeting in the armory, the opera-house and the courthouse respectively. The city was taxed to its utmost to entertain this great host of delegates and their friends, but nevertheless a citizens' committee was appointed to look after accommodations and did its work well. The conventions met Wednesday, August 12th. C. E. Cline was elected chairman of the Populist gathering. Steve Judson presided over the Democrats and George W. Thompson held the gavel at the courthouse. Of course such an enormous body as the combined delegations made could not be easily handled, so each convention appointed a conference committee consisting of one delegate from each county, and this committee did the real work of the convention. The Fusionists adopted the name of the People's party. As to be expected, the most serious proposition before the delegates was a harmonious fusion with an agreeable division of the offices. There were those in the Populist party who foresaw the beginning of the end, the moment fusion with the Democrats should be completed, and these men, termed "Middle-of-the-Roaders," persistently fought the movement. Four days they fought successfully, then yielded to overwhelming odds, accepted the slate and within a short time the great convention, in mass meeting, ratified the nominations and adjourned. The Populists received eight offices, including the governorship, the Democrats five offices, including the congressman, and the Silver Republicans, two offices, including the remaining congressman. The memory of this convention will live long in the minds of the Kittitas people.

Kittitas county's official vote:

For presidential electors, Republican, 1,044, Fusionist, 1,206, Prohibition, 40, Gold Democrat, 23, Nationalist, 3; representatives to congress, James Hamilton Lewis, William C. Jones, Fusionists, 1,304 and 1,280 votes respectively, Samuel C. Hyde, William H. Doolittle, Republicans, 1,003 and 1,012 respectively, C. A. Saylor, Martin Olsen, Prohibitionists, 23 and 22 votes respectively, and Charles E. Mix, Nationalist, 3; justices supreme court, James B. Reavis, Fusionist, 1,310, E. N. Livermore, Prohibitionist, 29, John P. Hoyt, Republican, 1,000; governor, P. C. Sullivan, Republican, 988, John Rogers, Fusionist, 1,287, R. E. Dunlap, Prohibitionist, 77; lieutenant governor, Thurston Daniels, Fusionist, 1,274, John W. Arrasmith, Republican, 1,013, T. A. Shorthill, Prohibitionist, 36; secretary of state, Will D. Flummerfelt, Fusionist, 1,297, Dexter Shoudy, Republican, 1,041; county attorney, Kirk Whited, Fusionist, 1,218, Edward Prunyn, Republican, 1,103; assessor, J.

C. Ellison, Fusionist, 1,220, James Lane, Republican, 1,095; superintendent of public schools, W. A. Thomas, Fusionist, 1,223, C. H. Hinman, Republican, 1,107; surveyor, Andrew Flodine, Fusionist, 1,226, E. I. Anderson, Republican, 1,095; coroner, William Edwards, Fusionist, 1,242, J. C. McCauley, Republican, 1,081; commissioners, First district, R. S. McClemons, Fusionist, 1,206, O. C. McManus, Republican, 1,040; Second district, John M. Newman, Fusionist, 1,262, J. C. Goodwin, Republican, 991. The office of auditor was contested by Mr. Baird, he alleging miscounts in the precincts of South Ellensburg, Liberty, South Kittitas, East Kittitas, North Kittitas and West Kittitas, all of which gave Populist majorities, with the exception of Liberty. Several votes were thrown out on both sides by the court, some slight changes in the figures made, but the result still gave Sterling a majority of three. The costs amounted to $100, which were assessed to the contestant. The court's decision was given in December, 1896.

Sheriff Stinson died at his home in Rochester, Indiana, August 28, 1897. The vacancy thus left was filled by the appointment, September 15th, of L. C. Wynegar, of Ellensburg. Assessor Ellison died Monday, February 21, 1898, leaving another vacancy in the county's corps of officers; G. C. Poland was selected by the commissioners as his successor. In 1898, Commissioner Brown went to the Klondyke, and April 11th of that year John Surrell, of CleElum, was appointed to succeed him.

Washington experienced a change of political heart after the inauguration of President McKinley; in fact, so great was the change that in the election of 1898 the state went Republican by majorities ranging from 5,000 upwards. Kittitas likewise experienced this change and in 1898 placed the Republicans in almost complete power locally. Fusion was again used to cement together the Populists, Democrats and Silver Republicans, though it was not so easy a task as in 1896. These parties held their state conventions in Ellensburg September 7th. The conference committee's report was adopted only after a long, hard contest. The Democrats secured one congressman, J. H. Lewis, and one supreme judge, M. M. Goodman; the Populists were awarded one supreme judge, B. F. Heuston; while the Silver Republicans named W. C. Jones, of Spokane, as the other congressman. At the county convention of the Fusionists, held Monday and Tuesday, September 5th and 6th, the Democrats secured only four offices. The Republicans held their county convention September 16th in Ellensburg and nominated all its candidates, except those for legislative offices, by acclamation. A week later the state convention met at Tacoma and placed a ticket in the field, which proved successful at the polls.

The vote cast November 8, 1898, in this county is officially given as follows:

For members congress, Wesley L. Jones, Francis W. Cushman, Republicans, 1,037 and 983 votes respectively, James H. Lewis, William C. Jones, Fusionists, 943 and 848 votes respectively, A. C. Dickinson, C. L. Haggard, Prohibitionists, 19 and 23 votes respectively, Walter Walker, M. A. Hamilton, Socialists, 8 and 11 votes respectively; justices of the state supreme court, T. J. Anders, M. A. Fullerton, Republicans, 1,022 and 1,016 votes respectively, B. F. Heuston, M. M. Goodman, Fusionists, 842 and 841 votes respectively, Thomas Young, Thomas Lowry, Prohibitionists, 12 and 9 votes respectively; state representatives, Eighteenth district, J. P. Sharp, R. B. Wilson, Republicans, 1,092 and 1,047 votes respectively, R. P. Edgington, J. F. LeClerc, Fusionists, 806 and 813 votes respectively; commissioners, First district, Dennis Strong, Republican, 1,060, R. S. McClemons, Fusionist, 824; Second district, William Mack, Republican, 1,037, H. P. Fogh, Fusionist, 847; sheriff, Isaac Brown, Republican, 1,044, W. F. Patterson, Fusionist, 880; clerk, Harry W. Hale, Republican, 1,014, E. L. Evens, Fusionist, 916; auditor, L. V. Wells, Republican, 946, Simon P. Fodory, Fusionist, 988; treasurer, W. A. Stevens, Republican, 895, C. H. Flummerfelt, Fusionist, 1,031; prosecuting attorney, C. R. Hovey, Republican, 989, W. J. Welsh, Fusionist, 940; assessor, John W. Richards, Republican, 961, G. C. Poland, Fusionist, 951; superintendent of schools, C. H. Hinman, Republican, 1,058, W. A. Thomas, Fusionist, 856; surveyor, E. I. Anderson, Republican, 1,324; coroner, J. C. McCauley, Republican, 1,095, J. B. Price, Fusionist, 806; woman suffrage amendment to constitution, yes 452, no 792. This amendment was defeated in the state by a vote of 33,866 to 15,969. Upon the creation of Chelan county, J. E. Burke was appointed to succeed Dennis Strong as commissioner, the latter becoming a citizen of the new county.

Kittitas valley residents were given an opportunity, Sunday morning, April 1, 1900, of seeing and hearing the country's great silver apostle, William Jennings Bryan, for on that day the distinguished gentleman passed through the valley enroute westward. At Ellensburg, Governor Rogers introduced his guest to the crowd assembled, and after a short speech Mr. Bryan held a reception. The campaign of that year was as interesting as most presidential campaigns are, nothing of especial local importance marking the contest. National issues predominated. President McKinley's administration was indorsed in Washington by a majority of nearly 13,000 and the re-election of Congressmen Jones and Cushman by majorities of over 10,000. As had been predicted by many, the year 1900 witnessed the dissolution of the Populist party, the Democratic party absorbing the greater portion of its strength. However, a fusion convention was held in this county August 25th and a ticket placed in the field under the name Democratic. The Republicans held their county convention August 11th.

From the official returns given below, the victors in the local contest may be seen. It will be noticed that the majorities are small.

For presidential electors, Republican, 1,139, Fusionist, 934, Prohibitionist, 52, Socialist Labor, 9, Social Democrat, 22; congressmen, Francis W. Cushman, Wesley L. Jones, Republicans, 1,098 and 1,110 votes respectively, F. C. Robertson, J. T. Ronald, Democrats, 924 and 934 votes respectively, Guy Posson, J. A. Adams, Prohibitionists, 45 and 41 votes respectively, Walter Walker, Christian F. Larsen, Socialist Laborites, 11 and 9 votes respectively, William Hagan, Herman F. Titus, Social Democrats, 18 and 20 votes respectively; justices supreme court, Wallace Mount, R. O. Dunbar, Republicans, 1,091, 1,101 respectively, E. C. Million, Richard Winsor, Democrats, 937 and 918 votes respectively, Everett Smith, Prohibitionist, 48; Thomas Young, Frank Martin, Social Laborites, 13 each, D. M. Angus, J. H. Mack, Republican, 1,001, W. E. Crowley, Democrat, 1,045; Third district, Jacob Bowers, Republican, 1,030, F. H. Bradshaw, Democrat, 951.

The election of 1902 is still fresh in the memory of those residing here at that time. It marked the advent into the political life of the state of the present widespread agitation for a railway commission and anti-pass legislation. Aside from this issue and national issues, the citizens merely recorded their personal preferences when they went to the polls, November 4th, the election being a comparatively quiet one. The county is divided into eighteen precincts. The largest vote cast in 1902 in this county was that cast for state representative, Wilson receiving 1,021 and Flynn 996, a total of 2,017. This compared with the highest vote cast in 1884, 978 votes for district attorney, and considering the fact that in the creation of Chelan county Kittitas lost a populous slice of territory, indicates the growth of the county in eighteen years. This year, 1904, a much larger vote will be polled. So evenly is party strength divided that it would be difficult, impossible, to classify the county as either Democratic or Republican, though undoubtedly there is a slight leaning toward Republicanism.

The Republicans were the first to hold a county convention in 1902, theirs taking place August 16th in the convention city, Ellensburg. A notable plank in their platform was one indorsing McBride's stand for a railway commission and anti-pass legislation. Fusion was no more, the Populist and Silver Republican parties having been abandoned after 1900 and their members having attached themselves to other parties. The old fusion party, now completely absorbed by the Democrats, met September 11th and placed an opposition ticket in the field. The nominees of both parties together with the vote each received may be found in the official figures as taken from the records:

For congressmen, Francis W. Cushman, Wesley L. Jones, William E. Humphrey, Republicans, 1,106, 1,102 and 1,068 votes respectively, George F. Cotterill, O. R. Holcomb, Frank B. Cole, Democrats, 793, 752 and 776 votes respectively, Jense C. Martin, William McCormick, Hans P. Jorgensen, Social Laborites, 17, 16 and 17 votes respectively, J. H. C. Scurlock, D. Burgess, George W. Scott, Socialists, 35, 33, and 34 votes respectively, A. H. Sherwood, W. J. McKean, O. L. Fowler, Prohibitionists, 13, 12 and 13 votes respectively; justice supreme court, Hiram E. Hadley, Republican, 1,070, James Brady Reavis, Democrat, 770, William J. Hoag, Socialist Laborite, 18, Thomas Neill, Socialist, 34; state representative, Nineteenth district, G. E. Dickson, R. B. Wilson, Republicans, 1,016 and 1,021 votes respectively, Matt. Flynn, Michael McColgan, Democrats, 996 and 842 votes respectively; auditor, Guilford Wilson, Republican, 947, H. M. Baldwin, Democrat, 1,017; sheriff, William Freyburger, Republican, 873, Robert L. Thomas, Democrat, 1,132; clerk, A. E. Emerson, Republican, 1,050, John Hoskins, Democrat, 909; treasurer, C. E. Wheeler, Republican, 867, R. Lee Purdin, Democrat, 1,095; attorney, Edward Pruyn, Republican, 798, C. V. Warner, Democrat, 1,184; assessor, W. M. Kenney, Republican, 992, W. P. Hiddleston, Democrat, 962; superintendent of schools, H. F. Blair, Republican, 1,013, W. A. Thomas, Democrat, 956; surveyor, M. M. Emerson, Republican, 1,162; no opposition; coroner, H. J. Felch, Republican, 1,173, John Catlin, Democrat, 749; commissioners, First district, J. ocrat, 835; Third district, Edgar Pease, Republican, 1,076, Rufus Cooke, Democrat, 1,034, John M. Newman, Democrat, 879.

CHAPTER IV.

TOWNS AND CITIES.

ELLENSBURG.

This thriving business and educational center enjoys an exceedingly happy location on Wilson creek some three miles from its confluence with the Yakima river, west of the center of the magnificent Kittitas valley. "It would be difficult for an artist to picture a more placid, peaceful, homelike city, or imagine more congenial and diversified environments." The beautiful shade trees and the buildings of stone, brick and wood shut off most of the view from persons within the town, but the lover of Nature's divinest handiwork may have his passion for the sublime and the picturesque fully satisfied by taking a ten-minute walk to the top of Craig's hill just east of the city. Here he obtains a grand view of that wondrous gem of the Cascades, the Kittitas basin, though its farthest limits are hazy and indistinct in the distance. The valley is picturesque in itself considered; with its enviroing hills and mountains it forms a scenic poem of indescribable sublimity. To the north the majestic Peshastins rear skyward their serrated crest, the highest peak of which is the sharp, towering crag, known as Mount Stuart. On the west are the great Cascades, and Mount Ranier, that magnificent monument of the supreme effort of Nature to pierce the heavens with a tower of Babel; while the rolling hills to the south and east, though less picturesque and inspiring, are yet most pleasing to the artistic sense.

One might easily imagine the valley as designed for the habitation of a race of giants. That there are giants in these days, giants in achievement if not in stature, appears from the transformations that have been wrought in the aspect of nature. At your feet, carried by tunnel through the very hill upon which you are standing, are the waters of the famous Ellensburg canal, waters which have followed this artificial channel for miles and which will continue to flow on for miles more, carrying life and verdure and fertility to the land. Prosperous looking rural homes dot the valley under this and other canals and even where the vitalizing water has not yet gone. The prolific acres which surround these homes are the forces which have made possible the building of the thriving little city and upon which its future mainly depends.

The site of Ellensburg was the natural place for cowboys to congregate in early days. Here was an abundance of water, shelter for their camp and a convenient eminence from which to scan with their field glasses the wide range over which their cattle and horses roamed. It was but natural also that the cowboy camp should become the site of a primitive mercantile establishment, when the settlement of the country should create a demand for such, and that other establishments should spring up in the vicinity as time passed and the country developed. Thus it happened that by purely natural causes the trading center of the valley was located. That its site was decreed as wisely as it could have been by the deliberate judgment of a company of savants, subsequent history has abundantly proven.

The story of Andrew Jackson Splawn's log cabin store has been heretofore told. It passed in 1871 into the hands of John A. Shoudy and William Dennis, the former of whom was the real author and founder of Ellensburg. Splawn's place had in some way come to be called "Robbers' Roost;" just how is uncertain as the stories told differ widely. Mr. Shoudy named it Ellensburgh in honor of his wife, but in the year 1894 the final h was dropped, through action of the postal department.

All the energy and ability of this unusually energetic and able pioneer were devoted to the up-building of Ellensburg. Its growth was nevertheless exceedingly slow at first. About 1872, the second log cabin, a two-story structure, was erected by Mr. Shoudy, and that year a blacksmith shop was started by Jacob Becker. The store and shop, according to the statement of William B. Price, who came through Ellensburg in 1875, constituted the only business establishments of the town at that time. There were, perhaps, a half dozen residences.

July 20, 1875, the first plat of Ellensburg was recorded, at the instance of John A. and Mary Ellen Shoudy, the townsite proprietors. It covered twenty-four blocks in the west half of the northeast quarter of section two, township seventeen north, range eighteen east of the Willamette meridian. Block eight was reserved for courthouse purposes and block fourteen for a public square. The streets running north and south were Water, Main, Pearl and Pine, and those running east and west were numbered one to seven. Mr. and Mrs. Shoudy's first addition was recorded January 13, 1882, and October 3, 1883, an addition was recorded at the instance of George F. Smith and wife and Jefferson Smith. Later additions to the original townsite are: Shoudy's second addition, recorded August 11, 1885; Homestead, recorded December 22, 1887; Hick's, March 22, 1888; Elliott's, 1888; Shoudy's third, June 13, 1888; Sunnyside, June 13, 1888; South Ellensburg, June 21, 1888; Tacoma, June 24, 1888; Depot, July 27, 1888; Railroad second, October 5, 1888; Railroad first, November 21, 1888; Sunny Slope, January 7, 1889; Grand View, January 15, 1889; Michell's first, February 14, 1889; Michell's second, February 23, 1889; Santa Ana, February 6, 1889; Smithson's, February 27, 1889; Central, March 21, 1889; Electric, April 10, 1889; Shoudy's Subdivision, April 15, 1889; Columbia, June 3, 1889; Becker's August 31, 1889; Lapointe's first, April 9, 1890; Ames, May 26, 1890; Knox & McIntyre's, November 12, 1890; Lee's Subdivision, August 28, 1891; Iron Works Annex, October 3, 1891.

An idea of the growth of the town in the three years subsequent to 1875 may be gathered from Dr. Middleton Amen's description of it as he saw it in 1878, the date of his location in the town as its first permanent physician. He states that, to the best of his recollection, Ellensburg then consisted of one store, kept by Shoudy & Stewart, J. W. Jewett's saloon across the street from Shoudy's; Jacob P. Becker's blacksmith shop; an assembly hall in Shoudy's new frame building, over the store; a post-office, also in Shoudy's store; a small, two-story frame hotel, kept by Mrs. James Master-son, and possibly one or two other establishments. These buildings were grouped at and near the corner of Main and Third streets.

In 1879, Henry M. Bryant and Austin A. Bell opened the second trading post in Ellensburg. It was located in the old stockade building, erected during the Indian trouble of 1878, hence was called the Stockade store. The same year, Leopold Blumauer started a general store, on the southwest corner of Main and Fourth streets and Thomas F. Meagher and John H. Smithson a butcher shop. Blumauer's building still stands, being one of the few business structures which escaped the great fire of 1880.

The growth of Ellensburg during the early 'eighties was steady and substantial, a considerable number of business houses being established. In the first three or four numbers of the Standard, a newspaper which made its appearance June 16, 1883, the following individuals and firms inserted advertisements: Harness and saddles, E. F. Church; general merchandise, The San Francisco, L. Blumauer, proprietor; Smith Brothers & Company; the Pioneer store, Shoudy & Stewart, proprietors; hotel, the Valley (which had succeeded the Master-son house), Smith Brothers & Company, proprietors; meat market, Smithson & Meagher; the Post-office drug store, Charles B. Reed, proprietor; the Blue restaurant, William B. Price, proprietor; hardware, W. S. Crouch; blacksmith shops, Becker & Seaton, successors to J. Becker & Son, James G. McGrath, (J. T.) Gilmour & (George) Johnson; saloons, Board of Trade, H. D. Merwin, proprietor; Our Corner, J. T. McDonald, proprietor, the Humboldt, Smith & Shaser, proprietors; barber shop, the Ellensburg, Alfred Woods, proprietor, A. E. Dietzel's; jewelry, Henry Rehmk & Brothers; manufacturers doors, sash, etc., Pressey & Sprague; real estate, Naylor, Mires & Company; millinery, Mrs. W. D. Ogden; flour mills, C. A. Sanders, a mile and a half northeast of town, Canady Bros., three miles northeast of town, R. P. Tjossem, three miles southeast; brewery, Theodore Hess, proprietor, situated three miles west of town; photograph gallery, B. W. Frisbie; John Hegle's brickyard; livery, M. Barnett; furniture, Thomas Howe; attorneys, Daniel Gaby, (J. H.) Naylor & (Austin) Mires, Samuel C. Davidson, F. S. Thorp; physicians, Drs. Newton Henton, M. V. Amen and George Stuart; newspaper, the Standard, Richard V. Chadd, editor and proprietor.

The year 1883 was an especially prosperous one for Ellensburg. In real estate there was quite a boom. It was the year in which the First National Bank was established, Ellensburg Hook & Ladder Company No. 1 organized, and the town made the temporary county seat of Kittitas county, which was created that year. Ellensburg was also incorporated in 1883, though the act did not come into effect until January 1, 1884. Upon A. Lawrence was bestowed the honor of first serving as mayor, and upon John T. McDonald, C. B. Reed, S. C. Davidson and S. L. Blumauer that of constituting the first city council.

But there is one misfortune chargeable to the account of 1883. August 20th of that year, early in the morning, the fire fiend made his first serious assault upon the town. The alarm was sounded at one A. M., and the crowds that responded soon perceived that Thomas Johnson's store was on fire. Seeing that the building was doomed, the people gave their best efforts to preventing the spread of the fire, and their energy and toil, aided by favorable weather conditions, resulted in the averting of a general conflagration, though Johnson's and Couch's stores and a house belonging to Mrs. Davidson, but occupied at the time by Jacob Becker, were completely destroyed. Johnson's loss was $45,000, partly covered by insurance; Couch's not less than $6,000, with about $1,800 insurance; Mrs. Davidson's, $600; Becker's, $200; Dr. N. Henton's, $200; that of I. Burnett, agent for the Singer Sewing Machine Company, $580. The fire was thought to be of incendiary origin.

Late in 1884, General C. B. Lamborn, Land Commissioner for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, accompanied by Engineers Bogue & Huson, visited Kittitas county for the purpose of deciding upon the location of a railway center and shipping point for the valley. After some investigation of Ellensburg and its surroundings, Mr. Lamborn decided that it would not be necessary to build a new town, as was done in the Yakima valley, but that Ellensburg was in the important matter of situation and in all other respects suited to the purpose. Amicable arrangements were made with John A. Shoudy, F. D. Schnebly, Mrs. McDonald, Smith Brothers and other large property owners by which a very substantial subsidy of real estate was to be given the company in consideration of its building a depot on an extension of Third street, within half a mile of Main. The town, already prosperous, gained materially through the certainty that the railway was coming and was sure not to pass it by on the other side.

In December, 1884, the Standard fired the first gun in Ellensburg's campaign for the location within its limits, when the territory should have gained admission to the Federal union, of the state capital. The editor argued vehemently the city's claim to this honor, basing it chiefly on the healthy, central location of Ellensburg in the "most strikingly beautiful, unsurpassedly healthy, admirably watered and immeasurably fertile, compact body of agricultural land of any extent on the North Pacific slope." The campaign begun then was maintained with great spirit and ability, as the people thought their location, with all the other advantages possessed by them ought to give them the prize. Had it not been for the opposition of North Yakima, they might have won in the fall of 1889, but local rivalry and the great fire ruined their chances of success.

During 1884, also, Ellensburg took an important step in the direction of becoming an educational center, by sustaining Rev. James A. Laurie and Presbyterians generally in their efforts to establish an academy here. The cause of education was young in the town at this time. The first public school had been taught by William O. Ames in the winter of 1881-2 in an old dwelling house, though at least one private school had been maintained in the district previously, that of D. G. C. Baker. Mr. Ames says he found pupils in need of instruction in everything from the alphabet to algebra, and supplied the demand the best he could, teaching the higher branches out of school hours. About 1882, the district built a 30 by 70 schoolhouse at a cost of $2,500. It seems, however, that money for the payment of teachers, etc., was scarce; that the public instruction even after the building of this school was insufficient for the needs of the people and that private schools were organized occasionally.

Such being the conditions, it may be assumed that the Presbyterian academy was welcomed by the citizens. At a mass meeting held June 23, 1884, thirteen hundred dollars were subscribed for the new enterprise, eight hundred of this sum coming, however, from the Presbyterian board. With the money, the Presbyterians purchased the public school building and equipped it for their own purposes, allowing the district to retain for a time the free use of the upper story. The first term of academic instruction commenced September 10, 1884. For some years Ellensburg Academy was a force in the education of the youth of town and county, but the development of the public school system eventually rendered it unnecessary, and the building was remodeled for a church.

The spring of 1885 brought one disaster to the thriving town of Ellensburg. At one o'clock A. M., March 13th, fire broke out in the kitchen of the Valley hotel on the corner of Main and Third streets. Before the flames could be conquered that building, Walter Keys' saloon, Blomquist's beer hall, the New England hotel building and John Lyon's saloon and dwelling were totally destroyed. The city was without water works and without a fire department at the time, and it was with difficulty that the destroying element was confined to the buildings mentioned. The loss was probably between $12,000 and $15,000, with slight insurance. It is supposed that the fire was of incendiary origin. The fire resulted in the loss of one human life, that of John Harbin, who was seen the evening previous in an intoxicated condition and taken to the hotel. Several small fires occurred later, one of them destroying the Oriental hotel, but no general conflagration until the great one of 1889.

The year 1885 was a period of great activity in Ellensburg and vicinity, as the railroad was being constructed westward from North Yakima, thousands of dollars were being expended daily in wages and the entire country was feeling the impulse always given by large pay rolls and coming railways. The first train of cars, it is said, pulled into Ellensburg, March 31, 1886, conveying both passengers and freight. Its advent marked the beginning of a career of phenomenal development for the town, which did not end until after the big fire of 1889.

The momentum of this progressive movement increased rapidly as time went by. In October, 1885, the population was estimated at 600; in October, 1886, 800; in October, 1887, 1,200, and one year later, 3,000. Perhaps the year 1887 was the first one during which the growth was really remarkable. In it, according to Mayor Austin Mires' report, there were erected seventy-three dwelling houses, one three-story flouring mill with manufacturing capacity of 100 barrels a day, one two-story brick bank building, the Northern Pacific, round-house and machine shops, besides some half dozen frame business buildings.

"To be specific," continues the report, "our city contains the following: One hundred and ninety-five dwelling houses, forty-five private barns, three livery stables, one feed stable, three hotels, five restaurants, three lodging houses, two boarding and lodging houses, twelve saloons, seven breweries, seven general merchandise stores, five dry goods and variety stores, one second hand and variety store, six fruit and candy stores, one candy factory, one bakery, three grocery stores, three hardware stores, two tin shops, three agricultural implement stores, two photograph galleries, one gunsmith shop, two jewelry stores, two harness and saddlery stores, two millinery stores, one boot and shoe store, three cobbler stores, two tailor shops, one sash and door factory, three furniture stores, nine ice houses, five blacksmith shops, three wagon making shops, two printing offices (hand power), one printing office (steam power), three job printing offices, one fire engine house, one brick courthouse, one public library, one coal yard, two wood yards, three carpenter shops, two paint shops, two butcher shops, one fish market, one bank in operation, one bank to begin operation January 1, 1888, one express office, one telegraph office, one railroad depot, Northern Pacific Railroad roundhouse and machine shops, one flouring mill, three lumber yards, two sewing machine agents' offices, two Chinese stores, seven Chinese laundries, one real estate and mining office, one real estate and insurance office, six doctors' offices, ten lawyers' offices, four dressmakers, one loan and trust company's office, three express wagons, three drays, seven fire insurance agents, two hospitals, two billiard halls, one dental office, one Masonic hall, one Odd Fellows' hall, one Presbyterian church building and academy, one M. E. church building, one Christian and one Catholic church building, one public school.

"There are seventy pupils in attendance at the academy; 250 children of school age in the city, and 150 in attendance at the public graded school.

"The following churches and fraternal organizations are represented in the city: Methodist church, membership 25; Presbyterian, 50; Christian, 60; Catholic, 173; Masonic lodge, 47; chapter Royal Arch Masons, 22; Odd Fellows, 43; G. A. R., 45; A. O. U. W., 11; United Order of Honor, 21.

"Among the most important improvements of the year may be mentioned the water ditch, three miles in length, constructed by Messrs. Shoudy & Tjossem to furnish water power for their new flouring mill. This ditch is supplied from the Yakima river, and affords a motive force of 300-horse power, 80-horse power only being necessary for running the mill. The remaining 220-horse power can be easily applied to various beneficial city purposes. This, taken in connection with Wilson creek, running directly through our city, and the large Ellensburg ditch, taken from the Yakima river and passing within less than half a mile above our town, constitute resources of water supply excelled by few if any cities in our territory."

It was during the second month of the year 1887 that the present brick courthouse was finished. The work was done by Contractor John Nash for a consideration of $15,000, and was accepted by the county February 28th.

The achievements of 1887 were, however, dwarfed by those of 1888. During the latter year the population more than doubled. The real estate transfers for the first ten months aggregated $560,000. The number of houses erected in the same period were 213 and it was thought that twenty more would be added to the list during the fall. Nine brick blocks and one of cut stone were erected, namely, the Ellensburg National Bank building, two stories, costing $8,000; Shoudy & Cadwell's, 60 by 120 feet, $2,000; E. P. Cadwell's brick store-room, west of the Johnson house, $5,000; E. R. Cadwell's brick hotel, three stories, 60 by 120 feet, $25,000; Ben E. Snipes & Company's stone building, two and a half stories, 30 by 70, cost $20,000; the Masonic temple, 35 by 70, to cost $10,000; the Odd Fellows' brick block, 60 by 70, to cost $12,000; Mrs. Durgen's building, 32 by 62, cost $6,000; the Lynch block, 60 by 120, $20,000; the new opera house, three stories, 60 by 120, $25,000. The amount expended for dwelling houses during the same period was estimated at $175,000.

But Ellensburg's career of rapid development suffered a sudden and terrible check during the summer of 1889, the same year in which Seattle and Spokane had their awful baptisms of flame. At 10:30 P. M., July 4th, the dread tones of the fire bell called the attention of all to the fact that J. S. Anthony's grocery store on the east side of Main street, between Fourth and Fifth, was on fire. Forthwith the people began the unequal battle, but as a furious gale was blowing at the time and water was scarce, the fight was hopeless from the start. The store melted like wax; the adjoining buildings, all frame structures and as dry as tinder, soon caught and shared a similar fate. Nothing withstood the progress of the flames toward the north, until they reached Nash's brick building, which effectually stayed their progress in that direction. The buildings to the southward and eastward of the starting place did not escape, however. By the time the fire had reached the brick and stone buildings, it was hot enough to consume these like so much straw. "On the south side of Main it soon swept over Armstrong's and Imbric's offices to O. B. Castle's keg house; thence across Fourth to the Localizer office, carrying everything along Main on either side of the street with the exception of Blumauer & Son's store, Spencer's lodging house, Gass & Ramsey's and the saddlery store. Main street was swept to First, but the gale being from the northwest, the fire spread more rapidly to the southeast. All the saloons on the north side of Fourth above the keg house crumbled before it like egg shells, as did Gross's and Davidson's offices, Louis Herman's store, the old Johnson house and the Ashler. Here the fire was terrific, the roar of the flames being as deafening as a storm at sea." The Geddis block, Snipes & Company's bank and the Davidson block all melted away before the fury of the devouring element, and the only hope of the buildings south and east was gone. They soon became enveloped in a sea of fire.

"By superhuman effort," says a paper of the time,

"the Lynch block, the Ellensburg National Bank, the old City hotel and all that portion of the city between Pearl and Fifth and the Presbyterian Academy was saved from destruction. The greatest effort was made to save the City hotel, directly opposite the Masonic temple, on Fourth and Pine. The water supply, meager enough at first, was now almost exhausted, but men got on top of the building with hose and a constant stream was kept flowing over the roof and down the sides until the Temple fire had ceased and danger from that direction no longer threatened. This effort saved the north side of Fourth street, the Baptist church, the public school building and at least fifty other buildings."

While it is hardly possible to compile a complete list of the buildings destroyed, such a list would certainly include the following:

The Ashler brick block, old Johnson house, Geddis block, Odd Fellows' hall, Masonic hall, Snipes & Company's bank, Willis & Bryant's store, Oak Hall restaurant, Becker & Cox's meat market, Kit-titas meat market, Ames drug store, Bull block, Ifstiger house, Shurer's blacksmith shop, Meagher's house, former residence and office of Dr. Henton, Leonard & Ross's real estate office, City bakery, the old post-office, the Oriental, Kreidel's store, Adler's barber shop, Stevenson's gun store, Davidson's block, Davidson & McFalls block, Davis & Adams's meat market, Anthony's store, Elliott's residence, Imbrie's real estate office, Armstrong's office, the keg house, Localizer office, Ramos & Meagher's office, Caro's clothing house, Round's barber shop, DeBord's barber shop, grocery store, Capital restaurant, Lyon's saloon, New Corner, Old Corner, Shoudy's block, Chinatown, Capital drug store, Perry's drug store, Lapointe's real estate office, John Geiger's tailor shop, Wood's barber shop, Wynnmann's confectionery, Rehmk's jewelry store, Bushnell's photograph gallery, Peed's harness shop, Peterson's saloon, Cascade saloon, Gross's insurance and real estate office, Davidson's law office, Louis Herman's clothing store, Davidson & McFalls' law offices, Board of Trade rooms, Walter & Company's offices, Stewart, Wilkins & Company, Dr. Richardson's, Dr. Newland's, Dr. Gray's, Hare & Wallace's, Dr. Musser's, Dyer's agricultural warehouse, Fish block, new post-office, Johnson's stables, Tacoma lodging house, four small dwellings belonging to W. W. Fish, Isabella block, Fogarty's store, Bennett's store and warehouse, D. G. C. Baker's two residences, Oldham's blacksmith shop, the Beebe residence, Lloyd Mercantile Company block, Mrs. Schnebly's residence, Holbrook boarding house, four Chinese wash houses, Chaffee's residence, Thompson's residence, Crawford's cigar factory, Harmon's dry goods store, Kleinberg's clothing store, Travers Brothers' hardware establishment, Pearson's place, the old Senate, the Tivoli, Delmonico restaurant, Dexter stables, California stables, three houses of Walters & Company, one stable of Walters & Company, the county superintendent of schools' office with all records and papers.

A partial list of the various losses by individuals and companies, with the insurance in each case, was compiled by the Ellensburg Capital at the time, as follows:

E. C. Price, $500, insurance $500; S. Pearson, $4,000, insurance $2,100; Dr. Bean, $600; D. Dammon, $100; Alsip & Son, $250; W. H. Olding, $1,000; Henry Weimann, $1,500; W. W. It has been estimated that the two hundred houses and ten brick blocks with their contents and all the other property destroyed by the fire were of an aggregate value of not less than two million dollars. Of course the distressed city was the recipient of much sympathy and substantial assistance in the form of money, provisions, etc., from other towns of the territory, so that actual want of the necessities of life did not exist.

Every disaster has its hero. The hero of the Ellensburg fire was D. A. Holbrook, who at the imminent risk of his life climbed to the third story of the Ashler block, while it was a mass of flames, for the purpose of rescuing a stranger supposed to be sick in one of the rooms. Holbrook escaped by descending a burning electric light pole, though not without serious injury to arms and face. But the Ellensburg fire developed more than one hero. Indeed one would almost conclude that the town possessed a citizenship of heroes from the fortitude and courage with which all received the blow and set about recuperating from it. July 6th, the people held a rousing street meeting, at which several enthusiastic speeches were made, strongly urging the rebuilding of the city at once. By the roth, carpenters, bricklayers, graders and laborers were busy in the burnt district clearing away the debris and laying the foundation for new blocks. Within ten days after the fire, work either on the plans or the actual construction of forty-three business blocks, averaging in cost $12,000 each, was under way, and the resurrection of Ellensburg had fairly begun.

It would seem that the courage and energy which would prompt a people to attempt the task of bringing a healthier, handsomer, more substantial city out of the wreck and ruins of past achievements ought to meet with an abundant reward. Unfortunately, however, conditions are not always just in their treatment of individuals or communities. For some time previous to the fire, Ellensburg business men had been eagerly reaching out for the trade of the Big Bend country and the Concomully region. While they were rebuilding and re-establishing their trading houses, their patrons to the north and east had to seek elsewhere for supplies and trade relationships were thus created which could not easily be broken up. But the fire occurred during a period of prosperity and overspeculation throughout the west. All over the state men were borrowing money freely and boldly banking on the future. The business men of Ellensburg naturally fell in with the spirit of the age, and erected costly buildings, filling them with heavy stocks for which, as time proved, there was no adequate demand. The result was commercial disaster and hard times.

Thursday, December 26, 1889, the large wholesale and retail mercantile house of Lloyd Brothers closed its doors. Immediately afterward came the failure of a small confectionery business owned by Shaver & Brown. February 13, 1890, the doors of George B. Henton & Company, dealers in general merchandise, were closed, and early in April two more failures occurred. Nor was there cessation of losses by accident in the town. February 24th the public school building was burned to the ground, entailing a loss of about $4,000, $2,500 of which was, however, covered by insurance. On April 14th, the roundhouse and machine shops caught fire and before the department could reach the scene the flames had gained such an advantage that nothing could be done but to wet down the surrounding buildings and prevent the spread of the fire. Throughout all these multiplied disasters the people battled bravely against depression and business stagnation. The railway company rebuilt the roundhouse and the city at once sold its bonds for money to build a new schoolhouse. It also boldly purchased the electric light plant for $34,000, and voted the issue of $200,000 worth of municipal bonds for the purpose of constructing water works, a sewerage system, etc. By this activity, the erection of new buildings by lodges and individuals, the organized efforts of the board of trade and everything that could be done by the friends of Ellensburg were insufficient to stem the tide which was setting in against them, and throughout the year 1891 dull times prevailed.

The year 1892 was no better; indeed, the conditions were far from good in the valley generally. The assertion has been made and frequently reiterated that in 1892 there were only twelve pieces of deeded land in the county that were free from mortgage. The year 1893, as everybody knows, brought widespread distress and disaster and financial stringency. Ellensburg was especially ill prepared for the hard times and suffered perhaps more than most other towns of the state, the Snipes failure, heretofore referred to, adding immeasurably to the general gloom. Progress of any kind was out of the question; indeed the four years of hard times were a period of retrogression rather, in Ellensburg, as in most other towns of the west.

With the general business revival in 1897 came a commercial quickening in Ellensburg also. Crops and prices were good that year and of course the business men of the town came in for a share of the benefit. They showed their readiness to join the forward march in good earnest by organizing a commercial club to look after the local interests. The officers of this body were as follows: President, R. B. Wilson; first vice president, E. C. Wheeler; second vice president, W. H. Talbott; treasurer, H. S. Elwood; directors, G. E. Dickson, T. W. Farrell, F. Hart, J. Van Dyk, O. M. Lattimer, C. V. Warner, E. T. Barden, M. R. Weed, P. H. W. Ross, I. N. Power.

The record of 1898 was still better than that of its predecessor, though its advent found the juvenile population of the town and some of the older people suffering from an epidemic of measles. In February a chinook wind blowing over the foot and a half of snow which covered the valley caused a sudden flood which occasioned much inconvenience to residents on the flat between Water street and the depot, but nothing of serious consequence occurred to mar the happiness of the people or cause a halt in the progressive march. During the fall of 1898 the Northern Pacific Railroad Company d'd a larger volume of business from the Ellensburg depot than ever before, the shipments aggregating 257 cars in October as against 107 for the same month of the preceding year.

A memorable event of 1899 was the robbing on November 1st of the jewelry store of Henry Rehmke & Brother on Fourth street. At 12:20 o'clock, P. M., William Rehmke locked the store and started to dinner. Fifteen minutes later, his brother Henry returned and discovered that in the interim a robber had effected an entrance and carried away some valuable jewelry. Investigation showed that he had bored three auger holes near the knob of the outside back door with intent to reach in and slip the bolt, but failing in this, had pried off the casing. Thus he entered the room in the rear of the store, whence, by similar means, he made his way to where the valuables were. Having helped himself to the high priced goods in the front of the store, he departed without molesting the cheaper articles in the least. A few solid gold watches were also left and a small number of charms and lockets set with diamonds, also the cash in the drawers. The gold, silver and gold filled watches, the watch movements, the diamond and plain gold rings, with all the other jewelry taken, aggregated in value about $3,000.

Sheriff Brown was immediately notified and soon vigorous efforts to capture the midday burglar were inaugurated. Next day at Cle-Elum, the sheriff arrested a man who was pointed out to him as having pawned two watches and some rings. Having landed the suspect in jail at Roslyn, he sent for Mr. Rehmke, who soon arrived. After a vigorous cross-examination by the jeweler and the sheriff, the man finally admitted the crime, telling where the plunder was hidden in a sack. It was found, identified by Rehmke, and brought back to Ellensburg.

The burglar, who gave his name as John Herman, was in due time arraigned before the superior court, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment.

The second month of the year 1900 was fruitful of one serious disaster to Ellensburg. The evening of the 13th, Tjossem & Son's flouring mill, an excellent, well-equipped plant, was completely destroyed by fire. Nothing was saved except the books and a few other articles that were in the office, but by heroic efforts the fire was prevented from spreading to the warehouse or to the several cars loaded with hay which were standing near. In the mill at the time of its destruction were 1,300 barrels of flour, and between six and seven thousand bushels of grain. The total loss was estimated at $17,000, insurance $5,000. The mill had been entered on the 17th of the preceding month and robbed of about $300 in cash, besides some valuable papers.

This was the last serious conflagration in the town, though during the night of July 10, 1901, there was a fire of some magnitude in the furniture store of Trip & Jackson, in the Honolulu block, which did considerable damage to the stock and the building. At one time during 1902 apprehension was felt lest the railway should strike a serious blow at the town by making Cle-Elum the division terminus in its stead, but the company on mature deliberation concluded to let things remain as they were. It is needless to say that Ellensburg has been making the most of the good times of the past few years. Its growth has been steady and substantial, though not phenomenal. The country around it has enjoyed many blessings, in the way of splendid crops and high prices, and the effect on the town's prosperity has been immediate and pervading. It would seem that Ellensburg has conquered the evil fate with which it at one time seemed to be struggling, and that it is now ready to enjoy in peace the development and prosperity which belong to it as the central city of so rich, extensive and well favored a valley.

The Ellensburg of to-day is a substantial, prosperous, modern metropolis, with approximately 3,000 inhabitants, within whose gates progress and stability are at once strikingly apparent. The city is favored with the same healthy climate which blesses the remainder of the county. According to the report of the United States Geological Survey, it is 1570 feet above sea level.

Perhaps no two things contribute so much to a community's healthfulness as an abundant supply of pure water and good drainage, and in possessing these Ellensburg is fortunate. In 1889 the first water system was installed by the Capitol Hill Water Works Company, consisting of B. E. Craig, president; C. A. Sanders, vice president; W. R. Abrams, treasurer; and P. H. Ross, secretary. This company was succeeded in 1892 by the Ellensburg Water Supply Company, which at present owns the system, supplying the city with most of its water. The gravity system is in use. Water is taken directly from Wilson creek, two and a half miles northeast of town, though the company has three reserve reservoirs on Craig's hill, capable of storing between three and four million gallons, which water is conveyed into the city through twenty-inch wooden mains. An average fire pressure of 65 pounds to the square inch is obtained at the corner of Pearl and Fourth streets. The company receives no pay from the city for the privileges granted. Julius C. Hubbell is manager of the water company. In the year 1889, also, City Engineer W. P. Mason began installing the fine sewer system which thoroughly drains the city. This system is modeled after that adopted by the city of Memphis, Tennessee, after the yellow fever scourge of 1877, which converted that city from one of the unhealthiest into one of the healthiest cities in the world. Ellensburg is said to have been one of the first cities in Washington to adopt a sewer system.

The city maintains a well-equipped fire department, with headquarters in the city building, on Pine street. The apparatus consists of one third class Silsby steam fire engine, two hand hose carts, 2,250 feet of hose, hook and ladder truck, etc. A volunteer fire company handles this equipment, only two officers being paid, the chief, Peter Garvey, and the engineer, B. A. Maxey, both of whom sleep at the fire station.

The city owns its electric lighting system, having purchased the private plant of John A. Shoudy in July, 1890. Mr. Shoudy received $34,000 for the property. From time to time improvements have been made, including the building of a $10,000 power canal in 1897, making the plant a very valuable asset of the municipality. January 28, 1904, the citizens voted to again improve this property by constructing a power plant on the west side of the river, two and a half miles northwest of the city, which will develop 640-horse power. The power not used for running the city lighting plant will be used in the valley and, it is expected, in furnishing motive power for a suburban line between Ellensburg and Thorp. The canal used in furnishing this power will be three and five-sixths miles in length, carrying fifty second feet of water. The appropriation was $22,000. All the contracts have been let, and it is thought that the work will be completed in October.

The old charter, granted in November, 1883, to take effect January 1, 1884, has been amended many times through general and specific acts, but still governs the city. The corps of officers now administering municipal affairs was elected in December, 1903, and is as follows:

Mayor—M. E. Flynn.

Councilmen—A. M. Wright, Andrew Olsen, C. S. Palmer, William Peed, George Hornbeck, Thomas F. Meagher and R. Lee Purdin.

Treasurer—Charles Stewart.

Clerk—George Sayles.

Attorney—Austin Mires.

Physician—Dr. J. A. Mahan.

Marshals—William Harold, William Freyburger.

Engineer—John Scott.

Chief Fire Department—Peter Garvey.

Superintendent of Streets—B. A. Maxey.

Ellensburg is justly proud of its standing as an educational center. Here are situated the State Normal school and one of the finest public school buildings in the state, both of which are in charge of faculties of acknowledged high standing in the teaching profession. The Washington State Normal school was established by the legislature in 1890, was opened to the public in 1891, and entered its present commodious and beautiful home in September, 1893, occupying a building which cost $60,000. A detailed history and description of this well known institution, which has added not a little to the city's educational standing, will be found in the chapter dealing with the educational interests of this section.

The public school building was erected in 1890 at a cost of $40,000 to replace one destroyed by fire. W. H. Ritchie, of Seattle, is its architect, and John Scott, its builder. To build this magnificent brick and stone structure, the district issued $50,000 thirty-year, six per cent. bonds. The city traded what was then known as the City Park block to the district for the latter's property in the First Railroad addition, and upon the first named land on Fifth street, the school was built. It is almost needless to say that every effort has been made to completely equip this school in the most modern manner, with satisfactory results. The city clock occupies the high tower of the building, thus adding materially to its appearance and universally attracting the attention of strangers to it. The corps of teachers in charge of the public school during the year 1903-1904 was: Principal, F. L. Calkins; teachers, George M. Jenkins, Opal Heller, Edna M. Dennis, Florence Wilson, Mrs. E. U. Saunders, Jennie Sprague, Anna Wampler, Agnes Hinman, Franc Charlton, Cora Weaver, Anna Quigley, Lillian Carothers and Clara M. Greening. The district is obligated to use temporarily an abandoned church building in addition to the main schoolhouse. The last school report made to the county superintendent's office showed that the Ellensburg district, No. 3, had 809 pupils enrolled, of whom 435 were girls. Last year the expenditures of the district were $15,325.97, of which $8,722.50 went for salaries alone. The value of school property was then estimated at $57,650; the assessed valuation of the district, $1,028,810.

The city possesses, among other public buildings, a fine opera house, said to be one of the best of its kind in the interior of the state. The building is a two-story brick block, the old Lloyd block, corner of Third and Pine streets. In it Ellensburg's first opera house was established by the Lloyds in 1890, but after their failure, several different buildings were used for opera purposes until 1900, when the city's business men organized the Ellensburg Theatre Company and purchased the old opera house for about $8,000. In all about $19,000 has been spent in remodeling the building and fitting it up as a first-class small theatre. As one of the theatres attached to the Northwestern circuit, the Ellensburg Theatre is favored by many high grade entertainment companies and financially as well as socially, is a success. Julius C. Hubbell is president of the company, James Ramsay is vice president, T. W. Farrell, secretary, and Harry S. Elwood, manager.

Two banks, one national and one private, handle the general banking business of the city and Kittitas valley, there being only one other in the county. The older of these institutions is the Bank of Ellensburg, capital $25,000, owned by E. H. Snowden and P. H. W. Ross. This bank was established in 1897 by two Spokane men, H. C. Barrol and W. E. Bell, and at the time of its organization was the only institution of the kind in the city, the Kittitas Valley National and Ben E. Snipes & Company having failed during the hard times and having never been re-established. The former paid its creditors 43.7 per cent., under the receivership of J. C. Hubbell; the creditors of the latter received only 9.55 per cent. of their claims. The city's other financial institution is the Washington State Bank; its capital is $25,000, and officers, J. H. Smithson, president; C. H. Stewart, vice president; C. W. Johnstone, cashier.

Three weekly newspapers are published in Ellensburg: The Dawn, edited and published by Robert A. Turner; the Localizer, published by the Cascade Printing and Publishing Company, Randall Bros., proprietors; and the Ellensburg Capital, edited and published by A. H. Stulfauth. Fuller mention of these journals will be found in the press chapter. While there are a number of boarding houses and small hotels, the two leading hotels in the city are the Grand Pacific, William B. Price, proprietor, and the Hotel Vanderbilt, Aldrich & Jackson, proprietors, both of which are modern in equipment and well managed. Aside from the large retail and wholesale mercantile and commission business houses in the city, there are a few other enterprises that deserve special mention: the Northern Pacific division shops and yards; the Ellensburg Lumber Company's sawmill; three creameries, the Ellensburg, B. F. Reed, manager; the Kittitas, S. P. Wippel, manager, and the Alberta, A. E. Shaw, manager; two flour mills, the City Milling & Realty Company's and R. P. Tjossem & Son's, both having a capacity of 100 barrels a day and operating nearly the whole year; Coble & Sackett's brickyard. The mining, stockraising and farming industries of the county find in Ellensburg their most convenient trade center and few if any lines of legitimate business are unrepresented. The local field for professional men is also fully occupied.

As might be expected the business men maintain a live commercial club, known as the Ellensburg Club, which for many years has taken an active part in upbuilding the city. This organization is at present managed by the following officers: President, M. E. Flynn; vice president, Martin Cameron; secretary, S. C. Boedcher; treasurer, E. H. Snowden. Well furnished club rooms are maintained on Fourth street over the Warwick saloon.

In July, 1903, the young men of Ellensburg and the surrounding country organized Company C, W. N. G., to take the place of the old company which served in the Spanish-American war. The muster rolls are nearly filled and in every way the organization bids fair to be a worthy successor to Company H. A. C. Steinman is captain of Company C, as he was of Company H; G. M. Burlingham is first lieutenant; Robert Murray, second lieutenant; William O. McDowell, orderly sergeant; and Allen R. Dennis, quartermaster sergeant.

oldest women's literary association. This club was organized in the fall of 1895, when ten ladies met and took up the study of Spanish history together with Washington Irving's books bearing on that subject. A formal organization was not effected however, until 1897, then the club was admitted to the state federation. A literary program is carried out each year, and the social features of club life are not neglected. Mrs. A. H. Stulfauth is the present president of the Friday Club.

The Gallina Club, composed of twenty-one members, whose object is social and intellectual development, was organized in March, 1900, and federated the following May. Mrs. S. B. Weed was its first president, Mrs. J. A. Mahan its second, Mrs. A. C. Steinman its third. The present officers are: President, Mrs. C. E. Wheeler; vice president, Mrs. C. S. Bullard; recording secretary, Mrs. F. A. Home; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. H. Morgan; treasurer, Mrs. G. E. Campbell; critic, Mrs. A. C. Spaulding.

The Ellensburg Art Club was organized by six ladies of the city four years ago and, although small, is very well known for its exhaustive and successful work along art lines. Membership is limited to six, the members at present being: Mrs. J. B. Davidson, president; Mrs. C. V. Warner, secretary; Mrs. P. P. Gray, Mrs. James Ramsey, and Mrs. H. L. Stowell. A Ladies' Municipal Society, whose purpose is to improve municipal affairs, is also among the active associations of Ellensburg.

The Methodists are among the earliest pioneers in Ellensburg church work. Rev. J. S. Smith, pastor of the Ellensburg church in 1899, prepared at the request of the district conference, a history of his church, in which he used the following language:

"The first Methodist sermon was preached in Ellensburg in the schoolhouse by Rev. Robert Hatfield, some time in the spring of 1880. He continued to preach occasionally, until the fall conference. The first class was organized by Rev. D. L. Spaulding in September, 1880, Dr. Newton Henton being the first class leader. The first church building was erected under the pastorate of Rev. S. W. Richards, completed under Rev. Ira Wakefield and enlarged under Rev. J. W. Maxwell. This structure was destroyed by fire July 4, 1889. The present church building was erected in the summer and fall of 1889 under the pastorate of Mr. Maxwell and has been improved and completed by succeeding pastors. The great fire also destroyed the parsonage built by Rev. D. L. Spaulding. The trustees of the church at the time the church and parsonage were rebuilt were S. Thompson, S. W. Maxey, H. C. Walters, L. A. Vincent, J. E. McDowell, Dr. J. W. Bean and C. I. Helm. Mr. Spaulding organized the pioneer Sunday school in 1880, becoming its first superintendent. Several of our pastors have been members of the general conference and several have become presiding elders."

The charter members of the church were: Sarah E. Butler, J. L. Mills, M. L. Mills, John McDowell, Thomas G. McDowell, Sarah Meade, Mary A. McDowell, Rachael Page, L. M. Rhodes, D. L. Spaulding and wife, David Wood and Juda Wood. Those who have served the church as pastors are: Revs. D. L. Spaulding, S. W. Richards, January 1, 1884, to September, 1884; Ira Wakefield, September 25, 1884, to July, 1885; Henry Brown, one year; Henry Mays, one year; C. C. Culmer, one year; John W. Maxwell, September, 1888, to September, 1890; R. H. Minner, one year; M. R. Brown, one year; M. S. Anderson, one year; N. Evans, January 21, 1893, to September, 1895; Robert Warner, one year; M. H. Marvin, two years; J. S. Smith, two years; John Hanks, two years. The present pastor, Rev. William Park, came to the church in March, 1902. The membership of the society is now 135. Fully 1,500 members have been received into this church since its organization. The church property, which stands at the corner of Third and Ruby streets, is worth about $8,000.

The Presbyterian church was organized July 20, 1879, with six members. Rev. John R. Thompson was pastor. In the year 1884 the church purchased the public school building and ten lots at a cost of $1,300, having incorporated with J. Saladay, E. R. Leaming, I. N. Power, David Ford and S. C. Davidson as trustees. The building purchased served as church and academy for a number of years after which the present commodious house of worship was erected on the property at the corner of Fifth and Sprague streets, the building costing about $6,500. Since organization fully 400 members have been received into the church, the membership at present numbering about 160. The following pastors have served the church: J. R. Thompson, 1879-1881; James A. Laurie, 1884-1889; K. J. Dunkan, 1890-1892; F. D. V. Garetson, 1892-1893; Albert M. Crawford, 1893-1895; J. F. B. Stevenson, 1895-1897; J. V. Milligan, 1898-1901. The present pastor, Rev. A. F. McLean, began his pastorate in May, 1901.

Father Aloysius Parrodi, now of North Yakima, says that he held the first Roman Catholic church services in Kittitas county, the date being 1880. In that year he built a small frame church two miles south of Ellensburg. This church was attended alike by whites and Indians. Father Parrodi held mission services in the county until 1885 when he built the present commodious church building in the city at a cost of about $1,200. Since then the building has been much improved and enlarged. In 1887 Father Custer succeeded Father Parrodi, remaining in charge of the church interests in this county until 1895 when the present priest, Father J. Sweets took charge. The church is in a thriving condition.

The next church society to occupy the local field was undoubtedly the Christian. This society, known as the First Christian church of Ellensburg, was organized April 12, 1886, by Rev. J. P. McCorkle with the following charter members: A. C. Dawes, Mrs. Mary M. Tripe, Ella Tucker, W. M. Trisson, J. R. Tucker, W. A. Rader, Ellen Rader, N. Stone, J. M. Grissom, Mrs. E. Grissom, Mrs. P. C. Grissom, Mrs. N. Davidson, Mrs. M. Gibbs, Mrs. A. M. Church, Mrs. C. E. Pool, Mrs. A. Stone, Mrs. M. E. Stone, Mrs. F. F. Packwood. By the end of the month fully fifty persons were numbered among the members. The congregation at once secured lots and built the present sightly church at the corner of Ruby and Fourth streets, at a cost of about $1,500. In 1887 Rev. J. E. Denton, of Iowa, became the church's pastor and since that time the following have served: Revs. Finch, Sanderson, Norris, Walden, Hoyt, Kinney, Thomquist and McCallum. Rev. C. H. Hilton assumed charge March 27, 1904, coming from Blackwell, Oklahoma. The society has approximately 100 active members.

In 1887 a clergyman named Reese organized the First Baptist church of Ellensburg. The following year under the supervision of Rev. A. M. Allyn, the present church building was erected on Sprague street, at a cost of about $3,000. Succeeding Rev. A. M. Allyn came J. T. Hoyt, F. L. Sullivan, Charles Davis, Thomas B. Hughes, Bernard H. Moore, U. R. King, Frederick A. Agar, W. A. McCall, and, in January, 1901, the present pastor, Rev. Willis E. Pettibone, a graduate of Rochester Seminary, New York. The church now has sixty-three members. Its officers are: Trustees, William Woodham, H. L. Stowell, W. J. Payne, Dr. H. J. Felch, William McEwen; deacons, D. W. Morgan, L. Charlton; treasurer, H. L. Stowell; clerk, Lydia Charlton; superintendent Sunday school, W. J. Payne, the above named also constituting the advisory board of the church.

Grace Episcopal church, of which Rev. Alfred Lockwood is the present rector, was established about 1894 by Bishop Wells. Rev. Andreas Bard took charge of the society in the fall of 1896 and remained until the following May, when Mr. Lockwood came from one of the New England states. The pretty, substantial, little church building was erected in 1897 at a cost of about $2,500, and stands on the corner of Fourth and Sprague streets. Seventy-five members constitute the church body, besides which there is a guild of fifteen members.

The Central Christian church of Ellensburg was organized March 18, 1900, as a result of long and continued dissensions in the First church, which culminated on that day by the following members, forming eighty per cent. of the parent church, taking fellowship with the new society: Robert A. Turner, Thomas F. Barton, William T. Francis, Charles Van Buskirk, Mrs. Louis Sharp, A. J. Hodges, Mrs. A. J. Hodges, Mary E. Drew, Elizabeth Elliott, Cornelia Sharp, Emma Sharp, Mrs. W. M. Kingore, Maude Dunker, Emma Clymer, Mollie Van Alstine, Elizabeth Grissom, Mary M. Tripp, Mrs. S. U. Cannon, Mrs. W. H. Wilgus, Mrs. Minerva C. Turner, Mrs. Lottie Voice, Mrs. Tillie Post, Mrs. M.

B. Linder, Mrs. Nancy C. Barton, A. S. Randall, Mrs. A. S. Randall, Mrs. Charles Robinson, Eva Stewart, J. T. Brownfield, Mrs. Celia J. Brownfield, Hester Thomas, Mrs. Bernice Millikin, Mildred Van Buskirk, Thomas K. Hodges, T. J. Randall, Mrs. Etta Francis, Mrs. T. J. Randall, Atwell Martin, Mrs. R. A. Hodges, Mrs. Lillian Kenney, Mrs. A. C. Miller, J. M. Brockman, Mrs. Martha E. Brockman, Mrs. Lucy Hicks, Pearl R. Gage, Hazel Swasey, Mrs. John I. Packwood, M. E. Reigel, Mrs. Nancy J. Sharp, Mrs. M. E. Randall, Mrs. James H. Thompson, Mrs. Dot Kahler, Mrs. M. E. Darby, and Alexander Gage. Officers were elected as follows: Elders, T. J. Randall, Atwell Martin, Robert A. Turner and William T. Francis; deacons, Thomas F. Barton, J. T. Brownfield, Thomas K. Hodges; deaconesses, Mrs. Jessie Cannon, Mrs. Lottie Voice, Mrs. M. B. Linder; clerk, Charles Van Buskirk, assistant, J. T. Brownfield; treasurer, Thomas F. Barton; trustees, Robert A. Turner, William T. Francis and Mrs. W. M. Kilgore; all of whom are still serving except the last, whom W. H. Randolph succeeded. April 14, 1900, Rev. William M. Kenney was called to the pastorate of the church, the society having been duly incorporated by a committee consisting of Robert A. Turner and W. T. Francis. The congregation met successively in the old Congregational church, the Masonic temple and the G. A. R. hall, but in September, 1903, purchased the Mennonite church building on Ruby street, which is the church's present home. Rev. Joseph Deathridge succeeded Rev. W. M. Kenney as pastor in 1902, but was forced to resign last fall on account of sickness in his family. At present the congregation has no pastor, though arrangements have been made for calling one.

Besides the above mentioned church organizations, the Free Methodists and Mennonites are represented by small societies, which have held joint services for some time past.

The Ellensburg W. C. T. U. was organized in 1887, Mrs. Emily Hornbeck becoming its first president. At present there are forty members, whose officers are: President, Mrs. Elizabeth Fleming; vice presidents, Mrs. William Park, Mrs. W. E. Pettibone and Mrs. N. M. Helves; secretaries, Mrs. Edith A. Taylor and Miss Susan D. Howard; treasurer, Mrs. A. J. Bonney. Several years ago the union established a reading room in the Geddis block but the necessary support was lacking and the enterprise had to be abandoned. Recently through the efforts of the union and by the aid of city and county, a handsome drinking fountain, costing between $200 and $250, has been erected in the center of the road, corner Pearl and Fifth streets.

The Masonic fraternity in Ellensburg is represented by three lodges, Ellensburg Lodge No. 39, A. F. & A. M.; Ellensburg Chapter No. 11, R. A. M., and Temple Commandery, No. 5, K. T. Of the A. F. & A. M. lodge, J. H. Scott is Worshipful Master; W. A. Fishman is High Priest of the R. A. M., and Oliver Hinman is Eminent Commander of the Commandery, W. N. Westfall being secretary of all three branches. As is generally the case, the Masons were the first to organize a fraternal society in the Kittitas valley, the date being about 1879. An effort was made to obtain data concerning the early history of this lodge from at least two of its charter members and from others, but without success. In 1886, the date of the establishment of the chapter and the commandery, the lodges occupied rented quarters in a wooden building on the site of the Hotel Vanderbilt, but two years later a fine, two-story brick temple was erected on the corner of Pine and Fourth streets at a cost of several thousand dollars. This the great fire of 1889 completely destroyed, only a few current records being saved by H. M. Baldwin, who was then secretary. The Masons sold the land in 1889 and the following year built a new temple at a cost of $10,000, on Sixth street, between Main and Pearl, furnishing it sumptuously. But again adversity overtook the fraternity, the property being lost on a mortgage during the hard times. At present Masonic headquarters are established temporarily in the Club building.

Ellensburg Lodge No. 20, I. O. O. F., was instituted by G. T. McConnell, Grand Master of Washington, April 9, 1881, with the following charter members: Peter McCleary, W. J. Robbins, Joseph M. Stout, John Goodwin, S. L. Bates, Matthias Becker and Benjamin Ellenwood. The first home of this lodge was a two-story frame building situated on the northwest corner of Pearl and Third streets, occupying the site of the old stockade fort. Hon. John A. Shoudy and his wife donated the Odd Fellows a parcel of land 120 feet square in consideration of their erecting a building thereon, which they did in 1885. The fire of 1889 destroyed the building, and when the mortgage was paid off and other debts had been canceled, the Odd Fellows found themselves with just $500 in the treasury. Then came the general business depression, but the lodge was nevertheless able in 1901 to purchase the Maxey block, situated on Pine street in the business portion of the town. Since then it has acquired title to an additional lot adjoining the hall on the south, giving the lodge a tract 60x120 feet in size; this property is now worth about $10,000. In 1884 the lodge bought of C. A. Sanders the beautiful cemetery site on Craig's hill, the only cemetery in or near the city except that belonging to the Catholics. Ellensburg Encampment No. 16, was instituted March 31, 1890, by J. M. Swan, Grand Patriarch, with the following charter members: Walter J. Robbins, John J. Suver, A. C. Billings, William A. Stevens and Claude M. Morris. The next day Miriam Rebekah Lodge No. 25 was instituted, its charter membership being composed of W. A. Stevens, J. J. Suver, W. J. Robbins, Amos Smith, R. G. McKay, G. W. Carver, Rosa Carver, J. G. Olding, Mary J. Jackson, Kate B. Rego, L. A. Vincent, S. C. Billings, Emma R. Stevens, Asenath P. Smith, John B. Rego, O. P. Jackson, Elizabeth Olding, L. C. Wynegar, Carrie A. Gallia and E. P. Gallia. At present the principal officers of these lodges are: Ellensburg No. 20, with eighty-five members, Noble Grand, F. H. Butcher; Vice Grand, G. W. Tagg; recording and financial secretary, W. P. Hiddleston; treasurer, C. H. Stewart; Ellensburg Encampment, with fifty-two members, C. P., B. E. Romanc; H. P., P. W. Stenger; S. W., Peter Garner; J. W., George Manners; Scribe, W. J. Robbins; treasurer, R. B. Wilson; Miriam Rebekah, with sixty-five members, N. G., Miss Cecil Mack; V. G., Miss Amy Schindler; recording secretary, Miss Maud Gilmour; financial secretary, G. W. Tagg; treasurer, Mrs. Atha Becker.

Ellensburg Camp, No. 5,714, Modern Woodmen of America, was established September 24, 1898, with the following charter members: C. H. Christensen, W. P. Dewees, John Hoffman, William A. Hale, C. W. Ithrig, T. E. Jones, C. T. Kineth, Henry Kleinberg, W. B. Laswell, W. H. Offield, O. W. Pautzke, J. A. Richards, H. F. Ruthven and Arthur Wells. Now the camp has 115 members. Its officers are: Venerable Consul, O. W. Pautzke; Worthy Advisor, Edward C. Fleck; clerk, S. C. Boedcher; banker, H. C. Ackley; escort, J. W. Maler; chief forester, E. E. Baxter; sentry, H. C. Frost; watchman, W. H. Lewis, and physician, J. A. Mahan. Harmony Lodge No. 3,001, Royal Neighbors, was instituted March 24, 1902, with twenty-two members.

Fraternal Lodge No. 70, A. O. U. W., was instituted in 1896 with the following charter members: E. T. Wilson, H. M. Baldwin, Daniel Carver, J. H. Dixon, J. A. Malan, Philip Lewis, Henry Kleinberg, J. P. Becker, F. W. Pearce and T. J. Bissel. The lodge now has about sixty members. The officers at present are: P. M. W., W. F. Wallace; M. W., Odolon Caron; overseer, F. P. Hardwick; foreman, R. M. Shumacke; receiver, C. M. Morris; financier, H. M. Baldwin; recorder, James Laughlin. Cascade Lodge No. 37, Degree of Honor, was granted a charter by the grand lodge June 19, 1901, its charter membership comprising Mrs. Perry Cleman, Mrs. P. G. Fitterer, Mrs. Lillie M. Wirth, P. G. Fitterer, John Hoffman, Mrs. Rose Cummins, Mrs. Kate Coughlin, Mrs. Lottie Ackley, Mrs. M. M. Welty and Mrs. R. Shumacke.

A charter was granted Ellensburg Camp, No. 88, Woodmen of the World, September 30, 1891, the petition for such being signed by W. J. Robbins, O. J. Croup, C. A. Rousch, C. D. Rhodes, John C. McCauley, Charles J. Wilbur and S. Y. Shipman. The camp now has sixty-three members; its officers are: P. C. C., L. L. Seelye; C. C., James G. Boyle; A. L., W. J. Payne; clerk, W. J. Robbins; banker, T. J. Collier; escort, L. Raskins; watchman, R. L. Purdin; sentry, G. T. Atwood; physicians, J. C. McCauley, J. A. Mahan and H. J. Felch; managers, Lambert Raskins, W. O. Ames and Fred H.

Butcher. Alki Circle, No. 272, Women of Woodcraft, was organized in May, 1900. It has thirty members whose officers are: P. G. M., Mrs. J. A. Mahan; G. N., Mrs. Ida S. Robbins; advisor, Mrs. Frank Fitterer; clerk, Mrs. Margaret E. Clymer; banker, R. Lee Purdin; magician, Mrs. B. A. Gault; and attendant, Mrs. Estella Edwards.

Ellensburg Aerie, No. 120, Fraternal Order of Eagles, was organized February 10, 1901, by Grand Organizer E. P. Edsen, with fifty charter members. Its present officers are: P. W. P., W. C. Reece; W. P., M. E. Flynn; W. V. P., W. L. Smith; chaplain, Austin Mires; treasurer, Sam Pearson; physician, J. C. McCauley; secretary, Thomas F. Liddell; trustees, Austin Mires, W. C. Reece and E. J. Merryman.

Kittitas Lodge No. 923, Modern Brotherhood of America, is three years old; it was organized by F. Stanton, state organizer. The lodge is in a thriving condition, having an active membership of twenty-three with the following officers: President, W. A. Thomas; vice president, Mary E. Hill; secretary-treasurer, W. J. Boyd; chaplain, Marie E. Seal; doorkeeper, John E. Moen; sentinel, Levi Fortney; conductor, George Champie.

The Yeomen also have a new lodge in the city, its officers being: Foreman, O. Carson; M. of C., Edward Fleck; Corr., S. D. Boedcher; physician, Mrs. M. H. Shatswell; M. of A., F. G. Shakwell. Quite recently still another order organized a branch in Ellensburg, viz: the Improved Order of Red Men, Kittitas Tribe No. 26 being the name of the lodge instituted. A strong local organization also is maintained by the Knights of Pythias, regarding which no data is at hand.

Friday evening, April 25, 1884, Ellensburg Post No. 11, G. A. R., came into existence with eighteen members. The ceremonies were conducted by Capt. C. M. Holton, of Yakima City. The first officers and members of the post are given as follows in a newspaper of the period: Commander, J. L. Brown; senior vice commander, H. D. Merwin; junior vice commander, Samuel T. Packwood; surgeon, A. T. Mason; chaplain, J. D. Dammon; quartermaster, D. Ford; officer of the day, William Tillman; officer of the guard, B. Lewis; inside sentinel, J. J. Swett; sergeant major, H. H. Swasey; quartermaster sergeant, G. W. Carver; adjutant, J. C. Goodwin; John A. Shoudy, E. H. Love, J. W. Dixon, H. H. Davies, J. Wilson and J. B. Swett. This post adopted, as is the custom, the name of a well known veteran of the Civil war, the official title of the post becoming James Parsons Post No. 11. In 1898 a reorganization took place and the name was changed to David Farel Post. The present commander is W. H. O. Rear, and the adjutant, Amos Smith. One of the first fruits of the organization of a post in Ellensburg is thus recorded in the Kittitas Standard, June 7, 1884:

"For the first time in the history of the town, Decoration Day was observed here on Friday of last week. About noon all the stores in town closed and in the evening an entertainment was given under the auspices of the newly organized post of the G. A. R. at Elliott's hall. This was largely attended by our citizens. The oration delivered by Rev. James A. Laurie was replete with patriotic allusions and in keeping with the occasion. Sam Blumauer's recitation of 'Wounded to Death' was excellently rendered, while the same can be said of the various songs sung by the choir."

ROSLYN.

The black diamond is king in Roslyn. It is more than king; it is life itself. Around its discovery and exploitation is centered the history of the city's establishment and growth. Roslyn's future development appears to be wholly dependent upon the mining industry, but from all indications that support is by no means uncertain or temporary. Roslyn coal is known throughout the west as one of the best commodities of its kind on the market; for steaming purposes it has no superior and wherever it goes, it advertises the town, making the name Roslyn almost a household word.

The trip up Smith creek canyon, by the four miles of branch railway connecting Roslyn with the main line of the Northern Pacific at Cle-Elum, is made in a passenger car attached usually to a freight train. The roadbed follows the creek closely, traversing what was once a heavily timbered region. The train follows no regular schedule but comes and goes as best suits the convenience of the freight traffic,—a most aggravating arrangement at times.

The Roslyn coal fields were opened to the commercial world in the fall of 1886, though their discovery antedates that time by perhaps a few years, and small quantities of coal were taken out by pack horse and wagon during the early 'eighties. As related elsewhere in this volume, a corps of Northern Pacific coal experts visited the Smith creek region in May, 1886, and thoroughly prospected the uncovered ledges with a diamond drill. The results of their work were so encouraging that the same month a party of railway engineers surveyed a branch line from Cle-Elum to the scene, and active preparations were begun for installing a plant at the mines. Within a few weeks more than a hundred men were at work developing the veins.

Through operation of an act of congress, the railroad company already owned every alternate section of land in the region embracing the mining district, and by various means the company acquired the major portion of the remaining lands surrounding the mines. Included among the railroad lands was section seventeen, township twenty north, range fifteen east, upon the south half of which, at the very mouth of the mines, Logan M. Bullitt platted the site of Roslyn. The dedication and filing papers were signed in Minnesota, September 22, 1886, and filed for record in Kittitas county eight days later. At that time Mr. Bullitt was the vice president of the Northern Pacific Coal Company and there is but little doubt that in plating the town he was acting for that corporation. The site, which was surveyed by E. J. Rector, C. E., was composed of eleven blocks; the width of the streets was fixed at sixty feet, except in the case of Pennsylvania avenue, which was made eighty feet wide, and Utah and Montana avenues and Third street, which were made half the regular width. December 13th following, Mr. Bullitt platted Brookside addition, a small tract of three blocks lying northeast of the original townsite and in the same township. Only one other addition was ever laid out, the Dale addition, a small one adjoining the original townsite on the southwest; it was platted by Mr. Bullitt August 20, 1887.

Regarding the christening of Roslyn, the following rather romantic and facetious account appeared in the Roslyn Sentinel issued March 1, 1895:

"A very pretty, if not exciting, little romance," reads the story, "is associated with the early history of this camp, and in fact it was through this circumstance that this promising little city received its name. On the far away Delaware's shores, midst the sand hills, peach orchards and blue-blooded 'skeeters,' nestles a little hamlet which was christened Roslyn over a century ago. The inhabitants were of primitive stock, high-bred and gilt-edged, and the cultured daughters of these ancient households were the special objects of the adoration of numerous enterprising young men in the neighboring cities. In this aristocratic retreat there dwelt a bright, handsome and vivacious maiden who was particularly dear to the heart of a brave and sturdy young man who was penetrating this wild Northwest in 1886 in search of fame and fortune. This gentleman was Logan M. Bullitt, one of our earliest pioneers. It fell to the lot of Mr. Bullitt to name this camp, and it was an opportunity that he had longed for. After mature deliberation, he christened the town Roslyn, August 10, 1886, after the town in which his loved one dwelled. The event was duly celebrated and the decision made public by a bulletin in the shape of a board on which the name had been inscribed with a pine coal. The bulletin was nailed to a large pine tree which stood on the site of Patrick's business property. Whether Mr. Bullitt afterward realized the delicate hopes he fondly entertained in the early days of Roslyn we know not, but if his fortunes in love were as fickle as Roslyn's career has been checkered, he has certainly had a very interesting time.

"Some little doubt exists, however, as to the manner in which Roslyn gained its name, and it may be well to state that another report credits Mr. Bullitt with christening the camp after a country seat belonging to an intimate New York friend. In either event the name is appropriate, and, if in the future the same measure of success attends it as has been meted out to its founders, peace, happiness and prosperity will be its portion."

Of course the opening of the mines attracted great numbers of business men, promoters and laborers, though the powerful influence of the Northern Pacific Coal Company, directed as it was toward the upbuilding of a substantial industrial center, was welded with fairly satisfying results against the parasitic, reckless class which usually infest a new mining camp. The camp has had its rough elements, to be sure, and has from time to time suffered from disturbances of a more or less serious nature, but it was not until years after its founding that the turbulent spirits gained a temporary sway.

The first business buildings to be erected in the new business center were a general store and a saloon, built and opened by the Coal Company in August. These frame buildings stood at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and First street, diagonally across from each other, the store occupying the site of the present company building. A desire to regulate the liquor traffic induced the company to establish the saloon, which was the only one allowed in the town. All deeds to city property contain a clause prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors thereon. For several years the company's saloon was maintained without outside interference or competition, but at last some individual opened a drinking house on private land near the city. The result was the downfall of the corporation saloon. Other drinking places were soon opened in the surrounding woods, creating so great a nuisance that eventually the company was forced to permit the liquor interests to enter the town, where they could be in some measure regulated.

The company also erected a large hotel on the corner opposite the store. This pioneer hostelry, which was subsequently destroyed by fire together with the store and most of the other pioneer buildings, was capable of accommodating one hundred men.

The next business to be established, says Isaac Brown, a pioneer of 1886, was W. M. Atwood's general store, which stood on Pennsylvania avenue near First street. Then a boarding house was opened a little further up the avenue, John Clemmer established a notion and clothing store on the site now occupied by Berg's saloon, and two livery barns were built, one on Pennsylvania avenue west of Second street by Patrick Henry, and one on Second street by Knuppenberg & Kennedy. All of these buildings, together with a great number of rude dwelling houses, were built of lumber sawed by the company's mill. These business enterprises, the mine and its surface works, a few professional men including Dr. W. H. Harris, the coal company's officers and employees, and a large transient population formed the hustling community which, about the 1st of December, 1886, welcomed the iron horse. Sometime in the fall a train load of Italian miners reached camp and fully 400 men spent the winter of 1886-7 there.

Among the prominent arrivals of 1887 were Bonse Bros., Swain & Haight and William Lombardini, general merchants; and L. W. Kribs, who built and conducted the Cascade hotel. Within nine months from the time of its founding, the town had a population of more than 500.

Roslyn entered the year 1888, one of the most memorable of its history, with a population of between 1,000 and 1,200 people and in a highly flourishing condition. The city's first calamity was experienced that year, June 22, 1888. From some unknown cause, about four o'clock in the afternoon fire broke out in the block between First and Second streets, above the railroad, and within a very short time the entire business portion of the town was in ashes. The loss was a heavy one, estimated at $100,000, with little insurance, owing to the fact that insurance companies were asking a ten per cent. premium at the time. The fire worked a great hardship upon many struggling merchants, who lost their all. But new business houses immediately arose over the charred remains of their predecessors and in a comparatively short period business had resumed the even tenor of its way. As work was abundant and wages above the average, the early years of Roslyn were exceedingly prosperous ones. But the fall of 1888 brought a serious setback to the town. In August of that year the Knights of Labor, who had been inaugurating a series of strikes in various parts of the country, organized a strike in the Roslyn camp also. To give details here of this conflict between organized labor and the coal company would be to repeat needlessly, but the effects, though felt in other parts of the county, were naturally more immediate and pervading in Roslyn than anywhere else. One noticeable result, even at this date, is the presence of a large number of negroes in the camp, caused by the importation of representatives of the colored race to fill the places of the striking miners. Of course all citizens of Roslyn suffered, during the pendency of the strike, from the interruption of business and the general uncertainty, even peril, of the situation. At one time martial law was threatened.

Temporarily passing the details connected with the incorporation of Roslyn as a city in 1889, we may say that the early 'nineties were not on the whole particularly prosperous ones in Roslyn, though from a newspaper of the time we learn that the pay roll for December, 1890, was $84,000, the miners working full time. The succeeding month this roll fell to $63,000, and in March, 1891, by reason of the loss of the Union Pacific contracts, the company was able to operate the mines only four days each week. This unsatisfactory condition prevailed most of the time until November, 1892, when mine No. 3 was re-opened. Then the monthly pay roll speedily reached $54,000 and all winter it steadily increased.

Meanwhile, however, the community suffered from two memorable disasters which will live long in state history. The first in time and importance was the terrible mine explosion in the slope by which the lives of forty-five of the city's best known citizens were suddenly blotted out. This dire catastrophe, which spread sadness and desolation throughout the region, occurred about noon May 9, 1892. Its story has been quite fully told in another chapter, but a few details may here be added. For a time the shock of the disaster was overwhelming, but the sufferers rallied quickly and made the best of their bad situation. Nobly was their appeal for aid responded to by a sympathetic populace. A relief committee was organized and within a few days collected in cash $7,000 from abroad and more than $2,000 in Roslyn, besides supplies of various kinds. The Knights of Pythias alone raised several hundred dollars. Early in June, $8,000 was distributed among the surviving relatives of the dead, sixty-four per cent. going to the orphans and thirty-six per cent. to the widows. Subsequently another smaller débatement was made. Suits instituted against the coal company were compromised by the payment of an immense sum of money to relatives of the deceased.

Hardly had the excitement caused by the explosion subsided before the citizens were again intensely aroused by a bank robbery in their midst—one of the boldest and most successful ever consummated in the state. Its complete history is also told elsewhere in this volume. September 24, 1892, was the date of this exciting event. The responsibility for this crime was never absolutely fixed upon anyone, though a small fortune was spent in searching for the robbers and two famous trials in the Kittitas county courts of suspected persons resulted.

As elsewhere stated, this robbery and the financial stringency combined with misfortunes of one kind and another so weakened Ben E. Snipes & Company's bank at Roslyn that Friday, June 9, 1893, the institution closed its doors. The failure carried away nearly $100,000 belonging to Roslyn citizens, almost the entire monetary accumulations of the camp. The blow was a heavy one and affected the community's financial condition more than any disaster that has befallen it before or since. Creditors' certificates of indebtedness are practically all the depositors ever received in lieu of their savings.

Scarcely had the immediate shock of this collapse passed ere the city arrived at another critical period in its history. May 1, 1894, the company's miners and drivers showed their disapproval of a reduced wage scale by the inauguration of a strike, which lasted several months, greatly depressing all business and working innumerable hardships upon the community.

The leading business of Roslyn in 1895, ac-ording to the Roslyn Sentinel of March 1st, were the following:

Charles Adam, mayor, building contractor, who established the Roslyn planing mill in 1889; Archibald Patrick, mine owner and contractor; Roslyn Mercantile Company, Melvin Marx and Davis Strauss proprietors; W. M. Atwood, general merchandise; H. P. Fogh, general merchandise; Greenberg Brothers, dry goods; Mossop Kitchen, livery; Swain & Haight, general merchandise; Schlotfeldt Brothers & Sides, meat market; Sides & Hartman, L. F. McConihe and John Corgiat, restaurants; Roslyn Brewing Company, composed of A. F. Kuhl, Ernest and Charles D. Duerrwacher and Schlotfeldt Brothers; W. A. Mohr, of the general merchandise firm of Bonsel Brothers & Mohr, postmaster; Carrollo & Genasci, general merchandise; Henry Rachor, cigar factory; Joseph Denny, barber; Fosberg & Duerrwacher, successors to Thomas Lund, merchants; L. W. Kribs, building contractor, postmaster from 1888 to 1892; Dr. W. H. Harris, Dr. J. H. Lyon, physicians; E. E. Wager, city attorney; Henry Smith, justice of the peace; superintendent of schools, Prof. J. J. Charlton; Louis D. Campbell, Samuel Mills, Brown Brothers, Henry Brothers, William Van Buren & Son, A. Perona, Steven Potheary, Thomas Cadwell, M. Jorogeson, Mrs. Boyd, Mrs. Bryant, Louis Grossmiller, Samuel Isaac, T. M. Jones, George Koppen, Daniel Hannah, Robert Scobie, Christopher Meneghel, Edward J. Hanlan, Giovanni & Buffo, and Berg Brothers; besides whom the Sentinel gives us the list of the Northern Pacific Coal Company's officials: General manager, John Kangley; assistant general manager, Thomas Cooper, successor to H. C. Lytle; superintendent at Roslyn, George Harrison, who succeeded Alexander Ronald in 1888; assistant superintendents, Robert Pettigrew, John Shaw; superintendents at mine No. 3, Ronald, George Forsythe; clerk and paymaster, John L. Taggard, serving since 1888; assistant, Walter S. Lytle; manager supply house, A. L. Sowers; traffic manager, W. P. Morgan; assistant, John D. Clemmer; veterinary surgeon, William Thompson; check weighmen, James Heron and John Donovan.

In August and as late as December, 1896, the Roslyn mines were being operated only one and a half or two days a week, but during the closing days of that year the clouds of trouble and depression which had overhung the city for so long a time were dispelled, and the sun of prosperity was once more permitted to shine. The period of good times, which had its inception then, still lasts, making it possible for the mining region and the town to enjoy an uninterrupted development. It was during 1896 that B. F. Bush came to Roslyn as manager of the coal company's operations. He at once began planning larger things for the coal region, and the town and country have enjoyed the fruits of his liberal policy and well directed activity in the management of their great and only industry. Soon after entering upon his duties, Mr. Bush increased the number of working days to six in each week and still the productive power of the plant was severely taxed to fill the orders that came in. From that time until the present, with but a few insignificant intervals, Roslyn has resounded with the hum of industry, and the magnificent monthly pay roll has brought prosperity and plenty to the toilers and their families. The full dinner pail, the fat pocketbook, and the comfortable home have been the Roslyn miner's companions for the past seven years.

However, this long, prosperous period has not been without some shadows which have cast their depressing gloom over the community. The most notable tragedy during the past eight years was the brutal murder, within a few feet of his own doorstep, on Thursday night, March 19, 1896, of Dr. J. H. Lyon. The victim of this foul deed was among the earliest pioneers of the camp, was company physician there for many years, and one of the county's most prominent and popular citizens. Rain clouds made the night one of unusual darkness and the murderers must have lain in wait for the doctor, as his body was found shortly after he had parted from Samuel Isaacs, a merchant, with whom Dr. Lyon had walked home. Death resulted from a fractured skull, the deceased having been struck twice at the base of the brain with a blunt weapon resembling a table leg, which was found near the scene of the crime covered with blood and hair. Robbery was not the object of the murder, as Dr. Lyon's pocketbook and jewelry were found undisturbed upon his person.

The news of the murder created intense excitement at home and horror throughout the state, as the deceased had a large circle of friends and acquaintances and was prominent in society and in political affairs. The citizens of Roslyn at once offered a reward of $400 for the arrest and conviction of the murderer, the city offered $300, the governor of the state $500, and Kittitas county, $300, making in all a total reward of $1,500. A most determined effort was made by the authorities to apprehend the thug, or thugs. Suspicion fell upon two miners, brothers, who were known to have made threats against Dr. Lyon, charging him with having been responsible for the death of a third brother. On the strength of slight evidence and against the advice of Detective D. W. Simmons, the Roslyn authorities arrested the men. They were discharged at a preliminary examination held March 25th. The cunning of the criminal baffled all efforts to discover him, and no further arrests were ever made, so the mystery enshrouding one of the blackest crimes in the state's history still remains unsolved.

In 1896, also, during the month of December, diptheria laid its clutch on Roslyn's population and by the 23d there had been three deaths out of eight cases reported. The schools were closed, church services discontinued and all public assemblages prohibited for a considerable length of time. Inclement weather aided the disease in obtaining a foothold and only by the most persistent, skillful efforts was it finally conquered. Fortunately, the number of fatal cases was very small.

Again, late in the fall of 1900, Roslyn experienced an invasion by contagious disease. This time the inhabitants were attacked by that light form of smallpox which swept the country upon the return or our troops from the Orient. The city council, November 4th, called Dr. Bean, of Ellensburg, two Seattle and two Spokane physicians for consultation. They concurred in pronouncing the disease smallpox. Subsequently Drs. Simonton, Sloan and Porter, of Roslyn, disagreed with the other physicians and Dr. Mohrman, also a resident physician, upheld the report of the foreign physicians. However, all agreed that the disease resembled smallpox, was contagious and that stringent measures should be adopted to prevent its spread. Two pest houses were erected, a large supply of disinfectants was ordered and Dr. Porter, city health officer, and Marshal Frank Haight were instructed to enforce a quarantine. Twelve special officers were placed on the police force. The schools were closed and public meetings suppressed. In all there were several hundred cases reported, the large number being principally due to the unusually poor sanitary condition of the city, but fortunately the death rate was exceedingly small.

The year 1890 was a year of extensive building operations in Roslyn. Fully 150 residences were erected within six months; also a handsome Presbyterian church. The Northwestern Improvement Company, which succeeded the Northern Pacific Coal Company, 1898, laid new side tracks and improved the mine works with the result that in August, 1899, twenty cars of coal daily were being taken out of the main shaft.

The city of Roslyn has been incorporated twice—once in territorial days and again since Washington has been a state. The first incorporation took place in the spring of 1880 and was occasioned by the community's desire to install a water system. Under the terms of a general territorial act approved by the governor, February 2, 1888, providing for the incorporation of towns and villages, a petition signed by B. P. Shefflette, J. E. Thomas, Isaac Brown, George H. Brown, Henry Smith, John Abrams, C. R. Bonsel, I. Bonsel, P. Laurendeau, Isaac Harris, John Berg and 115 other taxpayers residing in section seventeen, township twenty north, range fifteen east, was presented to Judge L. B. Nash of the fourth district, asking for the incorporation of section seventeen. The judge considered the validity of the petition, as required by law, determined that it was signed by a majority of taxpayers in the district and on the same day that it was presented, February 4, 1889, proclaimed Roslyn an incorporated town. He named the following trustees: Isaac Brown, chairman; William A. Moore, James Graham, John Dalton and Charles Miller. Immediately the machinery of local government was put into motion. Subsequently Mr. Brown resigned from the board to become the town's first marshal. However, the validity of the law delegating incorporating power to any branch of the government except the legislative was contested about this time and the act decided to be unconstitutional. This decree nullified Roslyn's incorporation and prevented the sale of the bond issue.

The organization of the state in 1889 resulted in the adoption by the legislature of a general incorporation law under which Roslyn was re-incorporated in April, 1890, as a city of the third class.

Meanwhile, the water proposition demanded immediate solution, for the lack of an abundance of pure water was resulting in a scourge of typhoid fever, as many as a dozen cases in a single house being reported. The town was also without adequate fire protection. To improve the situation somewhat Road Supervisor Kennedy used the district's poll tax to pay for making an excavation for a pipe line and by special taxation and the securing of credit, the townspeople procured the necessary pipe and other material. The springs at the head of Smith creek were tapped and a pressure of eighty pounds to the square inch secured. This system did faithful duty until 1898, when a pump was installed on the Cle-Elum river, two miles southwest of the city, and a six-inch pipe line laid to convey the water to a reservoir on Smith creek, just north of the city. This reservoir has a capacity of two million gallons and is built of logs, masonry and earth. An additional pump was placed on the river in 1901, and last fall an eight-inch pipe line was laid to the reservoir, these improvements costing at least $7,000. Steel pipe is used. During the summer months the reservoir is kept full by the springs, and the operation of the pumps is unnecessary. It is estimated that the whole system cost $12,000.

A city building was erected on Pennsylvania avenue in 1890, which is still used for office and fire department purposes. The fire equipment, consisting of hose carts and hook and ladder truck, is manned by a company of forty-five volunteer firemen. Be it said to the city's credit that, aside from outstanding current expense warrants, it has no indebtedness. The present corps of officers are: Mayor, William Adams; clerk, Thomas Ray; treasurer, Anthony Stoves; councilmen, George K. Sides, Edward Berg, Joseph Hancock, S. C. K. Graves, William Harts, Adolph Peterson and William Craig; attorney, W. J. Welsh; health officer, John Meyers; chief fire department, Andrew Attleson; day marshal, William Galloway; night marshal, James Wright; police judges, J. S. Simon, R. Justham. There are two justices of the peace in the precinct, Henry Smith and John Briggs.

The city's present population is approximately 4,000 people, a majority of whom are Slavs, Italians, negroes and Germans, though the native American race is dominant. Of this number the coal company employs 1,500 in mining and handling its 90,000-ton output of coal a month.

The city's most prominent social institution is the Roslyn Athletic Club, which has a membership of 200 ladies and gentlemen. This association owes its establishment to the generosity of Manager B. F. Bush, of the Northwestern Improvement Company, who sought thus to provide the young men with an attractive, moral place of recreation. In the fall of 1902 he made his employees the proposition that he would build and equip a club house if they would incorporate an association, take charge of the building, and as soon as possible repay him, without interest. The men, under the leadership of Storekeeper D. S. Kinney, accepted the offer. Mr. Bush erected on First street a handsome, two-story building, costing at least $3,000, and equipped it with a bowling alley, gymnasium apparatus, etc., at a further expense of approximately $2,000. At first only company men were admitted to membership, but this restriction has been generously removed and now all whose presence is approved by the club may enjoy the privileges at a nominal annual fee. The club has decided to rent the building of Mr. Bush, who was called away in 1903 to assume the general management of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, instead of purchasing it, and as this plan is acceptable to the owner, it will be carried out for the present. Only a nominal rent is asked.

The first school ever held in Roslyn was taught by D. G. C. Baker, in the spring of 1887. A vacant dwelling on Dakota street was placed at the district's disposal by the Coal company and in this schoolhouse, fairly equipped, a spring term was taught successfully, between forty and fifty pupils attending. A man named Gallagher is also said to have taught a small school in 1887. For a considerable time the money for school purposes was obtained principally by subscriptions from the miners, who never failed to contribute generously each pay day. Isaac Brown was chairman of the first school board. In 1888 the district built a small frame schoolhouse on the hill near the Catholic church, the building being 30 by 50 feet and divided into two rooms. This property is now occupied by Judge Henry Smith as a dwelling. The school rapidly outgrew the building, necessitating the erection in 1890 of a four-room schoolhouse costing $6,000. This building was subsequently enlarged by the addition of two rooms. But still the school grew. Another handsome, six-room building was erected alongside the old one in 1890 and these two schoolhouses, together with the old Presbyterian church, are even now taxed to their utmost to accommodate the boys and girls of Roslyn. The two schoolhouses, costing perhaps $13,000, are well equipped and substantial and an ornament to the city. A nine months' school is taught, which has an average attendance of 470 pupils, the actual enrollment being 634 last year. The personnel of the present teaching force is as follows: Superintendent, W. D. Burton; principal high school, G. I. Wilson; principal grammar school, O. H. Kerns; Elizabeth Wills, Agnes Norby, Elizabeth Jones, Mary Pihl, Carrie Mitchell, Ione Grindrod, Emma Shull, Josephine Pihl, May Mills and Inez Webber.

There are eight church organizations in Roslyn—the Presbyterian, Rev. William Smith, pastor; Baptist, no pastor at present; colored Baptist, Rev. J. P. Brown, pastor; Catholic, Father Kornte; the Methodist and colored Methodist, without pastors, at present; Episcopal, also without a rector; and the Latter Day Saints, also without a pastor. Some of the churches without ministers now expect to fill the vacancies in the near future. The Presbyterians own the finest building, a new one built last year at a cost of several thousand dollars. This church has also the only pipe organ in the county. The Episcopal church was established by Bishop Wells in 1895. The society purchased the old Baptist (colored) church building in the spring of 1898 and removed it to its present location. A rectory was built that same fall, both buildings being situated on lots donated by the coal company. The whole property is probably worth $2,500. At present there are about forty-five members, nearly all of whom are English miners. The Rev. Alfred Lockwood, of Ellensburg, has been in charge of the Roslyn church for six years and occasionally holds services there. A thriving guild is maintained. The Catholics built their church in 1887.

Roslyn is 2,222 feet above the sea level, in the very heart of the foothills, which give the region beautiful surroundings and one of the healthiest climates to be found anywhere in the state. The great Cle-Elum precious mineral district lies within easy reach of the city, connected with it by a good wagon road. When this rich region is thoroughly opened the city of Roslyn will be among the first communities to be benefited, for it is very closely allied with the surrounding mining districts, with which it has stage connection during the summer months.

Of half a dozen newspapers established at different times in Roslyn only one survives, the Cascade Miner, a weekly owned and edited by Randall Brothers. The Miner is an eight-page quarto, ably edited, tastily printed, and in every respect a credit to the community.

Roslyn's business interests are of course very great, the yearly volume running well into the millions, if we include the value of the coal. The city's pay roll alone exceeds $1,000,000 per annum.

The coal company maintains a general store, occupying the largest and most substantial building in the city, which carries a stock exceeding in value $125,000. D. S. Kinney is in charge of this mammoth establishment. Other business houses are:

General merchandise, D. A. Brown & Company; meat markets, Sides Brothers & Hartman, Roslyn Meat market; drugs, Roslyn pharmacy, A. Stoves, proprietor; hardware, paints, etc., William Rees; dry goods, notions, W. J. Saxley; clothing, Gus Lindstrom; millinery, Mrs. Elizabeth Bostock, Miss Anna Kuhl; groceries, Carrollo & Genasci, Klarich & Miller; brewery, Roslyn Brewing Company; sawmill, Northwestern Improvement Company; candies, Wilfred Ward; undertaking, Adam & Stoves; cigars, Simon Justham, John Briggs, John Pope, John Buffo; bakery, German, John Bardesono, proprietor; hotels, Halstead, Mrs. Charles Jones, proprietress, the Roslyn, Nicholas Rees, proprietor; lodging houses, the California, Mrs. DeNato, proprietress, Stephen Potheary, James Lane; boarding house, Mrs. Weatherly; blacksmith shop, Williams Brothers; contractors, Banister Brothers, William Adam, R. P. Lumsden & Company, J. Feigle; jewelry, T. J. Thomas, Leonard Gabler; restaurants, the Gem, Mrs. Wesley, proprietress, Mrs. Ellen Scott, John Buffo; photograph gallery, I. A. Kautz; attorneys at law, Daniel B. Payne, Welsh & Moore; physicians, Drs. George Sloan, L. L. Porter, A. C. Simonton, and E. Mohrmann; postmaster, James Lane; Northern Pacific agent, W. P. Morgan; eighteen saloons; local organizations of all the leading fraternities.

CLE-ELUM.

The thriving little city situated on the upper Yakima river at the junction of the main line of the Northern Pacific railway with its Roslyn branch bears the musical name Cle-Elum, and is the third town in size and importance within the boundaries of Kittitas county. Four years ago it had less than 300 inhabitants; today it boasts a population of 1,500, and surely there is no more prosperous community in the whole Evergreen state.

Few towns in Washington are more advantageously situated with reference to rich natural resources, accessibility, climate and beautiful scenery than Cle-Elum. It lies on the northern bank of the river at the base of the foothills. The townsite is rectangular in form, perhaps a third of a mile wide and a mile and a half in length, hemmed in on all sides by pretty, refreshing groves of pine and fir which ultimately blend into the great forest areas of the Cascade range. The valley winds between high, timbered hills on the north and east and a ragged, pine-clad flank of the main range on the south and west, snow-crested during most of the year. At Cle-Elum the valley swells out into a sort of wooded amphitheater, on the northern side of which lies the town. In the poetic language of the red man, who long since bade the region a fond farewell, Cle-Elum, or "Tle-el-lum," as they pronounce it, signifies "swift water." Cle-Elum river, from which the town's name is derived, debouches into the Yakima about three miles above the city. The Indian name has been appropriately bestowed, for the Cle-Elum is a typical mountain stream, rushing seaward with a current that none but the dauntless trout could hope to stem. And neither is it inappropriate to remark here that the upper Yakima water courses in season are alive with millions of the speckled beauties, furnishing unexcelled fishing facilities to Walton's patient disciples. The purest of mountain water, good drainage and a dry, clear, ozone-freighted atmosphere combine to make the locality one of the healthiest spots in the country. The climate at Cle-Elum is what might be expected at the base of the range—rather long winter seasons and delightful summers, but the temperature is even and the success of an immense rosary near the town is a sufficient proof of the presence of an unusually large number of sunny days.

The fertile valley lands, as yet only partly developed into farms and gardens, and the foothills, as is well known, are underlain with the greatest bituminous coal deposits yet discovered in the west, while within easy distance is an extensive mineral district where gold, copper, iron and other metals are found. The whole region in its primeval condition was mantled by a sombre covering of forest. Traversing the upper Yakima to its source on the summit is the Northern Pacific's transcontinental railway system, tapping this immense mineral storehouse. Over this steel highway pass six regular passenger and a dozen freight trains daily. Cle-Elum is also the gateway of the Roslyn traffic. An hour's travel westward from Cle-Elum carries the passenger across the summit of the range into the luxuriant timber stretches of the Pacific slope; fifty minutes' travel southeastward takes the traveler to Ellensburg in the heart of the renowned Kittitas valley. Truly, Cle-Elum enjoys a convenient and favored location.

When all the upper region was an unbroken wilderness, pierced only by the trails of the nomadic Indian and the roving prospector, when Kittitas county was yet an unsummed scheme, when the Northern Pacific had barely started on its journey coastward from the Columbia river, the corner-stone of Cle-Elum was laid by Thomas L. Gamble. Judge Gamble, who still resides in Cle-Elum and still takes an active interest in its municipal affairs, visited the upper valley in April, 1883, searching for desirable government land, and on the 28th of that month staked out the quarter-section which now forms the eastern portion of Cle-Elum's site. The hazel brush grew dense; massive pines and firs in dark thickets reared skyward their stately heads; the nearest settlers were miles away, but the doughty veteran and pioneer blazed out his lines and commenced the clearing of Hazel-Dell farm. His claim is recorded as the southeast quarter of section twenty-six, township twenty north, range fifteen east, and was the first one taken in that township. By hard work he succeeded in breaking a small patch of land that summer and getting it planted to vegetables. This garden spot returned him enough to supply his own wants and those of the few travelers who passed his cabin, which primitive structure stood in what is now Third street, just below Judge Gamble's present fine home. It remained in existence until three years ago, a monument to pioneer days.

The second character in the history of Cle-Elum and the man who is responsible more than anyone else for the existence of the town is Walter J. Reed, an old Pennsylvania friend of Mr. Gamble and one of North Yakima's founders. These old friends accidentally met at the Yakima land office in April, 1883. There they entered into an agreement that each should assist the other in obtaining land. Accordingly Mr. Gamble notified his friend at once of the existence of an excellent tract just west of the pioneer homestead. June 4, 1883, Mr. Reed filed a pre-emption claim to this quarter section, and became the second settler in the township. The Reed cabin, which stood on Third street near Pennsylvania avenue, was erected in the early days of September.

The ensuing year brought considerable travel into the region, due to the discovery of large outcroppings of coal, which made it reasonable to suppose that there were extensive deposits somewhere in the vicinity. Gamble's snug little cabin served most of these travelers as a place for refreshment and rest. The railroad engineers reached Cle-Elum's site in August, so his diary records, and during their stay in the vicinity boarded with Mr. and Mrs. Reed in their primitive pioneer home. Late in the year an unusual number of homesteaders and speculators reached the settlement and commenced acquiring possession of the surrounding country, but still there was no town when the new year dawned.

The year 1886, which was in so many respects a vitally important one for the upper Yakima valley, witnessed the formal establishment of the town, however. It was then that the existence of a rich, bituminous coal field was definitely proven and that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company entered upon the exploitation of the same. The discovery of these mines undoubtedly led to the immediate acceptance of the Stampede pass route across the Cascades, and early in the spring hundreds of men were at work grading the road bed up the Yakima river. By April the crews reached the mouth of Smith creek—a small stream heading above Roslyn and in early days flowing through the Reed claim. A corps of engineers also began work surveying a branch line up Smith creek to the new mining camp.

The point of junction of the two roads was the natural place for a town, and Mr. Reed, quickly realizing this, on July 26th, platted and dedicated sixty-five acres of his pre-emption claim as a townsite. Thomas Johnson was in partnership with Reed in this venture. They adopted the name Cle-Elum, by which the settlement had already come to be known. June 20th Mr. Johnson had brought up his large saw-mill from Wilson creek, and set it on the river above the townsite, thereby increasing the population of the neighborhood by forty or fifty.

The mill was engaged principally in manufacturing lumber for the railroad company. It produced as high as 40,000 feet a day, and furnished nearly all the timber used in the construction of the Columbia river bridge at Pasco.

By the terms of his agreement with Mr. Reed, Mr. Johnson obligated himself to secure the establishment upon the former's land of a railway depot. This he was enabled to do easily on account of his influence with Northern Pacific officials, and in due time the depot building was erected. Mr. Reed anticipated the rush of transients by erecting, in July, on the corner of Railroad street and Pennsylvania avenue, the hotel which bears his name, and which, though now greatly enlarged and improved, is still accommodating the traveling public. It was even at that time a well furnished frame structure, two and a half stories in height and sixty by thirty-two feet in floor dimensions.

Under the terms of the Reed-Johnson agreement, U. G. Bogue and H. S. Huson, Northern Pacific locating engineers, were given half the proceeds from the sale of lots during the first year; Logan M. Bullitt, of the Northern Pacific Coal Company, also came in for a small share. October 11, 1886, the long expected railroad train reached Cle-Elum and in November the iron horse began its journey over the Roslyn branch toward the bustling mining center at its terminus.

Late in the summer of 1886, two general stores were established at Cle-Elum—those of Thomas Johnson and Theron Stafford. Johnson's store, the pioneer, was housed in a large frame building on Pennsylvania avenue opposite the Reed hotel, while Theron Stafford, a former merchant of Teanaway City, removed his stock into the frame building now occupied by Kellogg's bank, Pennsylvania avenue. In September, F. J. Cummings opened a blacksmith shop and a livery stable, the latter of which was subsequently occupied by Thomas Brothers. In October, a third general store was established, that of Wakefield & Tillman. It stood at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and First street. Oscar Cash also opened a blacksmith shop some time in the fall, and before Christmas several saloons, restaurants and other accessory business institutions were likewise opened to the public. It is almost needless to remark that at this period in Cle-Elum's history its population was decidedly typical of a western boom town and the daily and nightly life of its people a strenuous one. There are, however, no serious crimes chargeable to the account of the town during its earliest history.

With the growth of the region's population, came a demand for a school. In order to secure the formation of a district, it was necessary that twelve families should reside within the limits of the proposed district. Now at this time families were rather scarce in eastern Kittitas but by extending the boundaries sufficiently the required dozen could be secured. The county commissioners on recommendation of D. G. C. Baker, decided to overcome legal obstacles, so, on August 2, 1886, established the desired district with the following boundaries:

"Commencing at the southeast corner of section twenty-five, township twenty, range fifteen east, running south to the Yakima river, following said river west and northerly as a boundary to the mouth of the Cle-Elum river, taking the top of the dividing ridge between the Yakima and Cle-Elum rivers and following the said divide northerly to the township line; thence along said township line to the divide between the Cle-Elum lake or river and Teanaway river; thence easterly and south on said township line to the southeast corner of section twenty-five, township twenty north, range fifteen east, the place of beginning."

Messrs. Reed and Gamble, who were appointed directors, immediately transformed the old Reed cabin into a schoolhouse and furnished it with benches, blackboard, etc. The district had no taxpayers at that time, but Mr. Reed furnished board to the teacher at his hotel, while the salary of the pedagogue was paid by subscription. The attendance ranged from half a dozen to thirty. The Reed cabin continued to serve as a schoolhouse until 1890, when a more commodious building was erected.

November 2, 1886, Cle-Elum precinct, which then included Roslyn, held its first local election, choosing G. W. Campfield as constable and H. C. Witters as justice of the peace. Witters was later succeeded by T. L. Gamble, who for ten years faithfully discharged the duties of that important though comparatively humble judicial office.

It is estimated that by the first of the year, 1887, fully 400 people were living upon the town-site, engaged in railroad work, mining and catering in various ways to the wants of the public. Among the permanent stores established during the year was the confectionery of D. B. Burcham. The year was a prosperous one for Cle-Elum and marks the period of transition from a boom town into a staple community. In 1887 twenty-five feet of frontage on Pennsylvania avenue sold readily for $350 to $400.

The government designated Cle-Elum as a postoffice in 1888, Dr. Wheelock taking charge as postmaster Tuesday, January 3d. His office occupied the ground upon which Kahler's drug store now stands. In April W. J. Reed platted his first addition to the town and May 24, 1888, Judge Gamble laid out 100 acres of his farm into a town which he called Hazelwood, not deeming it wise to plat it at that time as an addition to Cle-Elum, though such in effect it was. The principal buildings erected during the year were Thomas Johnson's new store and an addition to the Reed hotel, built of Cle-Elum brick. Among the arrivals of the year was John Rothsberger, who opened a meat market.

Late in the year 1888 Cle-Elum felt the effects of the great Roslyn strike, becoming the scene of violence which nearly led to bloodshed. Johnson's mill was threatened by angered Knights of Labor, and at one time a noisy demonstration was made against the Reed hotel, but for a detailed account of these troubles the reader is referred to former pages.

Cle-Elum enjoyed the advantage of being the headquarters of the Cascade division until the Stampede tunnel was completed, and owing to its proximity to the tunnel derived no small benefit from that great work. But the completion of that tunnel, the transfer of division headquarters, the Roslyn mine troubles and the removal of Johnson's sawmill to Puget sound withdrew the bulk of Cle-Elum's resources, and beginning with 1889 the town experienced only fair prosperity and a slow growth for several years.

Like all communities situated in a timbered region, Cle-Elum has always stood in more or less danger from forest fires, though each year this danger grows less. One of these fires, sweeping up the valley, suddenly menaced the little town July 23, 1891. The citizens battled manfully with the flames until three o'clock in the afternoon, when it was thought the fire was practically out and the workers retired for rest. Three hours later, however, flames were seen issuing from Theron Stafford's general store on Pennsylvania avenue, and before the weary citizens could stay their progress the entire block of business buildings was a heap of smouldering debris. The losses aggregated between $40,000 and $50,000, covered by perhaps $3,000 insurance.

Stafford's loss alone was $14,000, with only $1,000 insurance. William Lindsey's grocery, Thomas Johnson's building, occupied at the time by Edward Connell's general store, the building and merchandise stock of F. M. Cox and about ten other frame buildings were destroyed with their contents. Connell's loss was estimated at $9,000 with $2,000 insurance, and Cox's loss at $2,600. The Cle-Elum Tribune, the town's pioneer newspaper, established March 26, 1891, by C. R. Martin, also suffered a loss amounting to at least $700.

One man, while under the influence of liquor and unmanageable, approached the Stafford building too closely and was caught by the falling structure and mortally injured. Mr. Stafford also received a severe burn in an attempt to remove goods from his store.

Several times during the progress of the fire it was thought the entire town was lost, but perseverance and energy won the battle at last. Early in the struggle the Ellensburg fire department was appealed to and within twenty minutes after the call was received the engine and crew were on a flat car and speeding up the valley. At Thorp, however, the train was intercepted by a dispatch stating that the fire was under control and that assistance was not needed. Only a few business houses were left by the fire. These were the Reed House, W. J. Reed, proprietor; the Cascade House, August Sasse, proprietor; Branam & Thomas's livery, William Branam and L. R. Thomas, proprietors; D. B. Burcham's barber shop; B. C. Richardson's livery; Oscar Cash's blacksmith shop; Frank Rothlesberger's restaurant and several saloons.

This dire calamity, closely followed by the memorable financial stringency, greatly reduced the town's prosperity and population; in fact a town with fewer resources and a less determined citizenship might have given up the struggle for existence entirely. But certain forces were at work destined to dispel the gloom and usher in a glorious and lasting prosperity.

Deposits of coal were known to exist in the Cle-Elum neighborhood long before any attempt at mining was undertaken. The first determined and well directed effort to uncover these veins was made in 1894 by Oscar James, James Smith, Isaac Davis and Charles Hamer, practical miners, who arranged with Judge Gamble to sink a shaft on his farm. The enterprise had a successful issue, for at a depth of 240 feet the vein was struck. Soon after machinery was installed by the Cle-Elum Coal Company, as the discoverers above mentioned styled their organization, for the purpose of placing the black diamonds on the market. They obtained a forty years' lease from Mr. Gamble and set a large force of miners at work, also induced the railway company to build side tracks for their accommodation.

Of course the Gamble mine proved a most welcome boon to the town, although until 1900 it was worked only on a comparatively small scale. An event of the year 1896 which might have proven a very melancholy one was the collapse, from an overweight of snow on its roof, of the Cle-Elum, formerly known as Tillman, hall. It fell to the ground at three o'clock on the morning of January 2d. New Year's eve there had been a largely attended dance in the hall and the strain on the building at that time must have been great. The following evening a crowd of thirty young people drove to the Cooley mill as a surprise party, agreeing, however, that if the mill people had retired they would return to the hall for their merrymaking. As it happened, one family at the mill was found awake and the young people remained—a circumstance to which they undoubtedly owed their lives. J. J. Lewis and his mother, who occupied rooms in the rear end of the building, barely escaped death.

Cle-Elum, the new, the present bustling little city, came into existence with the dawn of the twentieth century. The remarkable transformation which took place about that time is due to several causes, principal of which was the acquirement of the Gamble lease in 1900 by the Northwestern Improvement Company. Immediately upon taking charge, Manager Bush commenced operations on a large scale, enlarging the plant from time to time and increasing the working force until at present more than 400 men are employed under Superintendent G. M. Green. The mine is worked by the pillar and room system, uses double entries, is well ventilated and timbered and is producing 30,000 long tons of coal a month. It is obvious that with such an industry within its limits, steadily in operation six days in a week, any town has the foundation of prosperity and substantial growth.

From the time the Cle-Elum mine came under the control of its present operators, Cle-Elum has rapidly advanced in population and importance, property has steadily enhanced in value, buildings of a substantial character have taken the place of the old ones and scores of other improvements have been inaugurated. Within three years the population has increased 500 per cent.

In 1900 Mr. Gamble attached his property to Cle-Elum proper under the name of the Hazelwood addition. This action paved the way for the organization of Cle-Elum as a city of the fourth class, and Wednesday, February 12, 1902, the following corps of officers were elected: Mayor—Thomas L. Gamble; councilmen—Michael C. Miller, Robert L. Thomas, R. Elijah Kermeen, D. B. Burcham and M. P. Kay; treasurer—A. E. Emerson; clerk and attorney, G. P.

Short; city marshal—Frank Haight; police judge—Theron M. Stafford.

At the last election, the proposition to incorporate as a city of the third class was carried by a practically unanimous vote and January 1, 1905, the town will advance a step among the municipal corporations of the state. The present city officials were elected in December, 1903: Mayor, E. E. Simpson; city clerk and attorney, G. P. Short; treasurer, L. S. Brown; marshals, Frank Haight and Peter McCallum; city engineer, H. F. Marble; health officer, Dr. I. N. Power; aldermen, D. B. Perrow, R. E. Kermen, M. C. Miller, Isaac Davies, William F. Lewis; chief fire department, C. S. Haines; captain Company No. 1, James A. Thomas; captain Company No. 2, Robert Simpson.

The city has just reason to feel proud of its new gravity water system, installed during the past twelve months at a cost of approximately $19,000. The water is taken from springs located three miles southwest of town on a quarter section formerly owned by Oscar Cash. From him the city purchased the land last year, paying therefor $2,000. The reservoir of 400,000 gallons' capacity lies 180 feet above Pennsylvania avenue, affording a pressure in the business part of ninety pounds to the square inch. In all there are three miles of six and four inch mains. The pipe used was made by the Pacific Coast Pipe Company and is built of Washington or Douglas fir, wrapped with No. 4 double galvanized steel telegraph wire, and dipped in a hot bath of tar and asphalt. The patent cast iron couplings are guaranteed to be water tight. To help pay the cost of this system the city issued $10,000 worth of six per cent. bonds. The system is soon to be improved by the construction of a large reservoir for fire purposes solely.

A volunteer fire department, composed of two companies of the city's public-spirited young men, was organized in October last. Upon the completion of the water works the council invested $1,500 in hose carts and hose, which, with the hydrant facilities and well organized department, place the town in a position to make a strong fight against fire. In 1903, also, the town erected a municipal building, costing $1,400, arranged to house fire apparatus on the ground floor, while the second story is fitted up to accommodate the council, public gatherings, lodges, etc.

It is estimated that fully four miles of substantial sidewalks and crosswalks have been constructed in Cle-Elum. The work of grading streets is going on constantly and will be continued until the city's thoroughfares are in a satisfactory condition.

The old schoolhouse was replaced in 1890 by a commodious frame structure costing $1,500, built on a tract of land donated by Mr. Reed.

Two years ago another building containing two rooms was added to the old schoolhouse and it was thought that room sufficient for years to come had been provided. However, these quarters have been already outgrown and the ground is now broken for the erection of a new frame schoolhouse to cost at least $10,000. This building will be two stories high and will contain eight rooms besides the principal's office, library and basement. It will be equipped with a steam heating plant, electric lights and other modern improvements, making it one of the handsomest and most comfortable school buildings in the county. The site lies near the old schoolhouse between Second and Third streets. At present there is an average enrollment of 275 pupils in the Cle-Elum schools, under the instruction of the following corps of teachers: J. M. Richardson, principal; Mrs. Daisy Fish, Miss Kate Lanigan, Mrs. Baker, Miss Irene Brain and Miss Anna Bolen. Two grades of high school work have recently been added to the curriculum of study. The school board consists of Frank Martin, Samuel Willis and E. W. Rinehart, Samuel Willis being clerk.

There are five churches established in Cle-Elum, though only two at present have pastors, the Baptist and the Methodist. The other denominations possessing churches are the Presbyterian, the Catholic and the Free Methodist.

We have spoken of a rosary as being among the city's notable institutions. So unique is the establishment that a short mention of it seems appropriate. The plant, consisting of about 18,000 feet of glass, is located at the northeast corner of the town and has been established four years. The proprietor, J. A. Balmer, was formerly professor of horticulture and station horticulturist in the State Agricultural College and School of Science, Pullman, Washington. When Mr. Balmer decided to establish a plant for the production of cut flowers, he looked the state thoroughly over for a suitable location, and finally decided upon Cle-Elum as the best place for the business. Here he found cheap land, cheap fuel, excellent shipping facilities and a soil suited to the production of high class roses. The plant consists of three glass structures each 200 feet long by 23 feet wide, steam heated and thoroughly modern in construction. Over a mile and a half of one and a quarter-inch pipe are used in heating the houses, which are maintained at an even temperature even in the coldest weather. Only roses and carnations are produced. The large and growing cities on the Sound afford an excellent market for the product of the place, and Cle-Elum roses are well known and in demand wherever fine flowers are needed. About 6,000 roses and 3,000 carnations are growing on the benches, and the annual output amounts to nearly 100,000 flowers. The flowers are cut every morning and shipped every evening, thus putting them fresh on the market every morning.

September 1, 1903, James A. Kellogg, a gentleman of recognized integrity and ability and a Minneapolis business man for sixteen years, opened a private bank in Cle-Elum. The institution, the only one of its kind in the county outside of Ellensburg, occupies a commodious building on Pennsylvania avenue. Among its equipments is a manganese safe of the latest construction. The business of this institution is steadily growing.

Other business and public enterprises worthy of special mention are the city's newspaper and brass band. The Cle-Elum Echo, established by Randall Brothers three years ago, is a very creditable weekly newspaper, both editorially and typographically, the peer of most journals published in towns thrice Cle-Elum's size. Charles S. Fell, an experienced and genial newspaper man, is its editor and proprietor. The Cle-Elum City band was organized in May, 1902, and is an association of twenty skilled musicians. Teasdale L. Wilkeson is the band's manager and musical director; R. H. Connell is treasurer; and Charles Connell, secretary. The members are equipped with tasty uniforms and high grade instruments.

A directory of Cle-Elum's business concerns and professional men would include, beside those mentioned, the following:

General merchandise, the Northwestern Improvement Company, Frank Martin manager; T. M. Jones, A. E. Flower; clothing, boots and shoes, Dills, Brown & Lodge; groceries, Kennedy Brothers, Daniel Gaydon; hotels, the Reed House, Theodore Steiner proprietor; the Central, August Sasse proprietor; the Vendome, Albert Harting proprietor; the Piemonte, J. B. Farnelli proprietor; meat markets, the Cle-Elum, George Rothlesberger proprietor; Sides Brothers & Hartman; George Bounds; drug store, Earle Kahler; hardware, Haines & Spratt; sawmill, Wright Brothers & Miller; house furnishers, J. S. Werlich & Son; second hand store, C. J. Trucano; millinery, ladies' furnishings, Mrs. L. L. James, Clara Kuhl; bakery, groceries, the Hazelwood, Giacomini & Schaber proprietors; livery stables, the Cle-Elum, Hugh Fish proprietor; Crocker Brothers, John H. and Walter W.; blacksmith shops, Gongaware, Fish & Comstock, William Oldham; jeweler, H. C. Bilger; confectionery, cigars, etc., D. B. Burcham, C. W. Badger, Henry Horstman, Fred Zenter; harness store, Lorenzo Garlick; barber shops, Frank Moore, Clement & Oversby; shoes, C. Morganti; sausage factory, Modoni & Pugiant; restaurants, Bowden & Bowden, the California and the Oregon; transfer company, W. W. Tuttle proprietor; contractors, Daniel B. Perrow,

A. S. Paul; physicians, Dr. I. N. Power, Dr. F. W. Nagler; attorney-at-law, G. P. Short; insurance, real estate, land office business, Hon. Walter J. Reed; telegraph office, express office, insurance, Charles S. Fell; postmaster, Harry C. Bilger; stages, to Liberty and Fish Lake; several saloons.

Several years ago the railroad company, in order to facilitate telegraphing, substituted an "a" for the "E" in the second syllable of the word Cle-Elum, changing the name of the railroad station to correspond. More recently the postoffice department changed the name of the postoffice to Clealum. This action aroused a storm of indignation among the town's residents and friends, for by the change the old name was destroyed and its significance entirely lost; besides, the new spelling was not in accord with the city's corporate name. Moreover, considerable Cle-Elum mail found its way to Clallam, across the range. At this writing the matter is before the national board of geographical names for decision, on an appeal raised by Congressman Jones.

THORP.

Thorp is a substantial and prettily situated farming town of perhaps two hundred inhabitants, located nine miles northwest of Ellensburg on the western bank of the Yakima river. The main line of the Northern Pacific railroad passes through the town, affording excellent transportation facilities and making it an important shipping point for the upper Kittitas valley. Thorp also has the advantage of being a small manufacturing center, for it boasts a flour mill, two sawmills and a creamery. Smith J. Kendall and Joseph D. Mack own and operate the flour mill, which is a well equipped plant of moderate capacity whose products are shipped to the Pacific for use there and for export. Louis Ellison and J. L. Mills & Son are the owners of the sawmills, and Wipple Brothers own the large creamery.

Other business establishments and business men in Thorp are: Fred C. Porter, Everett E. Southern, general merchandise; James F. Duncan, Alfred St. John, proprietors of two hotels; blacksmith shop, J. Otis Newman; feed stables, John Newman; Nellie Gordon, stationery and notions; physician, Dr. Charles H. Reed; barber, A. J. Schele; surveyors, Harry Riddell, Fred Ross; A. L. Hollingsworth, Fred P. Newman, painters; Frank Hutchison, Fred Lowe and Alfred Clyborne, carpenters; postmaster, Sarah E. Gordon; one saloon. James M. Finley is station agent.

The town maintains a graded school which is in charge of Principal W. C. Thomas and Mary Peaslee; also two church societies, both of which have buildings, the Methodist and Christian. Telegraph and telephone facilities are likewise afforded. The postoffice was established in 1890.

The records show that the first plat of the townsite was filed July 9, 1895, by John M. Newman and his wife, Sarah Isabel Newman, the owners. E. I. Anderson surveyed a little more than five and a half acres lying in township eighteen north, range seventeen east, which was platted into blocks. May 1, 1900, Milford A. and Amanda Thorp dedicated Thorp's addition to the town. From the Thorp family the town receives its name. Milford A. Thorp, the son of Alvin A. Thorp, a Moxee pioneer of 1866 and a Kittitas pioneer of 1870, permanently settled in the Kittitas valley in 1879. In 1885 he bought James McMurray's claim and on this land the town stands. For many years previous to the formal dedication of the townsite, there was a considerable settlement at Thorp. The future prospects of the town are bright.

EASTON.

The thriving village and station bearing the name of Easton is situated on the Yakima river and the Northern Pacific railway, thirty-eight miles northwest of Ellensburg and thirteen miles northwest of Cle-Elum. The town has about 150 inhabitants, most of whom are engaged in lumbering, railroad work and kindred occupations.

Easton was platted by A. O. and W. W. Johnson, June 24, 1902, three acres lying on the north side of the river in township twenty north, range thirteen east, being surveyed into blocks by County Surveyor Moses M. Emerson. In August following H. S. Pelton platted an addition of five blocks, and the Erkenbrack addition was platted. For many years previous to 1902 Easton was a well known sawmill point.

A directory of the town's business houses would include the general store of Johnson Brothers, Albert O. and William W., the latter being postmaster; the grocery of Joseph Erkenbrack & Son; one hotel, the Railroad House, Edward Ohort, proprietor; a restaurant and meat market, conducted by George R. Pelton; George M. Snyder's barber shop; and a saloon. The village has a good school, taught by R. A. Wilcox, an express office, and telegraph station. Easton is a growing community. The great highland irrigating canal, which is now being surveyed and which is to far surpass in size any other canal in the state, will take its waters out of the river near Easton. Near the town are the Easton falls of the Yakima, which furnish a fine water power for manufacturing purposes. Just north of the town is the beautiful Kittitas lake region.

LIBERTY.

The trading point of upper Swauk creek valley is Liberty, a hamlet near the mouth of Williams creek. P. T. Carson is postmaster and A. F. York conducts a general store, besides which there is a hotel. A daily stage is operated between Liberty and Cle-Elum, fifteen miles southwest, which is the Swauk valley's shipping, banking, telegraph and express point. The well known Swauk placer mines are in this neighborhood, while the whole region abounds in silver, lead, copper and iron. A rich, though small, farming and stock settlement, more than two decades old, is also tributary to Liberty. The natural scenery in this bit of Kittitas county is surpassingly beautiful and a healthier place would be hard to find. Liberty is the smallest of the six postoffice towns in the county, the others being Ellensburg, Roslyn, Cle-Elum, Thorp, and Easton.

TEANAWAY CITY.

Teanaway City is a discontinued postoffice on the Northern Pacific railway at the junction of the Teanaway and Yakima rivers, nineteen miles northwest of Ellensburg and four miles southeast of Cle-Elum, the banking and postoffice point. At one time Teanaway City was a thriving business center. It was platted on section four, township nineteen north, range sixteen east, July 30, 1885, by Henry F. Ortley, through his attorney, George N. Bowen. Ortley secured the tract by means of scrip and laid out sixteen blocks. The construction of the railroad gave the place a temporary existence as a village, about thirty buildings being erected and a store established by Theron Stafford. However, in the fall of 1886 Stafford removed his store to Cle-Elum and the decadence of Teanaway began. The postoffice was discontinued the following year. Gold, silver and coal are found in the vicinity of Teanaway. About fifty people reside there now.

ROZA.

Roza is a flag station on the Northern Pacific railway, twenty-one miles south of Ellensburg and sixteen north of North Yakima, the nearest postoffice. The station is the Yakima canyon.

MARTIN.

Martin is another flag station on the railway, forty-nine miles northwest of Ellensburg at the eastern end of the Stampede tunnel. Easton is the nearest postoffice.

THRALL.

Thrall, another flag station on the railway, is five miles southeast of Ellensburg, the nearest postoffice. Considerable shipping is done from this station.

UMTANUM.

Umtanum, also a Northern Pacific station, lies thirteen miles southeast of Ellensburg, at the mouth of Umtanum creek, in the Yakima canyon.

BRISTOL.

Bristol, another small railway station and trading point, is situated at the mouth of Swauk creek. The community gets its mail and express at Cle-Elum, a few miles northwest.

M'CALLUM.

A discontinued postoffice ten miles northeast of Teanaway on the Northern Pacific railway. Mail is received at Liberty.

NELSON'S.

A siding on the Pacific division of the Northern Pacific railway, thirty-one miles northwest of Ellensburg. Cle-Elum is the postoffice.

RONALD.

Ronald is now a discontinued postoffice and contains no business establishments. It lies at the mouth of mine No. 3, Roslyn coal district, two miles above the city of Roslyn, and at one time contained probably 200 inhabitants. The closing down of this mine naturally removed the town's support. It was named in honor of Alexander Ronald, one of the early superintendents of the Roslyn mines.

DUDLEY.

A flag station on the Northern Pacific railroad between Thorp and Bristol.

SWAUK.

Twelve miles by stage from Cle-Elum is a small settlement bearing the name of Swauk. It lies on Swauk prairie.

GALENA.

This townsite was platted by County Surveyor A. F. York in May, 1890, on land at the junction of Camp creek with Cle-Elum river, in the Cle-Elum mineral district. Galena was intended to be the metropolis of the upper Cle-Elum region and is the terminus of an old Northern Pacific survey into the mining country. Thirty-five blocks were surveyed and a great number of them sold, but as yet Galena exists in name only. It is a government townsite.

was platted in April, 1884, on land near Ellensburg by the Kittitas Improvement Company, of which J. D. Dammon was president and Austin Mires secretary. The project was abandoned.

TUNNEL CITY

is another townsite project which did not mature. J. S. Wisner, in March, 1886, laid out Tunnel City at the eastern end of the Stampede tunnel.

CHAPTER I.

YAKIMA, KITTITAS AND KLIICKITAT COUNTIES—DESCRIPTIVE.

The three counties whose history forms the subject matter of this volume occupy a position in south central Washington between the Columbia river on the south and east, the majestic Cascades on the west and a spur of that rangt, known as the Wenatchee mountains, on the north. The area of this territory is 9,300 square miles, divided among the three counties, as follows: Yakima 5,500 square miles, Klickitat 1,800, Kittitas 2,000. In local circles the region is often loosely referred to as central Washington, and the term has been adopted by the writer for convenience, though it is admittedly inaccurate because it may properly be and doubtless frequently is used to include several counties in addition to the three under consideration.

The topography of the region presents many interesting features. The man of a scientific turn is impelled after surveying it even superficially to inquire into its geological history, and fortunately the record has been at least partially prepared for him by scientific parties in the employ of the United States government. According to the report of Messrs. Jensen and Olshausen on their soil survey of the Yakima area, the whole of central Washington and perhaps much of Oregon and Idaho were once covered by an immense inland sea, known as Lake John Day.

"Into this lake," say they, "streams carried the land and mud held in suspension in their waters, while volcanoes in times of violent eruption threw into it vast quantities of volcanic dust, ashes and lapilli. The lake beds are hence composed of alternating strata of volcanic dust, gravel, sand and finer soils, and are also interstratified with a widely spread sheet of basalt, as well as a number of mere local sheets. This formation is known as the John Day system. The same formation is found on John Day river, in Oregon, and was studied there.

"Since the deposition of the beds above mentioned the underlying Columbia lava, together with the superimposed John Day beds, has been raised and broken in various places, giving rise to the present relief of the area. Most of the soft beds have been removed from the tops of the ridges and hills by erosion, bringing into bold relief in many places the underlying basalt. . . .

"On the invasion of the icebergs from the north, long after the John Day beds had been raised, the lake drained into the Pacific and the present physiography established, another lake was formed in the central and eastern portion of Washington, known as Lake Lewis. This was not so extensive as the Tertiary lake and was probably not of long duration, as very little lake sediment accumulated during its existence and the lake shores are not generally well marked, although one may be quite plainly seen from the ridge forming the north boundary of the Ahtanum valley, near the western limit of the area."

It appears, then, that four ages in the geological history of central Washington have been discovered. First, the age of fire, when "flood after flood of molten rock, which covered the vast area between what is now the crest of the Cascade mountains on the west and the mountains of Idaho on the east, and between the mountains of north-eastern Washington on the north and the Blue mountains of Oregon on the south," was poured out; second, the age of the John Day lake, when all central Washington and vast areas beside were covered with water; third, the glacial age, when that tremendous flow of ice, thousands of feet in depth, moved over the face of the land, materially influencing its general physiography, and, fourth, the Lewis lake age, when an inland sea of great extent, though small in comparison with its predecessor, spread its waters over the area of which our section is topographically a part.

We should expect to find in a country with such a geological history a soil rich in the elements of crop production. Plenty of basalt, plenty of volcanic ash, plenty of ice and water for pulverizing and erosion, broad lake areas over which the ashes and basalt dust might be precipitated, plenty of streams to supply alluvium to be mixed with the volcanic sediment—all these forces ought to produce a soil of unexcelled richness, and the experience of the agriculturist is that they have not failed to do so in this instance.

But from the geological history of central Washington we should expect also to find a topography less rugged and sublime than in those localities where the work of the volcano has not been so radically metamorphosed by the gentler agencies of later days. This too we find to hold in the present instance. Many parts of the area in their natural condition are not specially charming to the aesthetic eye. There are large stretches of almost level land, which by reason of aridity of climate support no vegetation save bunch-grass and sage-brush and greasewood. The great plains of the Columbia certainly have a somewhat monotonous topography, yet by a mysterious touch of her artistic hand, Nature has added a certain charm to the most cheerless and uninviting scenes in this enchanted region. Here are the glorious sunrises and gorgeous sunsets always beheld in desert lands, while the distant scene is ever clad in a robe of deepest blue, the color of beauty and of mystery. In many places the dearth of vegetation, which results from the drouth alone and not from any barrenness of soil, has been overcome by art, nor will the work of the irrigation engineer and agriculturist be discontinued until every irrigable acre of desert in central Washington shall have broken into verdure. Nowhere in the wide world, perhaps, do the labors of such men accomplish more in the way of beautifying as well as fertilizing the country.

And indeed it must not be assumed that the territory embraced in Yakima, Kittitas and Klickitat counties ever was an unbroken and unrelieved desert. In no part of the area are hills and uplands and rolling plateaus very far distant, while along its western border extends one of the most sublimely grand mountain ranges on the continent, many spurs of which penetrate far into the region to the eastward. It has never been the writer's privilege to explore this wonderland of giant peaks, and colossal crags and huge glaciers and deep verdure clad depressions; nor has he ever been privileged to even visit its most sublime retreats; but those whom fortune has treated more kindly in this respect are not slow to compare the scenery they beheld in the heart of the Cascades with the most famous pictures in the great gallery of Nature. After an outing in this majestic mountain range, the editor of the Yakima Herald, writing in the summer of 1889, said in substance:

The coast papers are often filled with glowing accounts of the beauties of the Yosemite, or the natural wonders of the National park. We hope that some competent, inspired pen may be found to suitably portray the sublime wonders of nature almost at our very doors. Within fifty miles of North Yakima, easily accessible, at the heads of the north and south forks of the Tietan, near the icy crest of Mount Kaye, are scenes and natural wonders that rival Yosemite or the Yellowstone park.

A trip from North Yakima to that Bethesda of central Washington, the Yakima Soda Springs, thence on horseback over a romantic ridge, by a pathway leading through forests of fragrant fir and pine trees, brings the tourist to the crest of Darland mountain. Immediately before him lies a scene of unparalleled grandeur. Apparently almost at hand are the mighty mountain peaks, Ranier, St. Helens, Hood, Adams and the older Mount Kaye, all glistening in the summer sun, whose noonday rays are reflected back from their burnished glaciers. Streams of water are to be seen resembling silver threads as they dash down the mountain sides from their source in the ice fields. We may mark also the course of the avalanche as in the winter storms it has torn down the precipices, sweeping away hundreds of acres of forests in its mad career, while almost beneath us, but miles away, is Wiley's beautiful valley which is to be our camp for the night, and where we shall arrive after a few hours' ride down a safe and comfortable mountain trail. Here almost at the head of the south fork of the Tietan is one of the most charming spots imaginable for a summer resort,—a large, wide valley, rich in luscious grasses and dotted with groves of fir trees, giving it a parklike appearance; a valley full of babbling brooks and gushing streams, chiefest of which is the joyous, rollicking Tietan; its beauties walled in by the mighty monarchs of the Cascades and old Mount Kaye, with its eternal glaciers standing at its head like a stern, silent sentinel.

A short ride the next morning through this valley and up a sharp, backbone ridge that again divides the south fork, then up the branch on the right, the branch on the left leading to the well known Cispus pass, and we come at last to the very feet of the glaciers. Here are innumerable grassy camps, supplied with living ice cold water, for strange as it may seem, in the summer we find rich, succulent grasses in these mountains, far above the timber line, flourishing and growing luxuriantly by the side of the rivers of ice. Turning the horses loose to graze and taking up iron-shod staves we can now have Alpine climbing to a surfeit. Around the sightseer are thousands and thousands of acres of ice. You can find, along the edges of this glaciated area, icy caves in which a whole train of saddle horses and riders might camp. You can travel over the ice fields, jumping mighty crevices, throw rocks down into the dark, impenetrable depths, listen to the rush of streams far below the range of human vision, study the effects of the grinding ice on peak, hillside and ledge, look upon the thousand tons of rock that have tumbled from the towering ledges above to the bosoms of the glaciers, crawl along the sharp, two-foot ridge dividing the summits where a single misstep or a giddy head will precipitate you downward through a thousand feet of space, walk over on the glacier to the north fork and view the entrancing falls of the "White Swan," where the water dashes into an abyss fifteen hundred feet deep; or if sufficiently venturesome you may climb high above the snow on to the sharp, rocky peak of Mount Kaye, where one false step will send you into eternity. If the thirst for the hunt is in you, you may pursue the mountain goats that inhabit these solitudes of ice, snow and rock, and test your skill and nerve in an attempt to take one. You may, also, if you wish, visit on your return Lion falls, where the waters of the Tietan leap over huge columns of basalt, or the Devil's Head, where earth seems determined to pierce the clouds with a rocky pillar, or the wonderful Tietan chalybeate spring, reputed to possess great curative powers. All this and more one may do if he will but take the trouble to pay a visit to this gigantic region.

The task of describing the wonderland above referred to once also engaged the pen of the late J. M. Adams. In a masterly monograph in the Spokane Falls Review he endeavored to construct a vivid pen picture of the Tietan park. A paragraph or two from his article may add to the reader's appreciation of the scenery of the Cascades. He says:

"Clambering up the side of some great, towering crag and looking down over this wonderful region, one gets a view that is grand and appalling beyond all description. Far as the eye can see, this rugged rim on which he stands may be traced by the tourist circling around the basin or park that lies thousands of feet below. The whole region is heavily timbered and the great moss grown rocks rising here and there in wild confusion, one above the other, suggest the castles and towers and deserted cathedrals of some enchanted fairy land.

"Surely no earthly scene could be fraught with more awful grandeur than the sunset of a summer's day when viewed from one of those towering crags. Winding through the great expanse of woods below, the Tietan river and numerous small streams appear at such depths as to resemble so many shimmering threads of silver on a dark blue background, while the little spots of wild meadow here and there seem like tiny points of gold. The sombre shades of towering peaks fall in deepening black across the forest, and the rugged rocks on the heights above suggest a troop of monster shapes stealing down into the valley. The sun itself, suspended in a sea of golden clouds, presents a scene of monarchical glory and gorgeousness such as no brush or pen could picture."

That part of the Cascade range contiguous to Yakima and Kittitas counties doubtless presents many scenic poems scarcely inferior in sublime power and wild picturesque grandeur to the Tietan basin and its environs, but the value of the mountain range does not begin and end in its attractiveness to the tourist and pleasure seeker. Besides their effect upon the climate of our section and their vast utility in furnishing summer range for thousands of head of cattle and sheep, the Cascades are of vital importance to the agriculturist for they form the brewing place of that life-giving fluid which fertilizes his desert acres, causing them to bring forth in their season with lavish abundance. In the western part of Kittitas county are three magnificent mountain lakes, Kitchelos, Kachees, and Cle-Elum, all of which receive tribute from streams having their source in the Cascades near the angle formed by that range with the Wenathee mountains. In Kitchelos lake heads the Yakima, the master stream of this entire area, into which the two other lakes soon pour their waters through the Kachees and Cle-Elum rivers. In its southeasterly course to the majestic Columbia, the Yakima receives many other tributaries, among them the Teanaway river, and the Swauk, Reeser, Tanum, Manastash, Wilson, Nanum and Cherry creeks, from the north; and Boston, Tansum, Umptanum, and Wenas creeks, Naches river, Atanum river, Simcoe creek and Satas river, many of which are themselves fed by numerous tributaries from the east. The area drained by the Yakima river system forms the major part of the entire territory under consideration, but there is another well defined watershed in the territory separated from that of the Yakima by a narrow divide, namely, that emptying its waters through southerly flowing streams into the Columbia. Chiefest among these is the Klickitat river, which rises in the Cascades, and takes a comparatively straight course to the Columbia, receiving a great many tributaries from both east and west. White Salmon river west of the Klickitat, also traverses Klickitat county for a portion of its course though it belongs in part to Skamania county. Between it and the Klickitat river is Mayor creek, while to the further east are Rock, Wood, Pine, Alder and other streams, all rising near the divide and flowing directly into the Columbia, which lordly and beautiful river conveys all the water of the region and that from hundreds of thousands of square miles besides to the bosom of old ocean.

The Cascades also exert an important influence on the climate of central and eastern Washington, by obstructing the passage of rain clouds from the Pacific and precipitating their moisture upon western Washington. Thus it happens that the country between the mountains and the sea is covered with dense forests, while that to the eastward is in many parts a desert of sand and sage brush. But the influence of the warm ocean currents cannot be so readily confined. It reaches to every part of central Washington and far beyond, giving a mildness and brevity to the winter seasons which, under other circumstances, we should not find in so high a latitude. Indeed some of the valleys of Yakima county are blessed with a semi-tropical climate, and in no part of the area embraced in our three counties, except perhaps high in the environmenting Cascades, will one ordinarily experience much inconvenience from extremes of heat and cold. While the thermometer may, in some parts of the country, occasionally show a below zero temperature and while its indicator may rise above the hundred mark in summer, yet the cold weather is usually of short duration and the warm never causes sunstroke or the extreme inconvenience with which a like temperature would be attended in many parts of the east. "At Sunnyside," wrote George N. Salisbury, United States Weather Bureau official, "the mean annual temperature of January is 30.3 degrees, that of July is 71.7 degrees. The highest recorded temperature is 108 degrees in August, 1898; the lowest, 23 degrees below zero in November, 1896. At North Yakima . . . the average number of days with rain or snow is sixty-two per annum. The mean January temperature is 29.9 degrees, and that of July 70.9 degrees. The highest recorded temperature is 108 degrees in August, 1897, the lowest, 22 degrees below zero in November, 1896. At Ellensburg, in the upper part of the valley, eight hundred feet higher than Sunnyside, the mean annual precipitation is 9.52 inches, and the mean annual temperature is 46.4 degrees. . . . the average number of days with rain or snow is fifty-three per annum. The mean January temperature is 25 degrees, and that of August, 66 degrees. Highest, 102 degrees, August, 1895; lowest, 29 degrees below zero, November, 1896."

YAKIMA COUNTY.

Whatever may have been the chief source of wealth in Yakima county when the wild Indian was lord of the land or when the hardy frontiersman first entered it with his flocks, it is clear that its present greatness and hope for the future are centered in the utilization of the drainage system of which mention was made in the foregoing pages. As the people express it, "irrigation is king." Logic therefore demands that any discussion of its various industrial activities and its contribution to the wealth of the country should be prefaced by a brief résumé of its irrigation systems. The history of some of these has been touched upon already. It remains but to outline the present status of irrigation, and in doing so, free use will be made of the government reports upon the subject.

Had some of the earliest irrigation schemes materialized in the form and to the extent proposed, they would have embraced both Yakima and Kittitas counties in one immense system. In the early nineties the Northern Pacific, Yakima & Kittitas Irrigation Company undertook to dam the outlets of lakes Kitchelos, Kachees and Cle-Elum, and so create immense storage reservoirs wherewith to swell the volume of the Yakima during the irrigation season. This company went to far as to prepare timbers and pile them at the mouth of Kitchelos lake, but the plan was not carried out, and the irrigation of Kittitas valley was never linked with that of the Yakima. As it is the former valley is irrigated by local ditches, of which more anon.

The first irrigation stream in Yakima county as we travel eastward is Wenas creek, which drains an area south of the Manastash drainage. It pursues a general southeasterly course to the Yakima, which it enters about two miles above the city of North Yakima, watering a broad, fertile valley, which was early settled on account of its being on the old stage road from The Dalles to Ellensburg and beyond. "Irrigation along the stream has, therefore, been developed to a considerable extent, and the ditches built effected so complete a diversion of the water during the dry seasons that lawsuits have been brought to determine a proper division of the water. The courts have ordered a more or less equitable division, but this solution of the problem is not wholly satisfactory, and attempts have been made to devise a system of storage." These attempts took the form of examining and surveying for reservoirs the natural basin in sections 2 and 3, township 15 north, range 17 east, and the so-called O'Neill reservoir site. Efforts were also made to divert waters tributary to Naches river around the southern slope of Bald-mountain to the north fork of Wenas creek.

Of much greater importance is the Naches river, which, indeed, is said to be the most important stream for irrigation purposes in the state of Washington. Says George Otis Smith:

It reaches Yakima valley at a point where its waters are immediately available for irrigating extensive areas of the best agricultural land. Already a number of irrigation systems take water from this river, and in view of new irrigation projects its storage possibilities have been investigated by the hydrographic division of the geological survey.

In the summer of 1897 Mr. Cyrus C. Babb made a survey of a reservoir site at Bumping lake on Bumping river. This lake, which is in the Mount Ranier forest reserve, lies close to the crest of the Cascade range and is surrounded by high peaks. Its shores are covered with dense forests. On August 26, 1897, a measurement of the discharge at the outlet was made, giving eighty-three second-feet. At that time the water surface was one hundred and fifteen feet wide. The water marks around the lake show an annual fluctuation of about three feet. Its height may reach seven feet during exceptionally wet seasons or after a winter of heavy snowfalls. At a height of ten feet the water surface would be about one hundred and fifty feet wide. The length of the proposed dams at a height of twenty-five feet above the bed of the river would be four hundred and eighty feet. The area of the lake is six hundred and thirty-one acres; the area of the twenty-five-foot contour, the height of the proposed dam, is one thousand one hundred and fifty-three acres, giving a reservoir capacity of twenty-two thousand three hundred acre-feet. The Northern Pacific, Yakima & Kittitas Irrigation Company surveyed the site in September, 1894, and prepared for construction by hewing in the immediate vicinity, tamarack timbers for the dam. These are now piled up at the outlet of the lake.

Tietan river, which enters the Naches about fifteen miles above its mouth, is an important stream, and being in greater part fed by glacier streams it maintains a large discharge during the hot months of summer, when its waters are most needed for irrigation purposes.

The North Yakima region is the most extensively irrigated of any district in the state of Washington, and the importance of Naches river is shown by the canals which take water from it. Some of the principal of them may be here mentioned.

The Selah Valley irrigation canal is on the north side of Naches river, its intake being just above the mouth of Tietan river. It is about thirty miles in length and irrigates (1901) about three thousand acres, under cultivation in the Naches and Selah valleys. Below this, on the north side, head the Wapatusk and Naches canals, seventeen and seven miles long, respectively, which irrigate the bottom lands of Naches valley.

On the south side the Yakima valley canal heads about twelve miles from North Yakima. For the first ten miles of its course it is in a flume. At the high point known as Pictured Rocks, it is carried around on a trestle about seventy-five feet high, and then crosses Cowiche canyon in an inverted siphon, thence it continues in flume and canal around into Wide Hollow, but it has not been found expedient to extend it farther into Ahtanum valley, for the reason that the canal is not high enough to cover much of the valley, and because it carries hardly sufficient water for the land now under it for which water rights have been sold. The length of the canal is sixteen miles, and it irrigates three thousand acres.

The Hubbard ditch heads close to Pictured Rocks on the south side of Naches river, just below the bridge crossing that stream. This ditch, with the Yakima Water, Light and Power Company's canal, and the Schanno, Broadgauge, Union and Town ditches, which head between the Hubbard ditch and the lower highway bridge, in the order named, serve to water the land in the immediate vicinity of North Yakima. The Yakima Water, Light and Power Company's canal discharges into the reservoir, whence a drop of twenty feet is obtained, developing sufficient power for the city pumping plant and the electric lights.

In 1895 the survey for a large canal, called the Naches and Columbia River irrigation canal, was made under the direction of the state arid land commission, formed after the passage of the Carey act. The intake of this canal was to be at the north side of Naches river, three miles below the head of the Selah Valley canal. The canal was to cross Yakima river a short distance above the mouth of Naches river, by means of an immense inverted siphon, circle Moxee valley, pass through the ridge east of Union Gap by a tunnel six thousand one hundred feet long, and continue down Yakima valley to Rattlesnake mountain, around which it was to pass to lands overlooking Columbia river. It was to be a hundred and forty miles long and to carry at its head two thousand second-feet of water. The intention was to use the Bumping lake storage reservoir. No work has been done on the canal.

A few years ago a survey was made for a canal called the Burlingame canal, which was to take water from the south side of Naches river just below the mouth of Tietan river, and carry it around into Ahtanum valley, thence around Ahtanum ridge, to the bench lands opposite Toppenish creek on the Yakima Indian reservation. About three miles of construction work was done on this canal near its head. The canal as far down as Pictured Rocks would be expensive to construct on account of the andesitic formation through which it would pass, and doubtless would be very expensive to maintain.

Mention may here be made of four canals which take water from the Yakima river nearly opposite the mouth of Naches river and constitute irrigation supplies for the lower part of Moxee valley, just southeast of the city of North Yakima. These are the Selah-Moxee canal recently constructed, the Moxee Company's canal, the Hubbard ditch and the Fowler ditch. The last three irrigate about three thousand acres; the Selah-Moxee irrigates about five thousand acres.

Much larger than any of these canals is that of the Washington Irrigation Company, known as the Sunnyside ditch. It is claimed by Walter N. Granger to be the fourth largest irrigation system in the United States and the largest in the Northwest. Up to the present time approximately in figures $1,700,000 have been expended upon it. The canal has its intake on the north bank of the Yakima river, seven and a half miles southeast of North Yakima, where at an expenditure of $40,000, head-gates of stone and concrete, supporting what is known as a falling steel dam, have been constructed. From this point the main canal follows the side of the Columbia river divide fifty miles in a southeasterly direction to a place opposite Prosser. The lower altitudes are covered by a system of laterals and smaller branches aggregating between 600 and 700 miles in length. One of the largest of these laterals winds around Snipes mountain, irrigating its lower or southern slope. The dimensions of the main canal at its upper end are: Top width, sixty-two and a half feet; bottom width, thirty feet; banks, eight feet in height, designed to carry a depth of six feet; initial capacity, eight hundred second-feet. The canal covers an area of 64,000 acres of irrigable land, of which perhaps 32,000 are now in cultivation. The water duty in the Sunnyside region is estimated to one second-foot the quarter section, or an aggregate depth during the season of thirty-five vertical inches. This amount with the annual rainfall of from six to eight inches gives sufficient water to raise any crop that can be grown in this latitude. It is said that the soil is remarkably free from alkali; also that over a very large area it will average more than a hundred feet in depth. From time to time the canal has been improved until now it has practically no fluming along its entire length, though of course there are scores of miles of flume work in its laterals. A feature of the construction work is its unexcelled pattern of head-gates. The company proposes to enlarge and extend the canal to cover an additional area of 150,000 acres lying along the Yakima, the slope of Rattlesnake range and the Columbia river slope. As yet, however, no plans have been matured. The annual maintenance fee charged is one dollar per acre, one of the lowest rates in force anywhere in the west. The company's offices are situated at Zillah, some twelve miles down the canal from the head-gates, and its present officers are: President, William L. Ladd, Portland; Vice-President, George Donald, North Yakima; Treasurer, R. H. Denny, Seattle; Secretary, John S. Bleeker, Seattle; Attorney, E. F. Blaine, Seattle; General Superintendent, Walter N. Granger, Zillah; Cashier, Charles F. Bailey, Zillah; Chief Engineer, R. K. Tiffany, Zillah; Water Superintendent, W. S. Douglass, Zillah.

The valley between the forks of Cowiche creek has the distinction of being watered by the first constructed and probably the only actually completed storage reservoir in the state. The construction of this was rendered necessary by the fact that the forks mentioned do not head far enough back towards the mountain to supply sufficient water for the extensive areas of alluvial land between them. Unfortunately the reservoir, which is situated on the plateau between Cowiche creek and Naches river, has not sufficient capacity to irrigate more than a small part of the lands under it.

The next irrigation stream as we pass down the Yakima valley is Ahtanum creek, traversing a rich and fertile valley that furnishes homes to scores of well-to-do farmers. The Ahtanum basin was one of the earliest settled portions of the county. Though its soil is not specially bibacious and requires less water than many other soils in central Washington, yet the summer flow is completely utilized for irrigation purposes. Indeed there is a scarcity of water, and as is usually the case under such conditions, some litigation has resulted. A number of attempts have been made to find means to increase the water supply of the valley. In the fall of 1898, Cyrus C. Babb made a thorough exploration of the upper basin of Ahtanum creek in quest of reservoir sites, hoping that the water which passes down during the spring freshet might be conserved for the use of the farmer, but his reconnaissance failed to reveal the existence of any such that were really suitable. Two years later Sidney Arnold sought a solution of the Ahtanum irrigation problem by reconnoitering the Klickitat basin to ascertain whether or not the waters of some of the tributaries of Klickitat river might be led across the divide into Ahtanum valley. His investigation "showed the futility of any diversion from the Klickitat basin into the Ahtanum basin. Gold Fork is lower by at least a thousand feet than the lowest elevation of the divide between it and Ahtanum creek. The lowest point of the divide between the Tietan and Gold Fork, as shown by leveling, is lower by several hundred feet than any point on the Ahtanum-Klickitat divide, so that none of the waters of Gold creek can be carried over to Ahtanum creek."

Lower down the valley on the west side of the Yakima river is the reservoir system of canals which according to report of the State Bureau of Statistics covered 51,000 acres of land, and below this again is the recently constructed Kennewick ditch, a splendid canal, covering between 12,000 and 15,000 acres of the lower Yakima valley.

One of the most interesting if not one of the most extensive and important irrigation areas in Yakima county is the artesian well basin of the Moxee valley. The principal wells are shown by a government plat to be within an extent of territory aggregating not more than six square miles. In this limited area over thirty wells have been sunk in the past ten or twelve years, varying from about six hundred to twelve or thirteen hundred feet in depth. According to a government report the Deeringhoff well, the most important in the basin, was credited at the time of its completion in 1900 with a flow of fifty-six cubic inches. The lands irrigated by all the wells of the basin are shown by the report of the State Bureau of Statistics to have aggregated 2,500,015 acres in 1903.

A general idea of the extent of irrigation in Yakima county, actually accomplished and projected, is furnished by a table in the publication last cited. It shows canals constructed in the upper Yakima valley, as follows: Moxee ditches covering 3,000 acres; Congdon ditch covering 3,000 acres; Selah valley ditch, 5,000 acres; Wenas creek, 10,000 acres; Naches and Cowiche, 3,000; Ahtanum valley, 13,500; Naches valley, 15,000; Washington Irrigation Company's canal, 6,500; artesian wells, 2,915; proposed ditches with the acreage they would cover in the upper valley: Congdon ditch extension, 1,200 acres; Selah valley ditch extension, 1,000; Selah valley high line ditch, 20,000; Sunnyside high line ditch, 5,000; Tietan and Cowiche ditch, 30,000. Of the 74,915 under ditch in the upper valley, 63,115 are shown by the report as under cultivation. The ditches in operation in the lower valley, with the acreage covered by each, are, according to this authority as follows: Reservation systems, 51,000 acres; sub-irrigated lands on reservation, 15,000 acres; Sunnyside canal, 64,000 acres; Prosser Falls ditch, 2,000 acres; Kiona ditch, 3,500 acres; Kennewick ditch, 12,000 acres; lower Yakima ditch, 8,000 acres; total, 150,500 acres, of which approximately 47,600 acres are in cultivation. The proposed ditches in this part are: High line Sunnyside ditch covering 285,000 acres; Prosser Falls extension 1,000 acres; on the reservation: High line from Union Gap (in course of construction at present) 100,000 acres; Simcoe and Toppenish, 7,000 acres; other proposed ditches, 10,000 acres.

From the foregoing it will be seen that, should all the proposed canals be completed, 690,615 acres of land in Yakima county could be irrigated. It appears from the report that of this extensive area only 230,415 acres are under ditch at present, and that only about 110,715 acres are actually in cultivation. It is very evident that the development of the possibilities of irrigation in Yakima county has not more than well begun, and that splendid as are the achievements of the past, they will be dwarfed by those of the future. All these proposed ditches are considered feasible by competent engineers and further reconnoissances may bring to light practical routes for other canals not thought of at the present time. The water supply is abundant, if the difficulties in the way of its distribution can be overcome. "There is more than enough water flowing through Yakima county," says Major J. A. Powell, director of the United States geological survey, "to irrigate every acre of arable land, and in this respect the Yakima valley is exceptionally and especially favored, as its water supply is superior to that of any other region in the west, with but one exception, Boise, Idaho. People can appreciate what this blessing means when they realize the fact that in states like Arizona and Nevada if every drop of running surface water was utilized during the irrigation season, there would not be sufficient to reclaim more than one-half of one per cent of the arid land of those states."

An interesting feature of irrigation work in the Yakima country is the reclamation by the government of a tract of alkali land, lying two and a half miles south of North Yakima. In this tract are twenty-two acres that two years ago were considered fit only for grazing, but by means of the methods used by the Bureau of Soils, Department of Agriculture, fully seventy-five per cent. of the deadly alkali salts have now been removed and before the close of this year (1904) the land will be practically restored to its normal condition at a reasonable cost. This result, so important in its lesson to the people of all irrigated regions, where the alkali problem sooner or later must be met and solved, has been accomplished by a thorough system of drainage and by constant leaching of the soil. The reclamation of alkali lands is a branch of work still in its infancy, the Yakima country being one of the first sections to be favored by a government experiment station. L. Carl Holmes, of the reclamation service, has been in charge of the Yakima experiment since its beginning and to his untiring efforts much of its success is due.

The capabilities of this favored section of our state for human sustenance and wealth production, when all its resources shall have been developed, may be estimated from its productive power under present conditions. One of the most important of irrigated crops in the county is alfalfa, which, according to reports of the department of agriculture, reaches its highest perfection here, the tonnage per acre of the first crop being 3.4 as against one ton in Rhode Island. Three crops are regularly cut in the county, though four may be obtained in the warmest sections, and perhaps not more than two in some of the colder valleys. It is claimed that the ordinary annual yield is seven to nine tons per acre, and that as high as ten and a half have been cut. The county is a heavy exporter of alfalfa and timothy, but much of its product is utilized at home in the feeding of sheep, cattle, hogs and horses. To it must the farmer look for the keeping alive of those master industries of primeval Yakima, cattle and sheep raising, and for the rendering available under present conditions of the wealth of pasturage still existing in hill and mountain. The remaining range lands form a splendid supplement to the cultivated grasses in the feeding of stock, but the day when the gratuitous bounties of nature can be depended upon unaided or almost so for the sustenance of domestic animals is now far in the past. In order to make the cattle business pay the stockman must realize a greater return from each animal than was necessary under the old regime, and this he is doing by keeping finer and more profitable breeds of beef cattle and in many instances by elaborating the products of his herd by making butter and cheese, or by selling the milk. The state food commissioner, E. O. McDonald, is authority for the statement that on December 1, 1903, there were six individual, one farm and two co-operative creameries in the county, and that their aggregate product was 415,425 pounds of butter. No statistics of the manufacture of cheese in the county are at hand, neither are data available for estimating its product of butter other than made in the creameries, but the amount of ranch butter produced is very considerable.

"Yakima is the banner county for sheep raising in the state," says the report of the Bureau of Statistics, Agriculture and Irrigation, "it having according to the last assessment 153,228 of these animals." The sheep industry so far has not undergone much change since its first introduction into the county over three decades ago. Of course, the sheep range has been continually narrowing by the settlement and development of the country, as has the range for cattle, but the only result of this diminution of the open areas has been the curtailment of the industry and the necessity for the feeding of more alfalfa. The Cascade range has so far furnished pasture for these thousands of wool bearers but the difficulty of securing summer feed is increasing every year, owing largely to restrictions imposed by our government upon ranging in forest reserves; and perhaps the day is not far distant when wool growing must cease to be an important industry of the county. It is not unlikely that the raising of the mutton breeds upon alfalfa hay and enclosed alfalfa pastures will be found profitable, as the price of mutton is always remunerative to the producer and the market good. The number and value of different species of live stock in the county as shown by the latest assessment roll is as follows: Horses and mules, 7,441, valued at $148,820; cattle, 19,388, valued at $309,408; sheep, 153,288, valued at $306,456; hogs, 2,065; sheep at $6,195.

Hops are a very important crop of Yakima county's irrigated acres. The product is of superior quality, being rich in lupulin, and the yield is prolific. It is estimated that about 2,000 acres are devoted to hop raising in the county, yielding 1,400 tons annually. The average selling price of last year's crop was perhaps in excess of twenty cents a pound; so that the income of the hop raisers for the season may be estimated at more than $600,000. It may be admitted, however, that the prices received by the growers fluctuate greatly from year to year and that the industry is sometimes not very profitable. The cost of setting out an acre of hops, including the value of the land and the cost of the necessary dry kilns, etc., is said to be about $200 and the expense of putting the hops in the bale will amount to eight cents a pound. The hop picking season is a semi-holiday time in Yakima county, as elsewhere in the state, furnishing a healthful and pleasurable outing as well as considerable profit to those who can spend a month or two among the beautiful vines. The Indians enjoy the season immensely, making it the occasion of much sport and gambling and the display of savage finery. A more picturesque scene can hardly be imagined than is furnished by the streets of North Yakima every Sunday during this period of the year.

"The quality of the Yakima hop," says a North Yakima commercial club publication, "is acknowledged to be the equal of any produced in America, and there is, therefore, a large demand for them in foreign as well as in home markets. Large shipments are made to London, but by far the larger part of the crop finds a market in the cities of the east.

"It has never been necessary to resort to spraying to rid the vines of the vermin that infest them; this eliminates a considerable item of the cost of production. The average yield is about 1,700 pounds per acre; that of the state of New York is about 800 pounds per acre and that of England still less; it is therefore confidently predicted that the Pacific coast will soon produce all of the hops grown in the United States; and if this prediction comes true, the production of Yakima county will be largely increased."

At the prices which obtained last year, the average profits per acre of Yakima hop lands must have exceeded two hundred dollars.

Another staple product of the irrigated lands of Yakima county is the potato. The yield is said to average two hundred and sixty bushels per acre but in a number of instances, between five and six hundred bushels have been harvested. While the price last year was low, from seven to ten dollars per ton, and the profits of course much reduced in consequence, it is claimed that the average price is twelve to thirteen dollars per ton, and that splendid profits can be secured at these figures. In 1901 the price ranged from twenty-two to twenty-seven dollars per ton. In the warm portion of Yakima county, the raising of sweet potatoes is receiving considerable attention, and not a little success is attending efforts to produce profitably this semi-tropical plant.

But one of the most important industries of the county and the one which, perhaps, has the greatest promise for the future is horticulture. "In central Washington," says the last report of the State Bureau of Statistics, Agriculture and Irrigation, "we find five special centers of horticultural industry. They may be named in order of amount of output as follows: 1. Yakima valley and lateral branches from Wenas to Kennewick. 2. The Wenatchee in Chelan county. 3. The portions of Klickitat county bordering on the Columbia river. 4. Lake Chelan. 5. The Kittitas valley. Yakima valley far exceeds any of the others, in fact all combined, in acreage and in amount of value of products." The leading fruit regions of the county are Sunnyside, Zillah and Parker Bottom and the artesian area of the Moxee. The profits of fruit culture are enormous, in some instances almost incredible. In the winters of 1900, 1901 and 1902 the Washington Irrigation Company sent out a number of requests for information as to the profits of individual farms under their canal. The replies they received were in many instances astonishing. One letter read as follows:

"Zillah, Washington, February 7, 1902.

Washington Irrigation Company,

Zillah, Washington.

"Gentlemen—Ten years ago last August I bought eighty acres of land under the Sunnyside canal. I paid twenty-five dollars per acre for the land with the water right. My purpose was to go into the fruit growing business. Accordingly I set out twelve hundred peach trees in the spring of 1892. I put my sons on the land and furnished the capital to start a small nursery. We raised our own trees, except the peach trees mentioned above. Have now three thousand apple trees, some pears, cherries, plums, prunes and apricots, in all about five thousand trees. I would not take two hundred dollars an acre for the land now, for the amount, $16,000 at ten per cent. would not pay as much as the farm.

"Some years are more profitable than others, but the average is high. The past year was one of the most favorable in the history of the valley. If I knew I could have such a year once in five years, and make expenses the other four years, I should consider the fruit business a profitable one; but I know from experience that I can do far better than that.

"My peach crop was light the past season, but the apple crop heavy. I keep an accurate account of all receipts for fruit sold, and find that I received in cash, so far this year, $5,070.73. I have two cars of apples sent out and not reported upon that will bring at least a thousand dollars; then I have about 7,000 boxes of apples on hand that will bring me about $8,000. The total receipts will be about $14,000. All expenses can be paid for $4,000; leaving me net $10,000. My fruit ranch is not for sale at any price.

"Yours respectfully,

F. Walden."

When such profits are to be had in the industry, it is not surprising that the acreage devoted to horticulture is increasing rapidly. Already Yakima county leads the state in the amount of horticultural products shipped out, having surpassed Walla Walla and Whitman counties during the year 1902. Vegetables are produced in large quantities, quite extensive areas in the Indian reservation being leased by whites and devoted to the culture of potatoes, onions, tomatoes, melons, etc. The small fruits are a success, but statistics of yields and profits are not available. The Kennewick country which has recently come into special prominence by reason of the completion of the Northern Pacific Irrigation Company's canal, bids fair to lead all other sections of the Northwest in the matter of early strawberries, its warm climate and the brevity of its winter season giving it a great advantage. Its people claim that it can outdo even the famous Hood River region, of Oregon, in the race to be first in the market with strawberries.

While cattle, sheep, horses, hogs, hay, hops, potatoes, fruit and vegetables are the staple products of Yakima county, several minor industries swell considerably the profits of the farmer and add to his large balance in the overflowing local banks. Many of the smaller agriculturists and horticulturists are keeping bees to sip the honey from alfalfa, fruit blossoms, sage and such other flowering plants as grow in the region. Barnyard fowls are as common here as in other farming communities. The local markets offer splendid inducements for the rearing of chickens, geese, ducks, and turkeys, the first mentioned being especially profitable both for their meat and their eggs. The local demand is not supplied at present and during the winter season it is impossible sometimes to secure fresh ranch eggs at any price. The possibilities of the poultry business in the Yakima valley have hardly begun to be developed, and to the extension of the industry the farmer is impelled by the same incentives furnished by all other agricultural pursuits, namely, unlimited demand at good prices.

As before stated, the unirrigated sections of the county are useful for the pasture they still furnish, after having fed thousands of sheep, cattle and horses for four decades. Some of them have proved themselves worthy of cultivation, and are rewarding the industry of the plowman by pouring into his garner thousands of bushels of wheat annually. The areas devoted to wheat are the upper portions of some of the small valleys, the plateau known as the Rattlesnake hills and the Horse Heaven country. The last mentioned is by far the most extensive and important wheat belt constituting the southeastern part of the county and extending into Klickitat. While the soil is rich and well adapted to wheat raising, the annual precipitation is not sufficient to insure a large yield. Indeed in many parts water has to be hauled for domestic purposes. But by supplying themselves with the most improved labor saving machinery and getting control of large tracts to each individual, the Horse Heaven farmers are making the production of wheat profitable. It is said that the methods of plowing, seeding and harvesting are such that the farmer can realize a handsome profit on a crop of ten bushels to the acre. Of course he must own several hundred acres of land in order to do this, and must have the equipment and the skill to perform all the work with the best economy.

Another natural resource of the county of some importance is its timber. While the eastern side of the Cascades is not covered with a forest growth comparable with that which extends from their summits to the shores of the Pacific, yet there is a very valuable stand on their sunrise slope and eastern spurs, a considerable portion of which is in Yakima county. Part of this timber is, to be sure, within the Ranier forest reserve, but the area thus placed beyond the reach of the lumberman of this generation is small, only one hundred and thirteen square miles, as compared with that not included in the reserve, seven hundred and twenty-three square miles. Of the latter area only ninety-five square miles had been logged in 1900 and thirty-three square miles had been burnt, leaving the total area covered with standing timber at that time five hundred and ninety-five square miles. According to United States geological reports prepared three or four years ago, the amount of timber in the county then was as follows: Fir, 434,838,000 board feet; pine, 320,900,000; hemlock, 77,100,000; cedar, 60,000,000; total, 893,438,000. A number of modern sawmills of large capacity and some smaller ones are engaged in cutting up this timber.

While Yakima has never been a mining county, its citizens have always manifested considerable interest in searching for mineral wealth. Even in the earliest days, pioneer stockmen and prospectors sought among its sage brush hills and bordering mountains for traces of gold, silver and other metals, nor was their search always wholly unrewarded. But the mining interests of the county have always remained insignificant compared with agriculture, horticulture and stock raising. However, Yakima county shares with her neighbors, King, Pierce and Kittitas, the extensive and important Summit mining district, situated at the head of Moore's creek, a tributary of American river. The district is approximately twenty miles square, half on the eastern and half on the western slope of the Cascade range, but the greater part of the mining is carried on on Gold hill, an eastern spur of the great divide. Moore's creek, Union creek, Ranier fork and American river furnish the district with an abundant water supply, and though it is within the Ranier forest reserve, the government permits the taking for mining purposes of necessary timber. Silver creek, a tributary of White river, is the principal mining stream of the western slope.

According to the sworn statement of H. V. Bonniwell, the properties in Summit mining district, with the amount or value or both of work done on each, January 21, 1903, were as follows: Two claims (on Silver creek), owned by Thomas Farrell, of South Tacoma, three hundred dollars; five claims (on Silver creek), James Forrest and L. Height, of South Tacoma, two thousand dollars; three claims (on Silver creek), owned by William Farrell, South Tacoma, forty-five feet of timbering, six hundred dollars; six claims, on head of Silver creek, owned by Forrest & Farrell, South Tacoma, sixty-two feet of shaft, one hundred and four feet of tunneling, seventy feet of open cuts, six thousand dollars; one claim (on Silver creek), owned by Forrest & Farrell, thirty-eight feet of tunneling, twenty feet of open cuts, five hundred and eighty dollars; five claims (on Silver creek), owned by Forrest & Farrell, one hundred and five feet of tunneling, seventy feet of open cuts, one thousand dollars; six claims (part of them on American river and the rest on Moore's creek), owned by the Diamond Hitch Company of Tacoma, one hundred and fifty feet of tunneling, one hundred feet of open cuts, two thousand five hundred dollars; twelve claims (on Gold hill and Silver creek), owned by Addison, Hill & Brown, South Tacoma, one hundred and twenty-five feet of tunneling, fifteen miles of trail, five thousand dollars; sixteen claims (on Silver creek), owned by the Medina Gold Mining Company, of South Tacoma, (data furnished by James Addison, manager), seven hundred feet of tunneling, one hundred and fifty feet of shaft, one mill, five stamps, one hundred feet of flume, cook house and store house, $46,000; ten claims (on the east side of Silver creek), owned by the Florence Mining and Reduction Company, South Tacoma (data furnished by Ben Frazier, treasurer), five hundred and twenty-eight feet of cuts, seventy feet of shafting, five hundred and fifty feet of tunnel and unexpired contract for fifty feet of tunnel, two blacksmith shops, powder house, ore cars and three hundred and thirty-five feet of track, $21,000; six claims (located by Thomas Fife), owned by the Blue Bell Mining Company, of North Yakima (data furnished by John Sawbridge, treasurer), one hundred feet of open cuts, six hundred feet of tunneling, one Jackson machine drill, eight thousand dollars; six claims owned by Fife Mining Company, North Yakima (data furnished by John Sawbridge, secretary), two hundred and twenty-five feet of tunneling, four thousand dollars; eight claims (on Silver creek), owned by J. G. Campbell, North Yakima, four hundred and eighty feet of tunneling, six thousand dollars; fifteen claims (on Gold hill) owned by the Coronation Mining Company, North Yakima, one hundred and forty feet of tunnel, one cabin, five thousand dollars (data concerning the last two properties furnished by John Sawbridge); six claims on Moore's creek (located in 1902 by Joseph Fife), owned by the Rob Roy Consolidated Mining Company of North Yakima, George Collins, secretary, three hundred dollars; five claims (on Moore's creek), owned by the Fidelity Mining & Milling Company, Seattle (data furnished by G. H. Hill, vice president), two hundred foot tunnel, several open cuts, eight thousand dollars; seven claims owned by Elizabeth Gold Hill Mining Company, North Yakima, seven hundred and twenty feet of tunneling, one hundred feet of open cuts, one ditch quarter of a mile long, one undershot water wheel, one No. 1 Sturdevant blower, five hundred and fifty feet of track, ore cars, fifty feet of trestle to ore dump, three buildings, two thousand tons of ore on the dump, twenty-five thousand tons blocked out, plans under way for the building of a 100-ton reduction plant during 1903, expenditure to date $18,000 (data furnished by Frank X. Nagler, North Yakima); twelve claims owned by the Summit Mining & Reduction Company, Tacoma, three hundred and fifty feet of tunneling, thirty feet of shafting, expenditures, eight thousand dollars.

"In regard to the size of the veins and character of the ore," says Mr. Bonniwell, "the Elizabeth Mining Company's property may be taken as characteristic of the district. The matrix of the ore is porphyry, magnesia and lime, carrying values in gold, silver and copper; is amenable to concentration in the proportion of five to one; the size of the ledges varies from a few inches to twenty feet; the Elizabeth ledge in one four hundred foot tunnel has varied from forty-two inches to fourteen feet; the width averages seven and a half feet." It is stated that the ore in the mine assays from $14 to $346.42 a ton, the values being in gold, silver, copper and lead.

Of course, it must be remembered that these figures are now a year old and that during the busy mining season of 1903, the various companies have been at work increasing their excavations and development. Thus the Elizabeth Gold Hill Mining Company has since run two new tunnels one hundred and seventy feet and fifty feet in length, respectively. It is now preparing to install a reduction plant capable of handling its own output and that of other mines of the district. The great need of this mineral bearing region is a road to some point on the railway. Legislative assistance is being sought for the construction of such a highway and it is hoped that an outlet for the ore of the district will soon be secured.

In the foregoing paragraphs an attempt has been made to present a brief outline of the resources of Yakima county. It is not claimed to be an exhaustive one, far from it, but sufficient to show something of the present status of industrial development and the possibilities of the future. The population in 1900, according to the United States census, was 13,462. To say that it is at least half as great again at this writing, is to estimate the increase very conservatively indeed; and the trains are bringing in more homeseekers every day. There is room for all who have the energy to grapple with the situation and win a competence from it for themselves. If it is true that at least 690,615 acres of land in Yakima county can be irrigated and are in fact under proposed irrigation canals, as stated by the last report of the Bureau of Statistics, and if every twenty acres under canal can, by intensive cultivation, be made to support a family of five, it will be seen that the county has a potentiality of supporting an agricultural population of 172,650, besides the mechanics, laborers, merchants, professional men, etc., etc., who, with their families, would be required to build their houses and barns, assist them with their work, educate their children, treat their sick, supply them with dry goods and groceries and otherwise minister to their wants. Is it surprising that in a county with such wonderful possibilities, a present population of perhaps fewer than 20,000 should enjoy an unbounded prosperity? Is it surprising that the farmers are nearly all well to do and many of them wealthy; that the merchants are rapidly accumulating fortunes, that the banks are filled with money and that prosperity abounds on every hand?

KITTITAS* COUNTY.

The most northerly of the three counties of our group is Kittitas, in the central part of the state, hemmed in between the Cascade and Wenatchee mountains on the west and northwest respectively, the Columbia on the east and an artificial boundary following, during a part of its course, the Ump-tanum ridge on the south. As heretofore stated, it contains 2,414 square miles. The surface of the western part is very rugged, possessing a wild beauty greatly enhanced by the presence of four considerable lakes, Kitchelos, Kachees and Cle-Elum and one smaller than any of these, Goose lake. The Yakima river forms the main channel of its drainage, and into it flow numerous tributaries, especially from the north. The basins of this river system, chiefest among which is the celebrated Kittitas valley, furnish practically all the agricultural land of the county, but they are of sufficient extent and richness to enable it to figure prominently in the agricultural production of the state, while the presence of timber, coal, gold, copper and other minerals gives it distinction for the variety of its resources. The presence of the large mining population furnishes the farmer with one great incentive to exertion, a splendid local market for his products, while the Northern Pacific railway, crossing the county in its richest part, gives him ready access to the larger markets east and west.

In a discussion of agriculture in Kittitas county, the Kittitas valley naturally claims a large share of attention. It is oval in shape and approximately twenty-five miles long, while its greatest width is about twenty miles. On all sides, it is hemmed in by foothills and mountains. It possesses a rich soil, well adapted to agriculture, and capable of producing almost any of the products of the temperate zone, and while its climate is such as to permit the raising of all the harder fruits. The upper valley of the Yakima, which is farmed for several miles above Cle-Elum, likewise brings forth a variety of crops, as do also the valleys of all the smaller streams, though of course the altitude increases rapidly as they are ascended, with the natural effect on climate and character of production.

*Charles A. Splawn, who is considered an authority on local Indian dialects, says that the word "Kittitas," comes from "kittit," meaning white chalk, and "tash," place of existence. He states that at the Manastash ford on the Yakima river, below Ellensburg, there is a bank of such chalk. The Indians used this for painting themselves and their horses. The name Kittitash came to be applied by the Indians to the entire valley, and was later corrupted by the whites to Kittitas.

While the Kittitas country is not so completely dependent upon irrigation as are many parts of the Yakima, yet artificial watering of the soil is essential to its highest and most profitable handling, and its inception was almost coeval with the settlement of the country. The profusion of small streams rendered a certain amount of irrigation comparatively easy, and made it possible for a considerable acreage to be redeemed by individual farmers or several of them co-operating together. The history of some of these canals has already found place in these pages. From time to time larger projects came up, one of them being that of the Northern Pacific, Yakima & Kittitas Irrigation Company, which in 1892 made some surveys looking toward the construction of crib dams at the outlets of Lakes Kitchelos, Kachees and Cle-Elum and of large canals covering extensive areas in Kittitas and Yakima counties, but the scheme was not carried into execution. "Several years ago," says George Otis Smith, "a canal was proposed to take water from Yakima river at Easton, and portions of it were constructed. It is known as the Kittitas Valley Irrigation canal, and if completed would have irrigated a large portion of that valley. At present (1901) the valley, which comprises a large amount of arable land well adapted to the cultivation of alfalfa and the cereals, is irrigated solely by local ditches, which use the water from the creeks already mentioned (Swauk, Reeser, Tanum, Manastash, Wilson and Nanum). One of these, Reeser creek, receives some water which has been diverted into its channel from First creek, one of the tributaries of Swauk creek. This diversion is interesting, as the water is made to follow the old, abandoned waterway through Green canyon. Some attempt has been made to improve the water supply of Manastash creek, a small dam having been built at the mouth of Manastash lake, so that a small amount of water is stored at that point."

But the day of large irrigation enterprises has dawned for Kittitas county since Mr. Smith made his report. In 1902 the Cascade Canal Company was organized to succeed the Inter-Mountain Irrigation Association. Its capital stock was $150,000 and the object it proposed to itself was the construction of two large canals to irrigate, one 15,000 and one 30,000 acres of Kittitas valley lands. The officers of this association are: President, Samuel T. Packwood; vice president, J. H. Smithson; secretary, Ralph Kauffman; treasurer, J. C. Hubbell; manager,

J. E. Frost. The company decided to build the lower canal first and on August 29, 1903, began its construction. Its intake is on the north bank of the Yakima river five miles west of Thorp. It follows down the north side to Kittitas valley proper, then takes a southeasterly course through it to a point about ten miles southeast of Ellensburg, where its terminus is. At the intake it is ten feet wide on the bottom, has a one and a half to one slope, is five feet deep and has a capacity of 170 cubic feet per second. Between five and six miles of fluming have been constructed, necessitating the use of more than two million feet of lumber. In the eighth mile of its course, a six hundred foot tunnel was required, and directly north of Ellensburg there is another tunnel three hundred and eighty-eight feet long. The company has also built a dam at Lake Kachess, capable of storing a body of water twelve feet deep, covering an area of twenty-one square miles. The Cascade canal, into which water was turned May 13, 1904, is said to be one of the best constructed aqueducts in the state and a credit to Manager J. E. Frost, upon whose shoulders has rested the responsibility of personally supervising the work. Plans are not yet matured for the construction of the high line ditch, which will cover 30,000 acres or practically all the irrigable land in the valley except such as could be redeemed only by a very expensive canal.

"The Lower Cascade canal," says the Pacific Northwest, "is strictly a Kittitas county project, and the capital stock of the company is held entirely in Kittitas county. The president of the corporation is Mr. Packwood, a large land owner and stock raiser of the Kittitas valley. The officers of the Washington State Bank, of Ellensburg, hold a large amount of stock in it, and farmers along the line of the proposed canal are also stockholders."

The completion of this large canal will cause material changes in the general character and quantity of the agricultural production of Kittitas county, but its past achievements have already given it a prominent place among the political divisions of the state. Its oldest industry is stock raising, which here as elsewhere has undergone various changes with the development of the country, the trend of the industry being toward the substitution of well bred dairy cattle for the old range stock so that a greater percentage of profit may be secured. The limiting of the open range by the settlement of the country and other causes have made this necessary.

P. Henry Schnebly, a pioneer of 1872, and one of central Washington's leading cattlemen and wealthiest citizens, estimates the number of neat cattle in the county at 15,000 or 16,000, three-fifths of which are dairy stock. The remainder are Herefords and Shorthorns with some Polled Angus and Galloways, all grade cattle. Among the largest owners are George B. Cooke and Charles Bull, partners, who are pioneers of the valley of the early seventies. They have between 1,300 and 1,400 head on their Quilameen farm twenty miles east of Ellensburg and on their thirty or forty sections of grazing land in the foothills and on the Columbia.

P. H. Schnebly, whose large ranches lie east of Ellensburg, the first being eight miles out, has 1,200 head and twenty sections of grazing land. His home place, the old Smith ranch, is eleven miles from Ellensburg.

M. D. Cooke, owner of the Fairview ranch, comes next with eight hundred head and the remaining beef cattle of the county are owned mostly by Nels Cragness, William Erickson, Frank Hartman and fifty or seventy-five others in herds ranging from fifty to three hundred in number. The annual sale of beef cattle in Kittitas county is approximately 3,000 head, worth at present prices about $38 each on the average.

"The cattle industry has maintained an even course for many years," says Mr. Schnebly, "and there is probably as much invested in it now by Kittitas citizens as ever before. In early days the cattle were low grade and herded in great bands; now the majority of the stock is better than the average and considerable is high grade.

"In early times the Kittitas was the great summer range for Yakima stockmen and so was occupied almost exclusively by a class of men whose home was constantly changing. F. Mortimer Thorp was perhaps the first large cattle owner who made his home in the valley and Benjamin Snipes, the cattle king, also lived here many years. It is difficult to estimate the largest number of cattle ever gathered in the county, but it would probably be written in six figures, as Kittitas was an excellent and popular summer range.

"As the range has been fenced in, the stockmen have bought railroad land and otherwise obtained possession of vast tracts upon which to pasture their herds. The whole Columbia river slope is now in the hands of these stockmen, and there the only range in the county exists, except that found in the foothills. The feeding season usually lasts about three and a half months."

But the greater number of Kittitas county's herds are maintained for the sake of butter and cheese, rather than for their beef. Kittitas ranks second in the state in the dairy industry, King county surpassing it by reason of the fact that great quantities of Kittitas cream are shipped there. No good and permanent reason exists why this county should not lead in the state, as for several years it did, for it is by nature better adapted to the industry than its principal competitor.

While more or less butter has been manufactured from the first, the dairy business did not begin to assume a place among the most important industries of the county until 1891, when James Gass brought in the first cream separator, erected a small creamery, the Bourbon, just north of Ellensburg and established skimming stations throughout the valley.

The inauguration of this enterprise was most opportune, as the dairy industry proved to many of the farmers the means of salvation from financial shipwreck during the hard times. The industry soon enlisted the attention and energies of the forceful and enterprising Briggs F. Reed, the present president of the State Dairymen's Association, who had been for years engaged in cattle and horse raising in the valley. He investigated the matter thoroughly, and upon becoming convinced of the splendid field for such an enterprise in his home county, formed a local company in 1894 for the purchase and operation of the Bourbon plant. This his association, the Ellensburg Creamery Company, rebuilt on a larger scale. As illustrating the growth of the business, it may be said that the product of the creamery the first year was 40,000 pounds of butter, in 1895, 90,000; in 1896, 126,000; in 1897, 200,000; in 1900, 485,000.

The Cloverdale Creamery, at Thorp, was the second in the county, erected by John Goodwin in 1893. It was conducted successfully under his management until 1900, when it was absorbed by the Kittitas Creamery.

The Cloverdale Creamery did not long antedate the Spring Creek Creamery, established by J. P. Sharp in West Kittitas. Its production had reached 125,000 pounds of butter in 1899, when it was absorbed by the Ellensburg Company, by which it is still operated.

In 1898 the Hazelwood Company, of Spokane, established a creamery near Ellensburg, installing what is perhaps the best plant ever built in the county. It passed into the hands of the Ellensburg Creamery Company a year or two later. Many smaller plants have been started from time to time, all of which eventually passed into the hands of Mr. Reed and his company, which in 1900 controlled the entire industry in this county. Soon, however, the Kittitas Company was organized and began building up a large business. Its officers at present are Simon P. Wippel, president and manager; Fred Wippel, vice president. It has a plant on West Fifth street, Ellensburg, and one at Thorp.

A third company, the Alberta Co-operative Creamery Association, of which W. T. Morrison is president and A. E. Shaw, secretary and manager, was organized a year ago last March by about seventy-five farmers. Its main plant is situated about five miles northeast of Ellensburg and it has one skimming station the same distance southeast of town. It ships most of its butter to the Sound.

The dairying industry of the county has declined considerably in recent years, owing to the high price obtaining for hay, which has caused many farmers to reduce their herds of milch cows or to go out of the business entirely. But that the production of creamery butter is still large may be seen from the following statistics, furnished the state dairy commissioner:

Kittitas creamery, from December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1903: pounds of milk received, 3,971,780; pounds of cream received, 106,900; paid to patrons for same, $54,144.10; pounds of butter made, 239,522.

Alberta creamery, from April 10, 1903, to December 1, 1903: pounds of milk received, 1,745,827; pounds of cream received, 9,425; paid to patrons for same, $17,793.89; pounds of butter made, 83,128.50.

Ellensburg creamery, from December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1903: pounds of milk received, 6,335,000; pounds of cream received, 94,326; paid to patrons for same, $94,622.63; pounds of butter made, 332,711.

Kittitas county butter has for many years taken a higher rank than any other in the Seattle market in point of quality. It is claimed that it commands a higher price than is obtained for butter in any other section of the United States.

The sheep industry, like cattle raising, is an old business in Kittitas county and one which, in its original form, has seen its best days. It is estimated that the number of wool bearing quadrupeds owned by Kittitas residents at present is between 35,000 and 40,000, though there are four or five times as many in the county during the summer seasons, as numerous outside sheepmen seek the ranges of the Wenatchee mountains and the forest reserve during the warm months. The annual production of wool by Kittitas growers is estimated at 340,000 pounds. The leading producers at present are Malcolm McLennan, whose bands aggregate 7,000 head; John Smithson, who has 6,000 or 7,000; J. C. Lloyd, with 6,500; and O. K. Kohler, Robert Scammon, William Dunsforth, Henry Toner and Ben Hicks, with from 2,500 to 3,000 head each.

Of course, the same conditions which encourage the rearing of cattle and sheep make the raising of horses and mules also profitable, while the hog is a necessity to the dairy man who would get the largest profit out of his business. According to the last report of the county assessor, Kittitas has 4,584 horses and mules, valued at $115,475; 16,000 cattle, valued at $292,000; 59,000 sheep, valued at $119,000; 2,000 hogs, valued at $6,920; the aggregate value of lands and improvements was fixed at $1,788,115; the assessment of personal property, $1,520,552; total assessment of the county, $4,336,542.

An agricultural industry which has grown enormously during the past few years under the stimulus furnished it by a strong demand and high price is the culture of hay. The Kleinberg Brothers, who are large shippers of this commodity, estimate the product of the valley at 60,000 tons, all harvested from irrigated acres, except a small amount produced on bottom lands. Timothy, clover and alfalfa are all raised, though the first mentioned is the principal crop for export. It is in great demand in the Alaska market, and not a little of it goes to the Philippine Islands, and to China and Japan. The Kittitas product is considered excellent in quality and commands the highest price. At this writing it is quoted at twenty dollars a ton, F. O. B., at Ellensburg.

The high price of hay has not only caused a decline in the dairy industry, but it has doubtless affected also the production of wheat and other cereals. The Kittitas valley lands long since demonstrated their power to produce the cereals in great abundance. In the Spokane Times of May 22, 1880, is an article by D. Thomas in which he said:

"The largest and richest body of vacant land is near Kittitas postoffice, in the southeast part of the valley. It would have all been occupied before this time but for the lack of water to irrigate it, but the postmaster at the above place, an experienced farmer, raised there last year a good crop without irrigation. . . . Wheat averaged last year about forty bushels to the acre and some went up even as high as eighty bushels to the acre."

The raising of cereal crops increased as time went on until in 1899, according to the statement of the Ellensburg Dawn, "fully 20,000 acres of wheat were harvested in the county, which averaged (by estimate) thirty bushels per acre. There were 3,200 acres of oats harvested, which was estimated at forty-five bushels per acre." No statistics of the productions of recent years are available, but it is quite probable that if such were at hand, they would show a marked decline in cereal raising, owing to the development of other and more profitable industries.

There are, however, four flouring mills in the county. Of these perhaps the largest and best equipped is that of R. P. Tjossem & Son, at Holmes Siding, two and a half miles south of Ellensburg on Wilson creek. It was built in 1900 to take the place of a very old one of about the same capacity, one hundred barrels, which was burned. The mill is operated by water power from an immense reservoir and dam. The City Mills, Ellensburg, owned by the City Milling & Realty Company, are likewise capable of producing a hundred barrels daily, but they are not in operation more than three-fourths of the time. The mill, which is also run by water power, was built during the years 1887 and 1888. Kendall & Mack are owners of a forty-barrel water power mill at Thorp, built during the seventies. It runs about half the year. The Spring Brook Mills, of which W. T. Morrison is proprietor, have been shut down for the past twelvemonth. When in operation, they utilize the water of Wilson creek to generate power and manufacture a brand of flour known as the "Valley Patent."

These mills use annually about 300,000 bushels of wheat, three-fourths of which, however, is imported, as the Kittitas product gives a yellowish flour, fit only for the Oriental trade. They also use 600 tons of barley, half of it being the product of Kittitas farms. Of the $200,000 received annually by these mill owners, one-fourth comes from resident consumers and the rest from China, Japan, and Puget sound points.

The climate and soil of Kittitas valley render it especially adapted to the raising of all kinds of hardy vegetables. Potatoes, onions, turnips, beets, etc., all prove wonderfully prolific, and usually command prices which give their cultivator an abundant reward for his labor. The potato is especially profitable at present, the current quotation being twenty dollars a ton, though of course this is greatly in excess of the usual price. It has been claimed that during the year 1902, the shipments of potatoes by the three principal shippers of Ellensburg returned more than $161,000 to the pockets of the producers.

Fruit tree culture in the Kittitas valley is almost coeval with settlement, but though its practicability has long since been established, it has not been carried on extensively heretofore, owing to the dominance of other industries. One of the first orchards, perhaps the first, in the valley was that of Charles P. Cooke, who transplanted twelve or fifteen trees from the Moxee valley to his Kittitas farm twelve and a half miles northeast of Ellensburg, when he first came there in 1870. These trees are still bearing. Another orchard was planted by William Lven in 1871 and about that time or a little later F. M. Thorp set out a few trees. In 1874 Thomas Goodwin set out between two and three acres of apple and peach trees on his place six miles west of Ellensburg, and there were a number of other orchards planted during the early seventies. But no fruit was raised for export until recent years, and then very little. However, the success of experimenters has led to the setting out of larger orchards, and we may safely assume that the acreage devoted to fruit culture will rapidly extend. The construction of large irrigation ditches will surely have a tendency to cause an expansion in this industry, as in all other forms of intensive agriculture.

S. W. Maxey estimates the number of fruit trees in full bearing in Kittitas county at present at about 50,000, eighty per cent. of them being apple trees, the rest pear, cherry, plum and prune, with a few early peach trees. Many of the bearing orchards are still young, but Kittitas county has nevertheless made a few shipments of their products, perhaps the largest being in 1902, when three cars of Transcendent crab apples were sent to Montreal. This fruit proved perfectly satisfactory to its consumers.

Mr. Maxey tells us that Washington's fruit exhibit at the World's Fair in 1893, of which he was in charge, was contiguous to that of Canada, and that fruit men who compared the late keepers grown in Washington with those from Ontario were unanimous in the opinion that the former were fully the equal of the latter in every respect, and much superior in point of size. The significance of this is apparent when we remember that Ontario has a world-wide reputation for hardy apples, capable of being shipped to great distances from their native soil.

As a result of the success of experiments many Kittitas people are beginning to take a deep interest in fruit culture. Two large fruit enterprises are now under way in the county, one a 100-acre apple orchard east of Ellensburg; the other a forty-acre orchard, likewise devoted exclusively to apples. It seems to the writer that the people of Kittitas are to be congratulated on the fact that the adaptability of their section in soil and climate to the production of fruits and vegetables has been demonstrated. It means that when the time shall come, the division of the land into small tracts for intensive cultivation and the support of a large population will prove entirely feasible and that therefore their county is in a position to enjoy an almost limitless development as the increasing needs of the expanding west, with its ever widening trade relationships, shall call for it.

Another important resource of Kittitas county is its timber. According to the report of Henry Gannet, of the United States geological survey, the merchantable timber area of the county is 2,000 square miles; the logged area sixty-seven, and the burned area ten. His estimate of timber on these forest lands is as follows: Yellow pine, 504,000,000 board feet; fir, 504,000,000; larch, 252,000,000; total, 1,260,000,000. The logged area, Mr. Gannet informs us, is west of Ellensburg and in patches in the mountains in the neighborhood of the Northern Pacific railway. Of course, much of this timber is in the reserve.

At present there are nine sawmills in the county. Those of Fred Musser, Wright Brothers and Wright Brothers & Miller are in and around Cle-Elum. They are said to have daily capacities of 8,000 feet, 10,000 feet and 10,000 feet respectively. The Northwestern Improvement Company's mill at Roslyn has a capacity of 20,000 feet per day, but its output is for the exclusive use of its owners in their mining operations. At Thorp are the mills of Louis Ellison and J. L. Mills & Son, each having a capacity of 8,000 feet per day, while in Ellensburg is the mill of the Ellensburg Lumber Company, of which Orrin W. Sinclair is manager. Its capacity is 15,000 feet. Albert Emerson's mill in the valley is not in operation at present and that of John Blomquist, on Swauk creek, runs only part of the time, but each is capable of turning out 8,000 feet per diem. All the sawmills of Kittitas county use steam power.

The progress of our review of the Kittitas county of today has brought us now to one of its major industries, and one which directly lends support to all the others, namely, mining. The search for the buried treasures of the earth was begun early and has been prosecuted with considerable persistency and zeal and not without substantial results, chiefest among which so far is the uncovering and development of a vast coal bearing area. The early history of the coal mines may be found elsewhere in this volume, but a few words are here in place regarding the mines in their present state of development. Mention has been made of the interest taken by the Northern Pacific Railway Company in the prospecting of the Roslyn country during the eighties. Later exploration and development have established the fact that the coal field then discovered is the most extensive and valuable in the state. It occupies the valley of the Yakima near the confluence of that river with the Cle-Elum. Its two most important veins are known as the Roslyn and Cle-Elum. "It is still an open question," says the annual report of the state geologist for 1902, "whether or not the two veins are identical, and this problem has a most important bearing on the future of the field. It is generally believed, however, that the Cle-Elum vein is a different one from the Roslyn and lies several hundred feet higher in the series. The strata dip to the southwest at an angle varying from ten to fifteen degrees. The outcrop of the Roslyn vein makes an exceedingly tortuous line along the mountain side northeast of the two towns of Roslyn and Cle-Elum. Its general direction, however, is southeast and northwest. The rocks have not been greatly folded or faulted and the coal has been but little disturbed. It is quite hard and compact and nearly all of it reaches the market as lump coal. It is used very largely as a steam coal for locomotives and steamships and supplies very much of the market of eastern Washington. Idaho and Oregon for steam and domestic coal. Large quantities are shipped to Puget sound, Portland, San Francisco and even Honolulu. The Northern Pacific Railway uses it exclusively in its locomotives as far east as Helena, Montana. The Great Northern Railway heretofore has had a large standing order for Roslyn coal, but within the past few months it has completed a line of its own to the Crow's Nest coal field, of British Columbia, and is now using that coal chiefly on all its lines in Washington, Idaho and Montana."

Practically the entire coal basin of Kittitas county is under the control of the Northwestern Improvement Company, successors to the Northern Pacific Coal Company, which owns the Roslyn mine and has the Cle-Elum under lease. There are, however, several small, independent companies in the area, one of which, the Ellensburg Coal Company, supplies, in part at least, the local market.

The Roslyn mine, the king of the district, employs approximately 1,500 men and produces at present 90,000 tons a month. Slavs and Italians form the majority of the miners, receiving for their labor eighty-five cents per long ton. Drivers receive $2.35 to $2.50 a day of ten hours, and timbermen, $3.00. Five mines exist on the Roslyn vein: No. 1, abandoned; No. 2, the principal one worked; No. 3, at Ronald, abandoned; No. 4, in operation; No. 5, between Cle-Elum and Roslyn, now being opened.

The pillar and room system of extracting the coal is in use. According to C. F. Brenn, chief civil engineer, there are now about seven miles of mule haul, four of electric haul and three of wire rope haul, and the latest improvements are used in all the mines. Three electric and two steam fans, with what is known as the "double entry" system, make them the best ventilated in the state. The output of the Roslyn mines from December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1903, was 1,032,070 tons.

At the Cle-Elum mine, four hundred men are employed and the output at present approximates 30,000 tons a month. From December 1, 1902, to December 1, 1903, it produced 320,726 tons. Being under the same management as the Roslyn mine, it is operated on the same general principles. Speaking of it and its situation in 1902, Henry Landes, state geologist, said:

"The town of Cle-Elum is on the main line of the Northern Pacific Railway and has an elevation of 1,900 feet above sea level. A branch line three and a half miles long runs to Roslyn, which is about 300 feet higher than Cle-Elum. On the north side of the valley a ridge of sandstone parallels the river and rises about 1,900 feet above the stream. On the south side of the valley a ridge of basalt rises 2,500 feet above the valley floor. Several clearly marked gravel terraces occur on each side of the river, rising by steps to the base of the mountains. These heavy gravel deposits cover the coal bearing rocks and serve to obscure the outlines of the coal basin.

"The Cle-Elum mine is opened by a shaft and a tunnel at the base of the mountain on the northern outskirts of the town. The shaft is 250 feet deep. The vein is four feet six inches wide and is practically all clean coal. The dip of the vein varies from twelve to twenty-three degrees to the southward. From the bottom of the slope four levels have been run, the longest of which is about 5,000 feet. Only one fault has been encountered in the mine, a small overthrust between the first and second levels. The daily production at present is seven or eight hundred tons, and the mine is rapidly being put in shape for a more extensive output. The mine was opened in 1896. In 1902 the amount of coal mined was 212,584 tons."

Naturally the question of the permanence of the mines of the Roslyn-Cle-Elum district is fraught with great interest to the people of Kittitas county and, indeed, of central Washington generally. Upon this subject C. F. Brenn, chief civil engineer for the Northwestern Improvement Company, wrote as follows in the Ellensburg Dawn of December 27, 1902:

The only veins that are considered valuable, at present, are the Roslyn vein, which is about five feet thick, and a vein which is known as the "Big Dirty," nineteen feet thick. The "Big Dirty" is not mined at present, on account of the cheaper Roslyn vein, but before the Roslyn vein is exhausted washeries will be installed which will make the "Big Dirty" vein an exceedingly valuable one. The Luhrig coal washers on the market at the present day are wonderful machines and are almost perfect in operation, removing over ninety per cent. of rock, bone and dirt, without losing a particle of coal and at an almost insignificant cost per ton of coal washed.

As the price of coal rises, other of the five remaining veins may be worked but they are disregarded as valuable now only because there is such a great quantity in sight in the other two veins. The five remaining veins aggregate about fifteen feet of coal, three veins of about three feet each, one of two and one of four feet of coal. The total thickness of coal bearing formation is two thousand five hundred feet, with all the known valuable veins in the upper one thousand feet.

In order to estimate the value and importance of Kittitas county as a coal producer, we will consider only the two veins mentioned above, i. e., the Roslyn vein and the Big Dirty vein. The total thickness of coal in these two veins is twenty-four feet, and, assuming this thickness over one hundred square miles of country, will give us one billion five hundred million tons as available for the market. This amount, at the present rate of extracting five thousand tons per day or one million five hundred thousand tons per year of three hundred working days, will last one thousand years. The work that has been done in this field in the last sixteen years, since systematic operation was in force, is but a scratch in this immense storage house, for the total number of tons mined since it was discovered amounts to but six million six hundred thousand tons in round numbers. This tremendous supply of coal places the Roslyn coal field, and therefore Kittitas county, easily in front rank of rich and permanent coal producers. The lay of the measures with its moderate pitch makes every ton available, as the veins probably will nowhere be deeper than fifteen hundred or two thousand feet, which combined with the light pitch, of only about sixteen degrees, will make it possible to reclaim every ton of coal.

The firm hold this coal has in the markets of the world will assure Kittitas county a permanent place in the industrial activity of the state. A county that has a coal supply which will last a thousand years and which ships its coal to almost every city on the coast and to the Hawaiian Islands, as well as supplying almost all of the large Asiatic and coastwise steamers, besides many of our war vessels, will of necessity take a leading place in the state.

CLE-ELUM DISTRICT.

The greater portion of the county's mineral region is embraced in the Cle-Elum district, wherein discoveries of gold, silver, copper and iron ledges have been made that must lead to the conclusion that this district is one of the richest in the Cascade range. Owing to its refractory ores and its lack of good transportation facilities, however, the mines of this region are nearly all in a prospective condition. The presence of superior ore bodies has been indisputably proven, but their exploitation has hardly yet commenced. This year it is expected that more will be done than ever before toward uncovering these rich ledges to the world and organizing for their development.

For more than two decades prospecting and development work on a small scale has been going on in the Cle-Elum region. Of course, the discovery of coal in the region for a long time absorbed all interest, but its ultimate effect was to encourage rather than discourage the search for other minerals.

The district lies within easy reach of both Cle-Elum and Roslyn, good wagon roads leading from both cities into it. Regarding this district "Mining in the Pacific Northwest," edited by L. K. Hodges of Seattle and issued in 1897, says:

"The great belt of copper and gold ledges which runs through the backbone of the Cascade range crops with great strength on the mountains drained by the Cle-Elum river and extends north-eastward across the Teanaway to the base of Mount Stuart and west to Lake Kachess. In the same belt are many ledges of quartz carrying free gold and sulphurets, with galena in its various forms. Farther southeast, down the course of the river, is a belt of pyrites ledges capped with hematite and magnetic iron, which have caused them for years to be mis-called the Cle-Elum iron mines. The district has been legally organized and extends from the headwaters of the river to Cle-Elum lake and from Lake Kachess on the west to the Teanaway divide on the east. Recent discoveries have, however, extended beyond the latter line to a connection with the Negro Creek unorganized district among the foothills of Mount Stuart.

"The country rock of the district is granite, syenite, porphyry and slate, with dykes of serpentine, and the mineral ledges cut in a generally northwest and southeast direction, with some cross ledges running east and west. Discoveries in this district began about 1881, when A. P. Boyls, the present venerable but vigorous mining recorder, in company with S. S. Hawkins and Moses Splawn, traveled up Camp creek and on Hawkins mountain traced three parallel ledges carrying iron sulphurets. From that time forward prospecting traced the belt twenty miles down the Cle-Elum from its head and east and west for fifteen miles, as already outlined."

Undoubtedly the best developed property in the district is the Aurora group of five claims on Mammoth mountain, owned by John and Timothy Lynch, which carry high-grade gold and silver ore. Mammoth mountain is composed mainly of metamorphic rock, cut diagonally by dikes of granite in which are fissure ledges of quartz running east and west. Lynch Brothers, in 1896, erected a mill of four 320-pound stamps and one four-foot concentrator. This mill is used principally for sampling purposes. A 1,000-foot tunnel has been driven to strike the ledge under an old shaft, which will give the mine a depth of 600 feet and is expected to tap some very rich ore. A crew of men is working upon the property continually.

The King Solomon is another valuable property upon which steady development is taking place. This mine lies on a sharp granite peak at the head of one of the forks of the Icicle, but is reached by a trail branching off for three miles from the Cle-Elum road, and is owned by James Grieve, K. W. Dunlap and August Sasse. The ledge cuts through this peak in a north and south course and is of white quartz, fully eight feet wide. It carries galena, antimonial silver and gold with a trace of copper and will assay an average of more than $125 in gold. A water jacket smelter was erected on this property several years ago, but failed in its object. The King Solomon has been well developed by several hundred feet of tunnel and many open cuts and this year will be further developed.

Another company in the district that is bending its energies toward placing the mines upon a working basis is the Fortune Mining & Smelting Company of Spokane, organized April 5, 1899, with a capitalization of 2,100,000 shares of which 2,000,000 are being sold for development purposes. The company's officers are all well known Spokane business and professional men: President, Dr. R. N. Jackson; vice president, Judge William E. Richardson; secretary, M. A. Dehuff; treasurer and general manager, George W. Daines. The company owns three large mines, two of which are in eastern Oregon and the other, consisting of nineteen claims, in the Cle-Elum and Leavenworth Mining districts, Kittitas and Chelan counties, Washington. The property lies on the divide at the head of Fortune creek. The mineral zone in which it lies is from five to twelve miles wide and extends through the Index country up into British Columbia; in this zone are some of the best prospects in the state. The company's mine will be opened by tunnels, good tunnel sites being the rule rather than the exception in the region, owing to the precipitous mountains there, and water power will be used, of which there is an almost inexhaustible supply. To the east of this mineral zone is Mount Stuart and to the west the Goat mountains, between which the general formation seems to be a Laurentian granite. There are eleven distinct veins on the Fortune property, several of which are from one to three hundred feet wide, and have the appearance of true fissure or contact veins. The Fortune lode is an immense quartz cropping fully 5,000 feet long and from 100 to 300 feet wide, carrying values in gold, silver and copper; the Golden Chariot's croppings are over 3,000 feet long and from 40 to 150 feet in width; the Jackson lode has been traced for nearly 2,800 feet, and is exceedingly rich in copper and gold; the Silver Tip is from four to eight feet wide and 500 feet long. Besides numerous prospect tunnels to prove the value of the ledges, the company has run a tunnel 1,400 feet long, which cuts the Fortune lode at a depth of between 700 and 800 feet. In its course this tunnel cuts seven distinct veins from two to thirty feet wide, one of which is exceedingly rich in gold, assaying as high as $1,750 per ton. Stopping levels in this tunnel have been run on the sixteen and thirty foot ledges. The Jackson lode has been opened by five different tunnels for a distance of 600 feet, and wherever cut the same rich ore body has been found, averaging from $10 to $88 in gold and copper. On the Silver Tip ledge a tunnel has been run 650 feet in length, reaching a depth of between 300 and 400 feet and giving values from $3 to $60 per ton. The company has sufficient ore blocked out to keep a smelter busy for years to come and is now devoting its energies to the erection of reduction works. Good cabins have been erected on the property, a fine shaft house has been built and a first-class hoisting plant is in operation. The Fortune property is without doubt a leading property in the district.

The Vanemps property, owned by Leavenworth and Seattle capitalists, is another Fortune creek mine that is being rapidly and thoroughly developed. The company expects to reach the ledge, for which they are driving a tunnel, within the next 500 or 600 feet. This tunnel, when completed, will be 1,000 feet long. The mine lies just over the Fortune creek divide on the Mount Stuart, or west, side. A force of twelve men is engaged in developing the property.

The H. O. Helm syndicate, formed a year ago by eastern capitalists, also has a force of men at work on its properties, known as the Grizzly Bear group, in which are about fifteen claims, carrying the same grade of ore which is characteristic of the district.

One of the wonders of the district is a quicksilver mine, recently uncovered. At the head of Boulder creek on the summit of the ridge between Teanaway and Cle-Elum rivers is a great porphyry dike, carrying this cinnabar ore, running east and west. It is fully one hundred feet wide and on the west side spreads to a width of not less than 110 feet on the Keystone claim. This great dike is crosscut by quartz ledges from four feet upwards in width, carrying copper, gold, silver and nickel. The Keystone group, consisting of six claims, is owned by the Washington Quicksilver Mining Company, of Ellensburg, incorporated in December, 1903, with the following officers, all substantial Kittitas business men: John Somers, president; Adolph Elsner, vice-president; Gerrit d'Ablaing, secretary and manager; Charles H. Flummerfelt, treasurer; John Somers, Adolph Elsner, Cornelius J. Vanderbilt, Charles H. Flummerfelt and Gerrit d'Ablaing, trustees; capital, $1,500,000. The property consists of the following claims: the Keystone, Nickel, Cottontail, Keystone Fraction, the Clawson and the Green Bear claims. The main ledge is from 20 to 110 feet in width and carries cinnabar assaying from 8 to 23.50 per cent. of quicksilver, and from $2.40 to $15 in gold. A recent assay by Thomas Price & Son, of San Francisco, showed 23.53 per cent. of quicksilver, which is equivalent to 470.6 pounds per ton of ore. The property is as yet developed only by open cuts and short tunnels, but upon each claim a showing has been made which gives promise of immense richness. The current year will witness a great amount of development work upon this unique mine.

Among other prominent mines and prospects of the district upon which sufficient work has been done to prove the existence of rich ore bodies are the following groups and single claims: The Dutch

Miller, Tip, Top, Mountain Chief, Queen of the Hills, Ruby King, Mary, Gamblers, Dream, Snow Camp, Eureka, Ida Elmore, Sure Thing, Grand View, Epha, Cascade, Silver Dump, Maud O., Beaver, Wright, Cinnabar, Huckleberry, Gallaher's group of twenty claims upon which a small smelter will probably be erected this summer, Washington Copper Preferred Company's group, H. Robbin's property, the Westfall, Currency, the Cle-Elum Hawk, Groundhog, Copper King, Vidette, the Paddy-Go-Easy, Golden Rule, American Eagle, Early Bird, Ella, and many others.

Each year sees a greater development of the district, the discovery of more rich prospects and a steady advance in installing machinery, erecting buildings, etc. The erection of a smelter at some point on or near the railroad is expected, for the presence of large and exceedingly rich bodies of refractory ores has been proven beyond a doubt.

By the creation of Chelan county, Kittitas lost several small mining districts, the most prominent of which was the well known Peshastin, lying on the Wenatchee slope. This old district has been a producer for more than forty years, first of placer gold, then of quartz and the base metals. The rich Mount Stuart copper district, as yet in a prospective stage, is also practically all located in Chelan county.

THE SWAUK.

Kittitas county's noted gold camp, the Swauk district, lies in the foothills of the Cascade range, twenty-five miles northwest of Ellensburg, upon the stream whose name it bears. The district is easily accessible, either from Cle-Elum by a good wagon road sixteen miles to Liberty, the center of the district, or by an equally good wagon road from Ellensburg, a distance of thirty-six miles from Liberty. From Liberty roads radiate to the several small creeks, and so open are the valley and hillside lands that in many places a buggy may be driven through the woods. The whole region is strikingly beautiful with its magnificent pine and fir groves, grassy plains, sloping uplands and low divides, while it is noted far and wide for its pure water and healthy, invigorating climate. Liberty is the district's business point and postoffice, a village of perhaps a hundred inhabitants.

As the history of this old mining camp has been given full attention in the general chapters of the county's history wherein is told the story of discovery and early exploitation, it is necessary to touch but lightly upon that period. Gold was discovered on Swauk creek in the fall of 1867 by Benton Goodwin, a deaf mute. However, its importance was not then realized even by the discoverer. In 1873 Mr. Goodwin again found gold on Discovery bar and from this the real development of Swauk dates. For a few years a small though extremely successful and lively camp resulted; then the placer leads were lost and for a decade the distract was all but abandoned. The present prosperity of the camp dates from the middle eighties. The present district was organized at a meeting held in John Black's cabin, May 7, 1884, attended by the following pioneer miners: D. L. Evans, chairman; G. L. Howard, secretary; John Black, Luke McDermott, T. Lloyd Williams, S. Bandy, James A. Gilmour, Zeb Keller, Moses M. Emerson, James Boxall, Daniel May, J. C. Pike, W. H. Elliott, Thomas F. Meagher, L. McClure, A. J. Wintz, Louis Quietsch.

One of the incidents that led to the rejuvenation of the district was the discovery in 1884 of the old channel on Williams creek by Thomas F. Meagher, Louis Quietsch and J. C. Pike, who had spent considerable time prospecting for it. This old channel runs a little south of west and north of east and is cut diagonally by the present channel about a mile from the mouth of Williams creek. The gold is all coarse, and in flat, smooth nuggets, one of which is said to have weighed 17½ ounces. The discovery of this old channel was made on Discovery claim. Edward and William Taylor and H. M. Cooper also made important early discoveries along this old channel on Williams creek.

Meaghersville was established on the Fraction claim at the mouth of Lyons gulch in 1892 by T. F. Meagher, and although the town was never formally platted, quite a little trading center was maintained there for several years. H. M. Bryant erected the first store and Mr. Meagher also had a mercantile establishment. For a long time Meaghersville was the distributing point for the Williams creek mines, but it is now abandoned.

In 1892 a plan was proposed for the construction of a bedrock flume to furnish water for the whole district. The Swauk Bedrock Flume Company, composed of John A. Shoudy, Lewis H. Jenson and George O. Kelly, was organized with a capital of $500,000, but the financial stringency killed the project. Since the era of good times dawned in the late nineties, the Swauk has enjoyed steady prosperity and development, the consolidation of property and the exploitation of the quartz ledges being the principal features. In other sections of the state placer mining has quickly become secondary to quartz mining, but on the Swauk and its tributaries placer mining still holds first place. Quartz has only very recently begun to distract attention from the rich placers.

"The gold of the Swauk placers," says a reliable authority, "is believed to have come from Table mountain on the east and the Teanaway range on the west, and is found in the bars which cover old creek channels along the banks of Williams, Bowlder and Baker creeks, and of Swauk creek between Baker and First creeks, a distance of three miles north and south and about the same east and west. The country rock is sandstone and slate, with dikes of basalt and porphyry, the bedrock of the old channels being slate, with occasional dikes of sandstone and basalt, carrying from two to three per cent. of iron. One theory is that the gold in Williams creek and in the Swauk below that creek came from the summit of Table mountain, for on this level plateau there is said to be good pay dirt, and all its drainage runs into the Swauk, and all the valleys and gulches carry more or less placer gold. However, the fact that little gold has been found in the Swauk above Baker creek, and that all the coarse gold is found on the bedrock of old channels between this stream and First creek, leads to the conclusion that the gold deposits in the Swauk itself were not washed down by that stream, but by its tributaries, Baker, Williams and Bowlder creeks. The upper dirt carries only fine gold in most instances, and the miners do not take the trouble to attempt to save it, but in the old channel big nuggets are found. The character of the ground above Baker creek is also different, for it is all hill wash, while below that stream it is evidently channel wash, with boulders of a different character. The nuggets range in size from a pinhead up, the larger ones being generally rough, flat pieces about three-quarters of an inch thick, or in the shape of a network of wires, mashed together by the action of the water. They are found in the three or four feet of dirt next to the bedrock. The product of Williams creek is worth $1.50 to $2 an ounce more than that of Swauk and Baker creeks, as the latter carries considerable silver. The Swauk gold is worth $13.50 an ounce, and that of Williams creek $14.50 to $15.

"The good pay in coarse gold has led the miners to despise fine gold as not worth the trouble of saving, yet it has been proven by panning the dumps that they will pay well for working over, and that more careful and systematic work would bring good results. Experience has shown that the gold is finer toward the mouth of a stream, and thus it is that the nugget hunters have worked only the bars for two miles below Liberty. That there is good pay in the gravel beyond that point is proven by the fact that Chinamen who worked there many years ago earned from two to three dollars a day to the man, and that shafts sunk deeper than their workings showed dirt carrying twenty dollars to the pan."

Nuggets worth $1,120, $700, $450, $440, $320 and on down to $20 have been taken from the Swauk creek placers. The largest, which is known as the "Miser's Face," was taken out two years ago by the Elliott Mining Company, composed of Dr. J. C. McCauley and George B. Henton, while developing the Elliott claim. Benton Goodwin says that in the early days of the camp an unknown Chinaman stole a $700 nugget from his claim.

The first important step toward the consolidation of the placers and their working upon one systematic, general plan was taken in May, 1898, when The Cascade Mining Company, a syndicate of Wisconsin capitalists, acquired the following well-known properties: The Becker, Ritz, Eureka, Pat Hurley, Tenderfoot, Swauk and Williams High Bar placers, Black, Halvor Nelson, Gustaf Nilson, Mascotte, High Stump, Lillie, Klondyke, Sunnyside, Bloomer, Why Not, Gold Channel, Fremont, Discovery and Theresa. This syndicate now owns the present channel of Williams creek from its mouth to Lyons gulch and is now engaged in drifting and hydraulicking with a large force of men. Piping is going on in Deer gulch. Water is taken out of both Williams and Swauk creeks, between 5,000 and 10,000 inches being used by the pipes and an elevator. T. P. Carson is superintendent of this company. Mr. Meagher says that the Discovery and Theresa group of placers have produced at least $80,000.

Just above the Cascade Company's property on Williams creek lies the Bigney claim, now owned and operated by Miss Alice Barber, of Puget sound. This claim has produced, since its discovery in 1886, nearly $70,000. A force is drifting in on the old channel at this writing.

The Elliott claim, owned by Dr. J. C. McCauley, William Elliott and George B. Henton, is at the mouth of Bowlder creek. This is one of the richest claims in the district and has produced steadily for fifteen years. The Elliott Mining Company is now drifting.

On Bowlder creek the Bowlder Mining Company, of Philadelphia, Carl Ennakole manager, is operating. Their properties comprise the Sutherland, Little May, Bowlder, No. 1 and No. 2 and a few other claims, all placers, besides which they have five or six quartz claims, now being opened. These properties were opened about eight years ago by James Sutherland and Gus Siegel. In 1902 a $320 nugget was taken out by the Bowlder Company.

No values of importance have ever been taken out on Williams creek above the mouth of Bowlder creek, except by Samuel Pearson, who owns four claims. Edward Minkel and Louis Quitsch, the latter being one of the oldest pioneers in the camp, if not the oldest, own claims on upper Williams creek.

The Livingston claims, six miles above the mouth of Swauk creek, are the lowest claims mined on that stream. There are three in the group. Thence north to the district's limits is practically all controlled or owned by the Cascade Company. This corporation purchased the old Green Tree claims in 1898. Afterward it was found that the title to this valuable property was clouded and before the matter could be arranged the claims were filed upon by other parties, who, it is understood, still retain possession. Costly litigation is expected.

Hitherto the miners of the Swauk have shown a decided aversion to outside capital, which would work the placers on a large scale by modern methods and therefore more economically, but this spirit is being rapidly overcome and the Swauk placers bid fair to produce more lavishly in the future than in the past. The ground has been worked only enough to prove its value, only about one-tenth of the gravel having been worked. It is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the amount of gold that has been taken from the Swauk mines, but without a doubt seven figures would be required to express it. As time passes more and more attention will be paid to quartz prospecting and mining, for fabulously rich ledges must exist somewhere in the region to have thrown off such nuggets as have been found.

The principal quartz mining company operating in the district now is the Home Mining Company, of which Thomas Johnson, of Cle-Elum, is manager, and W. T. Burcham president. This company owns five claims on the north fork of the Teanaway river near its head, discovered as late as 1900, by N. S. Snow. The ores carry gold, with a small amount of copper and silver. The main ledge, which is fourteen and a half feet wide, is said to carry values of from $28 up. This ledge is now being thoroughly developed on the Surprise claim, where a Huntington mill was installed in 1902, though it was not operated until last fall. Besides this mill the company has two concentrators, a Standard and a Frue Vanner. In 1902, also, the company built sixteen miles of road, connecting the mine with Ryopatch settlement on the Teanaway.

KLICKITAT COUNTY.

Of the three counties of our group, Klickitat is, perhaps, the most picturesque. Its entire southern and southeastern boundary is formed by the majestic Columbia, which for the sublimity and grandeur of its scenery takes rank with the world's greatest rivers. Travelers have compared it very favorably with the Rhine, the Hudson and the St. Lawrence and some have even asserted its superiority to any of these in point of beauty and variety. "Nowhere," said a newspaper man of Fort Worth, Texas, who had gone wherever the people claimed they had something novel and pretty or grand and inspiring, "nowhere have I seen anything that is entitled to be placed in the same category with the Columbia river. It is a scene of beauty from the time one boards the steamer at The Dalles until he passes out over the bar to sea. It has all the elements of natural beauty. It brings one to pretty bits of scenery such as poets are prone to write of; and then perhaps the very next moment one turns about on the deck of the steamer to gaze at a mass of ragged, jagged rocks that rise thousands of feet in the air and impress one with majesty and enormity." It is doubtful if persons thoroughly familiar with the Columbia by reason of long residence in the vicinity fully appreciate the wondrous beauty of its sublime scenes or the effect they have upon the tourist who beholds them for the first time.

The Klickitat river, which belongs entirely to Klickitat county, is somewhat similar in the formation of its banks to the great stream of which it is a tributary. The construction of the Columbia River & Northern railroad has introduced it to the attention of the public and caused its charms to be quite widely advertised. It is a constantly changing source of interest to the passenger, at times flowing languidly, and again with the impetuosity of a mountain torrent, forming small cascades or sometimes miniature falls. Two and a half miles above Lylé it makes a very considerable leap, developing a water power which will not always go unharnessed. Just below the falls the railroad crosses the river for the first time. The spot is a very entrancing one. Far below the tracks is the rushing river, speeding between its rocky banks and over its rocky bed. Narrow and deep is the channel it has made for itself and long were the ages that the river was engaged in performing this mighty feat of erosion. As the train journeys inland numerous other scenes of rare beauty are presented to the gaze of the tourist, and the view is none the less picturesque when it has traversed the canyons of the Big Klickitat and Swale creek and has come up among the farms and homes of the famous Klickitat valley.

Indeed there is hardly a spot in the county that is lacking in scenic charms unless it be in the heart of the forest, where one's view is cut off by the tall conifers on every hand. The gently rolling wheat fields of the Bickleton country and the Klickitat valley everywhere present scenes that are pleasing and inspiring and he who will take the trouble to climb in midsummer to the peak of some lofty eminence will be rewarded by a wondrous birdseye view of wheat fields, rank and green, or ripening for the harvest, and the deep black of the summer fallowed lands, while in the distance are lofty hills and timber clad mountains and far beyond the whole, the still loftier crests of the famous ranges of Oregon and Washington with their renowned snow capped peaks. From some points on the Columbia river divide a view may be had of almost the entire fairyland of the Northwest, with Hood, St. Helens, Adams, Jefferson and the Three Sisters all visible, some of them hundreds of miles away.

The beauty of the scenery, the purity and wholesomeness of the water, the balmy, bracing air, the mildness of the summer sun, the abundance of the fish in the streams and the presence of game in the more remote regions have caused the Klickitat country to be visited by pleasure seekers annually for many years, and it is thought that the number of those who come here for their summer outing will increase rapidly as the varied charms of the region become more widely known. The popular pleasure resort of the county at present is Trout Lake, which is easily accessible by stage or private conveyance from White Salmon or Bingen on the Columbia river. At low water the lake covers only about sixty acres, though during the winter season it spreads over an entire section. "Its bottom is generally covered with mossy grass, affording good feed for fish, while rushes thickly border it. The stream above the lake is called the inlet and below it the outlet. Thousands of fish have been caught in the lake and streams each season, but the supply is seemingly undiminished; yet it has been thought necessary to replenish the waters, and in 1901 there were planted 15,000 trout, hatched at Leadville, Colorado, and in 1902, about 20,000, hatched from eggs obtained at the same place."

"Although people have been coming here for outings in summer since 1884," continues the writer from whom the foregoing quotation was made, "yet if the advantages were better known the number would be increased five or ten fold. In the season of 1884 only forty or fifty people came, while this season (1903) the number will reach 1,000. Tents of campers are scattered along the beautiful creek, and the one hotel (Guler's) has its accommodation taxed to the limit. So far campers have not been required to pay any rental and supplies are readily obtainable at cheap prices. Rates for room and board at the hotel are only six dollars per week. Trout are so plentiful that many complain of being surfeited with them. Deer, bears, grouse and pheasants are found in the woods which on all sides surround the clearings of the ranches, while the lake is a great resort for anglers. Boats are obtained at a nominal rental, and the sportsmen anchor out in the shallow water and generally make a fine catch. The inlet is a succession of pools varying from four to sixteen feet in depth and ten to twenty-five feet in width. The water is clear as crystal, and its limpid depths teem with trout. Overhanging branches from the cottonwoods give shade which always brings coolness. Trout creek is a brawling mountain stream, in which are many riffles and small waterfalls. It is somewhat wider but shallower than the inlet and everywhere yields fish."

On all sides of the cleared farms is dense timber and a few miles to the northward is that grand peak, Mount Adams, contributing immeasurably to the impressiveness of the scenery. Another attraction of the region is the series of wonderful caves, situated about seven miles from Guler's hotel; chiefest among which is the ice cave, so named from the fact that huge icicles are present within it at all seasons of the year. Entrance is gained to it through a hole about fifteen feet in diameter. Dense darkness within makes it necessary for explorers to provide themselves with torches and the light, reflected from the surfaces of thousands of icicles, gives the cave the appearance of a fairy, crystal palace. The cave is reported to be partitioned off into great chambers of which the walls and floor are of ice, the dome of ice, adorned everywhere with pendant icicles, and the pillars of ice.

But Klickitat county's scenery and its charm for the sportsman and the tourist are not the only things, nor yet the principal things, in its favor. While that which appeals to the aesthetic is always grateful to an intelligent people, the conditions of human existence are such as to render the wealth producing powers of the country paramount in importance and one of the first considerations of the homeseeker. Klickitat county is like most other portions of the state of Washington in having a great abundance and variety of only partially appropriated elements of wealth. Almost every acre has a value for the timber or bunch-grass that is upon it, or the hay, wheat or fruit it can produce. There is wealth everywhere and that which has been appropriated is slight compared with that which remains to be garnered when conditions are more favorable and the population is greater and time shall have done its perfect work. In the Trout Lake country already referred to Stoller and Stadelman and Pierson and other pioneers have proved that the soil is capable of producing hay and tame grass in abundance, also the hardy vegetables, wheat, oats, rye and other cereals and such fruits as apples, prunes, plums and cherries. As a result the country has become one of the leading dairy sections of the Klickitat; a number of capacious sawmills have been built and put in operation, a village has sprung up, and the wilderness has been converted into homes for a thrifty, progressive and prosperous people. A creamery and cheese factory lend encouragement to the dairy industry, making it abundantly remunerative.

Another little community in the western part of Klickitat county and not far from Trout lake is that occupying Camas Prairie and vicinity. The home of the people is a small, grass clad mountain valley and they get their mail at Glenwood postoffice, where are also an excellent general store and hotel. The principal occupation of the people is stock raising and dairying, the latter industry having had its inception in May, 1898, when the Camas Prairie Cheese Factory began operations. It was installed in a building put up by Oliver Kreps, though the machinery was furnished by T. S. Townsend, who was manager of the enterprise. The plant, aside from the building, has recently passed into the hands of Oscar Brown, by whom cheese will be manufactured for patrons at a given rate per pound. The plan of the former management was to buy the butter fat from the farmers at a price of two and a half cents per pound below Portland quotations, a plan which was not generally satisfactory.

A unique organization among the citizens of the valley is the Camas Prairie Pioneer Association, instituted September 27, 1900. The original roll had fifty-five names upon it. The constitution provides that a residence of twenty years in the valley shall entitle a person to membership, so the number of eligibles is constantly increasing. The persons who have completed their second decade in the settlement and who have availed themselves of the privilege of joining the society now aggregate eighty-four. The association holds a meeting for a barbecue and election of officers on the second Friday in June of each year, and its custom is to render a literary program and give a dance and supper annually on the first of January.

The two communities just referred to are in the western part of the county and notwithstanding their charms for the tourist are less widely known than many other portions. The regions which have made the county famous are the fruit and berry lands of the Columbia flats, the rich Klickitat valley, of which the Swale is a part, the Bickleton wheat country, the timber belt of the Simcoe mountains and the stock ranges of the uplands in all parts of the county. A splendid panoramic view of much of the wheat lands, the timber areas and the Columbia divide may be had from the top of one of the buttes near Goldendale. The scene is an entrancing one in both foreground and background, and will abundantly repay the labors of the ascent.

Without attempting a minute description of the different topographical divisions and communities, we shall review briefly the principal industries and products of the county taken as a whole. While Klickitat county is no longer exclusively a stock raising section as it was in the sixties, and while that industry can no longer claim predominance over all others as it did in the seventies and eighties, the livestock of the county are still an important source of revenue. Among those who still keep considerable herds of cattle the country assessor names the following: Franzen Brothers, 100 head; Leon W. Curtiss, 350; George Smith, 100; Coffield & Sons, 150; Wheelhouse Brothers, 150; Dan Jordan, 100; William Garner, 125; D. E. Witt, 150; Rudolph Hyting, 150; Richard Kelly, 175; Robert Barker, 75; O. P. Kreps, 100; George Kreps, 100; Claude Steak, 125; Chris. Christenson, 150; J. B. Clatterbos, 75; J. L. Henderson, 100; Collarey Brothers, 150; Christ. Ling, 75; Theodore Parsons, 80; Mason Brothers, 125; A. R. Burkett, 150; Coate Brothers, 150; W. F. Stadelman, 75; G. A. Snider, 75; George B. Lyle, 75; Henry Stacker, 150; John Wires, 50; John Ferry, 75; Jasper Gunning, 50; Fred Storer, 50; S. P. Kreps, 100; Leonard Stump, 100; J. H. Buschenschut, 50; H. Johnson, 50; H. C. Von Ladiges, 100; A. M. Balfour, 150; Herman Bertschi, 150; A. Margraff, 100; Albert Bertschi, 75; Nettie Barker, 50; Peter Staak, 75; Dymond Brothers, 150; Heury Restarf, 75; Nelson Anderson, 150; H. R. Murray, 50; Peter Conboy, 50; Peter Hault, 50; J. K. Lewis, 50; Jacob Powell, 50; Kuhnhausen Brothers, 100; N.

At the time that these figures were given out by the assessor he had not yet listed a number of bands in eastern Klickitat. The total number of cattle assessed in the county in 1903 was 13,002, and their value, $209,877.

The rearing of horses is another industry that has declined with the plowing up of the bunch grass. The number of these animals in the county in 1903 was 6,241, or 1,311 less than the year previous. The assessed valuation of horses in 1903 was, however, nearly $20,000 greater than in 1902, showing that the quality of the animals is increasing as their number diminishes.

Sheep raising is another industry that has of necessity contracted in magnitude since the early days, on account of the steady narrowing of the public range. It is, nevertheless, an important enterprise, the number of sheep assessed in the county in 1903 being 93,765. It is said that these animals produce from nine to eleven pounds of wool each, which sells at present for twelve and a half cents a pound and upward. The sheep are ranged on the Columbia slope and on the Sincove mountains and some of them, by permit, on the Ranier forest reserve. From 30,000 to 40,000 foreign sheep were ranged last year within the limits of Klickitat county. Among the principal sheep owners of the county, as shown by the assessor's rolls so far as completed, with the number of sheep assessed to each, are: F. B. Stimson, 275; S. W. Childers, 2,000; L. O'Brian, 1,100; H. W. Crawford, 800; J. C. Crawford, 800; V. T. Cook, 900; G. W. Smith, 1,900; Henry Brune, 1,000; William Brune, 1,400; E. H. Stegman, 1,600; Hanson Brothers, 1,800; A. L. Bunnell, 1,900; James Bunnell, 1,900; Montgomery & Wealthy, 1,400; Presby & Nelson, 460; Keel & Son, 1,100; John Jackel, 2,500; Phillips & Aldrich, 6,000; Clawson & Burgen, 1,200; A. O. White, 700; Chamberlain Brothers, 2,400; J. H. Smith & Short, 1,000; H. W. Wells, 3,000; Stone Brothers, 1,500; Fred Fuhrman, 1,300; G. H. Taylor, 1,800; Chancy Goodnoe, 630; Fred Dee, 3,500; W. O. Hays, 800; W. A. Imbrie, 250; Smith & Montgomery, 2,300; J. C. Cummings & Willard, 1,200; Sam Sinclair, 2,500; Hamilton Conlee, 1,800; Sinclair & McAlister, 1,500; H. B. Trask, 1,000; William Mulligan, 2,500; A. L. Harding, 1,100; Franzen Brothers, 3,000; Charles Powell, 2,500; Henry Matzen, 900; M. S. Leonardo, 1,500; Stegerman & Son, 3,000; John McCredy, 10,000; Mason Brothers, 1,500; Riley Kase, 1,000; Isaac Clark, 2,000; Murdock McDonald, 3,000; C. W. Peters, 800; Smyth & Son, 3,000; R. D. White, 2,000; Thomas White, 2,000; E. Lughinbull, 1,800; John Copenheifer, 1,700; F. P. Vincent, 2,000; John Rassmussen, 1,100; Joseph Gadeburg, 1,200; A. O. Woods, 1,200; and John Rosine, 1,200.

The raising of hogs has been a profitable industry in Klickitat as elsewhere in the west during the past few years, owing to the high price of pork; but for some reason the number of hogs in the county is not great. Those assessed in 1903 aggregated 4,049; in 1902, 6,479. Frank Aldrich, of the firm of Phillips & Aldrich, estimates that the farmers realized $40,000 from the sale of hogs in 1902 and $30,000 the year following.

The same gentleman says that an average crop of approximately 600,000 bushels of grain is raised annually in that part of Klickitat county which lies west of Rock creek, while that east produces perhaps half a million bushels. Most of this is wheat, though some barley is grown and a small quantity of oats. The wheat yields a very superior quality of flour. Three flour mills have been erected within the wheat area, two in Goldendale and one at Cleaveland. The Goldendale Milling Company's plant was built with the burr system in 1886, but later remodeled and fitted up with rollers by S. H. Jones and Joseph Nesbitt. At present it is owned by E. S. Hamlin and John Korkish, and operated by Phillips & Aldrich. It has a daily capacity of 100 barrels. It manufactures some 60,000 bushels of wheat into flour yearly, a third of which only is exported, the remainder being consumed in the county.

The Klickitat Roller mill, owned by C. M. Hess & Son, was built in 1878 and remodeled in 1892. Its daily capacity is about 70 barrels, its yearly output the product of some 70,000 bushels of wheat. It also grinds perhaps seventy-five tons of barley. The Cleaveland mill is of small capacity, but it is expected that a large mill will soon be erected and in operation at Bickleton for the handling of east side wheat. This industry has received a powerful impetus from the building of the railroad to Goldendale, and it is to be hoped that the beneficent influence of the road will soon reach to the Bickleton country and beyond. The first shipment of wheat by rail from Klickitat county was made, it is reported, on April 30, 1903.

An important industry, more in its possibilities than in its present development, is fruit raising. The Columbia valley, by reason of its low altitude and warm climate, is especially adapted to the production of the tender varieties, such as peaches, cherries, apricots, nectarines, grapes, etc., and these are being cultivated with profit. This part of the county is not so well adapted to apples as the more elevated section, owing to the presence of insect pests, but the foothills next to the timbered area, which in their wild state are covered with scrub oaks, are in every respect suited to the production of beautifully colored, finely flavored, long keeping apples. Such lands, when cleared and plowed, sell at $75 an acre.

Of the Columbia fruit basin, the State Bureau of Statistics, Agriculture and Irrigation, says:

"Southern Klickitat county has a number of very productive fruit belts, the oldest and best developed being the White Salmon valley. The conditions here are also at their best. Owing to their proximity to the great snow peaks, Adams and Hood, and the Cascade range, there is a much larger rainfall here than in the regions last described. (Yakima and the Wenatche valleys.) Most of the section has natural forests, which must be removed to fit the land for cultivation. White Salmon is opposite Hood River on the Oregon side and the two localities have established a wide reputation for their strawberries.* The Hood River berry was developed here. It is now known everywhere as the best shipping berry in existence. The output of the White Salmon valley cannot be accurately stated, as it is transported both by rail and boat and less regularly than in some other districts, but probably it might be safely estimated at about 100 carloads of fruit and vegetables annually. The Columbia district of Klickitat county has some of the oldest and finest peach orchards in the state. This is east of White Salmon and water is required by reason of the scanty rainfall. Blalock Island is on the Washington side of the Columbia and embraces about four thousand acres of land which it is the intention of its owner to devote entirely to fruit raising. A pumping station raises water from the river for irrigation and the entire island is rapidly being transformed into a scene of verdure. By reason of its location this island is the next thing to tropical, peach and apricot trees blossoming in February and strawberries being ripe in April. Tomatoes and green corn are ready for use by the first of July. For peaches, nectarines, grapes, berries, tomatoes, melons, sweet potatoes and peanuts, Blalock Island will, without question, become one of the most notable sections of the state."

As almost all the arable parts of Klickitat county are well adapted to the raising of fruits and vegetables, there is no doubt that "intensive" farming can be carried on successfully whenever the development of the county and surrounding country shall have progressed far enough to demand it. So far, artificial watering of crops has not gained much of a foothold in Klickitat, the number of irrigators in 1899 being only 151 and of irrigated acres only 1,235. However, the project of constructing canals on a large scale has been receiving considerable attention of late and the dawn of the era of mammoth irrigation enterprises may not be so far in the future as some suppose.

*As the White Salmon berries are usually shipped from Hood River, the latter community has been getting all the credit for the products of the fruit districts on both sides of the Columbia. Hood River has become famous for its products in all parts of the west, while White Salmon is little known. This is hardly fair, as the fruit and berry lands of the Washington side are fully equal in all respects to those on the Oregon shore.

The timber belt of Klickitat county is quite extensive, covering, according to report of Henry Gannett, of the United States Geological Survey, 840 square miles of territory. It extends from the western boundary of the county to Bickleton, a distance of about 110 miles, along the Simcoe range. Mr. Gannett's estimate of timber on this area is as follows: Red fir, 336,300,000 feet, board measure; pine, 321,100,000; hemlock, 71,400,000; larch, 10,500,000; oak, 3,700,000. It is claimed that the pine is of excellent quality and of two principal kinds, a white and a yellow of peculiar variety, commonly known as "Klickitat pine." Lumber from both is in demand in the east for finishing purposes and some is exported to the Orient. But the greater part of the lumber product is consumed at home and in the Yakima country, considerable being hauled to the latter section from Cedar valley via the Simcoe agency.

For many years the manufacture of this timber into lumber has been carried on, yet the area logged in 1900, according to government reports, was only twenty-three square miles. Daniel W. Pierce, manager of the White Pine Lumber Company, estimates that the present output of the county is 12,000,000 feet annually and that this output has been maintained for a number of years past. The assessor's rolls show the sawmills of Klickitat with their locations and capacity per diem to be as follows:

White Pine Lumber Company, Bowman creek, 35,000 feet; Sinclair & McCredy, Pine creek, 30,000; O. P. Shurtz & Sons, Mill creek, two mills, 25,000 each; George W. Vanhoy, Bowman creek, 15,000; Charles Woods, Bowman creek, 12,000; Gus Jacraux, Cedar valley, 10,000; D. D. Hopper, Cedar valley, 10,000; Enoch Hays, Cedar valley, 14,000; Polish Co-operative, Cedar valley, 15,000; Baldwin, Cedar valley, 10,000; L. E. Hottman, Gilmer, 15,000; F. C. Smith, Glenwood, 10,000; Joseph Silva, eight miles north of Lyle, 10,000; Pine Forest Lumber Company, five miles northwest of Goldendale, 15,000; Miller Brothers, twelve miles northeast of Goldendale, 10,000; Fox, ten miles northwest of Goldendale, 10,000; Dubrosky, twelve miles northwest of Goldendale, 10,000; Cameron, White Salmon, 15,000; Emmons & Emmons, Pine Flat, 15,000; Thomas Jenkins, Little Klickitat, 7,000; two in Trout Lake region, 10,000 each; shingle mills, J. H. Allen's, Little Klickitat, 10,000 shingles; Daniel E. Robinson's, Little Klickitat, 10,000; George W. Vanhoy's, Bowman creek, 10,000; M. S. Bishop's, Spring creek, 10,000; tie mill, one on White Salmon, 10,000 feet capacity; sash and door, planing, etc., White Pine Lumber Company's and Joseph Beckett's, both of Goldendale.

CHAPTER II.

EDUCATIONAL.

Could all the details of the establishment of the public schools in the three counties treated of in this work be fully recorded, many facts of great historical interest would doubtless be presented. The story would not be without its heroes—heroes, too, whose self-sacrifice and devotion were all the more commendable because they were certainly aware when they gave themselves to the work that their labors would never be fully appreciated and that no future historian would ever be able to place the crown of heroism upon their brows. No one of this group of counties is so old but that many persons now living remember the establishment of the first school districts, but to glean the facts concerning these from such an uncertain source as the memories of men would be an endless and unprofitable task. Of the struggles and persistent efforts which resulted in the formation of districts in pioneer neighborhoods, of the volunteer labor by which the first rude schoolhouses were built, of the difficulties encountered in raising sufficient funds to maintain the schools for a few months each year, and of the pioneer teachers who wrought without apparatus, without supplementary help of any kind and without adequate compensation, no full account can here be given. The official records of schools for the first years are not available, so that all articles touching this subject must of necessity be somewhat inaccurate and incomplete.

The American pioneer voluntarily foregoes many advantages which are enjoyed by those who remain always within the confines of established civilization, but the invariable tendency is to build up in the new country as quickly as possible institutions similar to those left behind. One of the dearest of these institutions to the American heart is the public school, and it is always one of the first to spring up in the heart of a newly appropriated wilderness.

The pioneer educational institution in Klickitat county was a private school organized about 1862 and maintained by subscriptions of settlers. Its first teacher was Nelson Whitney. From time to time thereafter short terms of school were taught in the valley, the money for their maintenance coming always as a free will offering from the pockets of the people. After the permanent organization of the county in 1867, John Burgen was appointed superintendent of schools and the county was divided into two districts, No. 1 at Rockland, and No. 2 on the Swale, south of Goldendale. John Jeffrey was the first teacher in the Rockland school and Mrs. Nelson Whitney, nee Chamberlin, the first in No. 2.

Of the first school in Yakima county, that taught in the loft of the Thorp home by Mrs. Luitia Haines, mention has been made heretofore. About 1864 a little log schoolhouse was built by F. M. Thorp and others on the Thorp place in the Moxee valley. Its first teacher was J. W. Grant, who received a salary of fifty dollars a month, paid perhaps entirely by Thorp. Mr. Grant taught school in the building for two or three winters, the school being maintained by voluntary subscriptions. The next schoolhouse was built on Charles A. Splawn's place, just northwest of Thorp's ranch. It was also a log building of small dimensions. Joseph Lawrence taught one term there, then the school was moved back to the Thorp place. A man named Lang taught this school during the winter of 1867-8, after which it was abandoned, the Thorps moving to the Kittitas valley and Lang accompanying them.

Judge John Nelson on the Naches also started a private school for the benefit of his family, in 1867-8.

Mrs. Martha (Goodwin) Beck, widow of the late John W. Beck, claims to have taught the first public school in what is now Yakima county, the date of this pioneer school being the fall of 1871. Mrs. Beck received a salary of $30 a month for her services, she to furnish and maintain a schoolroom at her own expense. She fitted up a large room in her own home near the site of Yakima City. Benches and desks, constructed of whipsawed lumber, were placed three rows deep on the sides of the room, leaving a place in the center for a stove and at one side of the room for entrance. Mr. Beck constructed a fairly serviceable blackboard out of whipsawed lumber, planed by hand, and a table and teacher's chair completed the furniture of the room. The difficulties Mrs. Beck experienced in teaching this school were similar to those of all pioneer teachers. Too large a variety of text books and a great difference in the ages and previous training of her pupils made the school very difficult to classify and to handle successfully.

The first school district in Kittitas valley was organized in 1870 by Charles P. Cooke, then county superintendent of Yakima county. Charles A. Splawn says the first schoolhouse in the valley was a rough log one which he himself constructed, and in which he taught the first term of school. Although the school was organized as a public one, the expenses of its maintenance were subscribed by the people in the district. The pupils, twelve in number, were mostly Indians. The second term was taught by Mrs. Yocum, the third by her daughter Louisa, afterwards Mrs. Edward Cooke, and the fourth by Mr. Splawn.

By 1872, there were seven districts in Klickitat, five in Yakima and two in Kittitas county. J. P. Marks, county superintendent for Yakima county, 1872-4, tells us that it was then customary to hold a teachers' examination whenever application was made, and that these examinations were on fundamentals only, such as orthography, reading, arithmetic, etc. They were confined to the commonest branches of learning and were usually very easy. Mr. Marks tells of examining one candidate while sitting on a fence. As the candidate rolled and smoked a cigarette during the examination and as he was known to be a rather idle fellow who usually sought the shade whenever hard work was to be done and as he was no scholar, he was not granted a certificate.

Owing to lack of early records it is impossible to trace the gradual development of the public school systems in the three counties of our group. The same causes which led to the establishment of the schools of which mention has been already made resulted in the institution of others as the country was settled. The first duplicate report now in the office of the superintendent of Klickitat county, that for the year 1879, shows 1,180 children of school age in the county, and the average attendance of children during the year 792. There were then twenty-nine school districts, fourteen of which were supplied with schoolhouses, and the average number of months taught during the year was four. No graded schools were reported.

The report for the year 1884 shows an increase of the juvenile population of the county to 1,699 and of school districts to thirty-six, thirty of which were provided with schoolhouses. Thirty-four teachers were employed in the public schools of the county, of whom seven held first grade certificates, fourteen second grade and thirteen third grade. The average salaries paid were, to males, $44 a month, to females, $31.50. The estimated value of schoolhouses and grounds was $8,945, of furniture $803, of apparatus $178. The average number of months schools were taught had increased to five and in every way a decided advance was shown since the submission of the report of 1879.

By 1880 the number of schools in Yakima and Kittitas counties, which were as yet united, had increased to twenty-three with an enrollment of 517 pupils. By 1883, when Kittitas county was created, this number had increased to thirty-two. That Yakima county soon made good the number lost by the curtailment of its territory is shown by the annual report of County Superintendent J. G. Lawrence for the year ending June 30, 1891, which shows 841 males and 764 females of school age in Yakima, of whom 577 males and 532 females were enrolled. The number of school districts was twenty-six and the average length of school terms was 4.25 months. There were twenty-five frame and three brick schoolhouses. Forty-four teachers were employed in the school at this time. Four state or territorial certificates were in force in the county, also eleven first grade, twenty-three second grade and nine third grade county certificates. The average salary of the teachers employed was $52.31 to males, and $44.10 to females. The expenditures during the year were $27,033.17, of which $9,979.83 went to teachers and $14,331.79 for sites, buildings and equipments.

A paper prepared by Prof. Lawrence and published in the Yakima Herald of March 7, 1895, describes well the rapid progress of the school interests in the county for the four years preceding its date:

"Perhaps," says Prof. Lawrence, "there is no more certain indication of real and substantial growth of a country than the advancement of its schools. A little over four years ago the school census of the county showed scarcely a thousand names. The last census shows nearly three thousand and more than half of this increase has been within the past two years.

"In June, 1890, there were six substantial school buildings in the county outside of North Yakima. Of those only three were new and two of the others had been so remodeled and improved that they would not be recognized as the same buildings. In June, 1890, five school buildings had been supplied with patent desks and there was little apparatus. School was held for about three months each year. This was not from lack of a spirit of enterprise, but the scattered population rendered it difficult to get enough children in one locality to hold a school. At that time there were but twenty-six districts in the county, but the stream of immigration has poured in steadily and the measure of the people we have been receiving is shown by the public spirit they have manifested.

"On January 1, 1895, the school districts of Yakima county numbered forty-six, and the number of teachers required was sixty. Besides there are two sectarian academies, both of which are well attended. In May, 1892, there were one schoolhouse and about forty-five children on the lands under the Sunnyside canal. To-day there are nine districts and more than 500 children there.

"In June, 1890, the valuation of schoolhouses and grounds in the county was about $20,000; to-day it is nearly $100,000. Twenty-five new schoolhouses of the most modern style of architecture have been built and school is conducted from five to nine months a year in each. No one need hesitate about locating in this county through fear of inferior educational advantages."

Meanwhile, the educational progress in the two other counties had been proportionately rapid. According to Superintendent J. H. Morgan's report for 1891, the school population of Kittitas county was 2,419, of whom 1,231 were males and 1,188 females. The number of these who availed themselves of school privileges was, males 909, females 861. The number of school districts in the county was thirty-six and of teachers employed forty-four. Of these four held state or territorial certificates, six first grade county certificates; twenty second grade, thirteen third grade and one was not reported. The average salary paid was, to males $57.90; to females, $49.70. The expenditures for the year were $69,924.52, of which the teachers received $14,595.31; the remainder was utilized for the purchase of new sites and the erection of new buildings. Two graded schools were maintained in the county.

The report of Superintendent N. B. Brooks of Klickitat county, for the year 1891, shows the number of children of school age in that county to have been 2,141, of whom 1,142 were males and 999 females. Of these 1,632 were enrolled. The number of school districts in the county had increased to 51; of teachers to 59, 30 of whom were males, and 29 females. The average wages paid were, to males $43.75 a month; to females $39.50.

Since 1891 there has been steady improvement in the public school system along many lines. A comparison of the foregoing reports with those submitted for the year 1903 will reveal much cause for congratulation. The report of Supt. S. A. Dickey of Yakima county for that year shows 6,566 children between the ages of five and twenty-one, of whom 5,331 availed themselves of school privileges, an increase in the enrollment of forty per cent. over the previous year. The average number of months school was maintained had increased to six and the total days attendance aggregated 496,916. The services of 131 teachers were required. Of these three held state or territorial diplomas, fourteen held elementary state normal diplomas, two advanced course diplomas, twenty-two first grade certificates, fifty-three second grade and twenty-two third grade. The standing of the remaining teachers is not shown in the reports. During the year ten new school buildings were erected, making in all sixty-five. The number of districts had increased to sixty-eight, twenty-one of which maintained graded schools and four maintained high schools. The total expenditures for school purposes during the year were $107,673.82; $45,008.38 for teachers' salaries; $16,596.72 for rents, fuel, repairs, etc.; $28,857.74 for buildings, sites, and equipment; balance on hand, $31,053.10. The assessed valuation of the districts was $7,444,588. The high schools are in North Yakima, Zillah, Sunnyside, and Prosser, and it is expected that high school grades will be introduced this year at Simcoe and Toppenish. North Yakima has a complete high school course; the others three year courses.

The educational progress in Kittitas has also been rapid, a fact which is shown by an examination of Superintendent W. A. Thomas's report for the year ending June 30, 1903. The population of the county of school age had increased to 3,120, of whom 2,975 were enrolled in the schools. The average number of months school was maintained had increased to 6.4. There were thirty-seven school districts, in which seventy-two teachers found employment. Of the teachers of the county, one had a state certificate, thirteen held life diplomas from the state normal school; seven elementary normal diplomas; seven advanced diplomas; fifteen first grade certificates; twenty-five second grade; and five third grade. The estimated value of all school property had increased to $100,065, and the total assessed valuation of the county property had grown to $4,201,108. The good work accomplished in the schools of Kittitas is no doubt in large measure due to the liberal salaries paid by the different districts. The average salary for the year 1902-3 was to males $71.13, to females $55.20. The ability of the districts to pay fair wages makes it possible for them to demand proficiency in their teachers, and it is highly probable that Kittitas county's force of educators will compare very favorably, both in educational qualifications and professional skill, with any similar body in the state. Advanced grade schools are maintained at Ellensburg, Roslyn and Cle-Elum. The Ellensburg school system includes eleven grades, and it is expected that a twelfth will be added next year; the Roslyn school has had ten grades for several years; Cle-Elum, which four years ago had only one teacher, this year employed six, and had nine grades; Thorp has an eight-grade school and two teachers.

Similar progress is noticeable in the educational system of Klickitat county. The report of Superintendent C. M. Ryman for the year ending August 6, 1903, shows 2,511 children of school age, 2,140 of whom are enrolled in the public schools. The average number of months for which school is held is comparatively low, being only 4.6, but we are informed that the report for the present year will show a marked improvement in this respect. If it is not possible to increase the length of term by any other method, some of the districts in the thinly settled regions will be consolidated. There are seventy school districts in the county, in which ninety-six teachers were employed last year. Of this number, six have first grade certificates; thirty-two second grade, and twelve third grade. There are five schools in the county of more than one department. Goldendale has two school buildings, one with six and one with eight rooms; Centerville, Bickleton, White Salmon, and Trout Lake each have two-room schoolhouses.

A fact of unusual interest with regard to the public school system of Klickitat is that it possesses as a source of revenue a special endowment known as the "Joshua Brown School Fund." This was founded by Joshua Brown, who at his death bequeathed all his property to the common schools of the county. Mr. Brown came to Klickitat in the later sixties and was engaged in the occupation of raising stock for a number of years. When finally he fell sick and became apprehensive that the time of his departure was at hand, he made a will leaving all his property as an endowment fund for the benefit of the public schools of the county in which, although he had no family of his own, he seemed to take a great interest. Joshua Brown died December 13, 1870, leaving his estate in the hands of John Burgen, then county superintendent of schools, for settlement. The property was appraised at $3,041.62, and brought at actual sale $3,287.11, of which, after paying the expenses of settling the estate, there remained as a permanent fund $2,554.93. As this form of benevolence had been without precedent in the history of the territory it was necessary, before the money could be used for the purpose to which it had been devoted by Mr. Brown, to pass an act of the legislature making special provision for its maintenance and use. This was not done until May, 1875. Since that time the fund has been preserved intact and yields a considerable revenue each year to the schools of the county.

That the people in the counties to which this work is devoted are interested in higher education is conclusively demonstrated by the fact that not one of the group is without an institution of higher learning. Chief in importance among these institutions is the state normal school located at Ellensburg in Kittitas county and maintained by the state. We are fortunate in having a historical sketch of this school, together with an outline of its plans of work prepared for us by Prof. J. H. Morgan and Principal W. E. Wilson.

THE ELLENSBURG STATE NORMAL.

The Washington State Normal school, located at Ellensburg, was established by an act of the first state legislature, approved by Governor Elisha P. Ferry, March 28, 1890. The directors of the Ellensburg public schools tendered the use of the assembly room and four large class rooms on the second floor of their building to the state to be used until a state building could be erected. This tender was accepted, and the legislature made a small appropriation for the maintenance of the school for a period of two years. The school was accordingly opened September 6, 1891.

Benjamin F. Barge, as principal, with W. N. Hull, Fannie C. Norris and Rose M. Rice, constituted the first faculty. One room on the ground floor of the public school building was used as a model room with Rose M. Rice in charge. This was filled with first and second grade children, and members of the senior class first observed and later taught under Miss Rice's supervision.

There were enrolled during the first year eighty-six students, and the following eleven of them were graduated at its close: Ella M. Buriff, U. Grant Edwards, N. L. Gardner, Susie Alice Gilbert, Lottie E. Milham, Anna Murray, Malcolm W. Odell, Lulu M. Oliver, Maud M. Painter, Laura M. Rudio and Esther M. Thomas. Most of these were graduates of high schools before entering the normal and some were teachers of experience.

The first two years of the school were sufficiently successful in the eyes of the legislature to justify an increased appropriation for its maintenance and an appropriation of $60,000 for the erection of a building.

At the beginning of the third year the faculty was increased to seven members and departments were established. The training school also was increased to four rooms, covering the first four grades. In the meanwhile the new building was in process of construction on a slightly block three hundred by four hundred feet in dimensions, donated by the city of Ellensburg.

At the beginning of the fourth year, P. A. Getz succeeded B. F. Barge as principal, the latter having resigned at the close of the third year, and the school was opened in its own building September 4, 1894, with a faculty of nine members. The training school was increased to six grades and the course of study was somewhat changed.

Prof. Barge had allowed the school the use of his private library during his principalship, and the trustees had in the meantime purchased as many books as the limited funds at their command would allow. They also purchased a portion of Prof. Barge's library upon his retirement, so that when the school was housed in its own quarters in September, 1894, it owned a small library.

During the next four years the school gradually developed, the course of study being made more professional and less academic, the equipment and facilities being increased, the library growing, etc.

In the summer of 1898 P. A. Getz resigned as principal and W. E. Wilson, of Providence, Rhode Island, was elected to succeed him. Since that time the development of the school has been continuous.

The building contains an assembly room, seated with opera chairs with book pocket attachments; a gymnasium, fairly well equipped; sixteen class rooms; four office rooms, two music rooms, ladies' dressing room furnished with individual lockers, and a similar one for the men.

An up-to-date kindergarten department is maintained and is to be more completely equipped.

The library contains from three thousand to four thousand volumes of carefully selected books, in addition to text books, reports and pamphlets. One hundred dollars are spent annually in supplying the reading room with the leading magazines, school publications and newspapers. Two pleasant rooms, well lighted and ventilated, connected by an archway, are used for the library and reading room. The text book room is also adjacent to the reading room.

The school is supplied with five pianos, one being in the assembly, one in the gymnasium, one in the music teacher's room, one in the practice room and one in the kindergarten.

The art department is furnished with twentieth century drawing tables and models for drawing and moulding.

The scope and advantages of the training school have kept pace with the development of the school in other respects. There are now nine grades maintained above the kindergarten. The class rooms are furnished with desks, except the kindergarten department and the first grade room. These are furnished with tables and chairs. The walls are in part decorated with the handwriting of the pupils. There is also a training school library.

The biological department occupies a recitation room and a laboratory accommodating about twenty students.

There is a convenient private laboratory provided with work table, re-agent cases, an excellent slide cabinet holding about one thousand slides, besides a large private collection of microscopic slides, chiefly of histological and cytological preparations; a considerable collection of private zoological material; a good supply of standard reagents; a first-class Bausch & Lomb continental microscope, with a camera lucida and all modern accessories.

The main laboratory provides desks of the most convenient make with double drawers and microscope cage for about twenty students. It is fitted up with convenient herbarium cases, convenient cases for zoological materials and other laboratory accessories; a sink, five glass aquaria and a vivarium with running water. The laboratory is provided with twenty-two very good compound microscopes and with the same number of dissecting microscopes, a large paraffine bath and a Minot microtome of the latest design. There are twelve convenient re-agent cases provided with bell jars besides the usual laboratory equipment of tools and glassware for each desk. There are also several museum cases with mounted botanical and zoological specimens.

The department of chemistry contains equipment for twenty-four individual laboratory sets, including apparatus and chemicals for a full course in inorganic chemistry. The laboratory has just been rearranged and equipped with a good fume cupboard.

The physics department contains a good set of apparatus for the illustration of all the experiments in the elementary text books. The equipment for the study of electricity is especially full. The school has not the most costly apparatus that could be obtained, but has enough to explain all the different topics studied.

For the geological, geographical and astronomical work there is a collection of rocks, minerals, and fossils, the large relief map of the United States by Edwin E. Howell on a section of a globe sixteen and a half feet in diameter and numerous, small relief maps, wall maps, globes, etc. For practical work in astronomy there was recently purchased of Bardou & Son, of Paris, a forty-eight-inch telescope with a three and a half-inch lens, the instrument being valued at $250. This and a set of astronomical charts aid greatly in the teaching of astronomy and astronomical geography.

The following is a list of the present faculty with a few remarks about the education and former experience of each:

William Edward Wilson, A. M., principal and professor of History and Philosophy of Education since 1898. A normal school teacher and principal of successful experience and a well known lecturer before teachers' institutes. Professor Wilson's biography will be found elsewhere in these pages.

John Henry Morgan, A. M., vice principal and Professor of Mathematics since 1893, a graduate of Furman University, South Carolina, ex-territorial superintendent of schools and a well known educator in the Northwest. Professor Morgan is also given representation in the biographical records of this work.

J. P. Munson, M. S., Ph. D., Department of Biology; B. S. Wisconsin University, 1887; Ph. B., Yale University; Ph. D. Chicago University. Professor Munson has held his present position since 1899.

Edwin James Saunders, B. A., Professor of Physics, Chemistry, Geology and Geography; graduated from Petrolia (Ontario) High school in 1889, from the Toronto Normal school in 1892, and Toronto University, 1896; has held present position since 1898.

Miss Ella Isabel Harris, Ph. D., Professor of English Language and Literature; B. A., Waynesburg College, Waynesburg, Pennsylvania, 1890; M. A. in 1892; fellow of Yale College, 1898-9; Ph. D. Yale, 1899; substitute in English department of Parker Collegiate Institute, 1899-1900; instructor in English department of Vassar College, 1900-01; head of English department of Washington State Normal school since February, 1902; published in 1900, "Two Tragedies of Seneca" (Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston), and in 1904, a translation of the Two Tragedies of Seneca (Oxford University Press, London).

Miss Jessie B. Wilcox, Professor of History, graduated from the Oswego State Normal school in 1898, since which time she has held her present position.

Miss Evelyn A. Thomas, Professor Physical Training and Reading, graduated with honors from the Emerson School of Oratory, 1901, and did post-graduate work, 1902-3.

Miss Mary A. Grupe, Principal Training Department, Professor of Pedagogy, graduated from Dayton, Washington, High school, the Oswego Normal Training school, New York; spent two and a half years at Chicago University; has been connected with Washington State Normal since 1897.

Miss Ruth C. Hoffman, Principal Primary Training department; graduated from the kindergarten and English courses of the Oswego State Normal; taught in the Detroit Home and Day school; has been principal of the primary training department of the Washington State Normal since 1902.

Miss Mary A. Proudfoot, Kindergarten Director and Art Instructor; graduated in 1893 from Monticello Seminary, Godfrey, Illinois, and from Chicago Kindergarten Institute in 1895; director of Longwood kindergarten, Chicago, 1895-98; post-graduate student at Pestalozzi-Froebel House, 1899-1901, since which time she has been with the Washington State Normal.

Miss Annette V. Bruce, Instructor in Vocal and Instrumental Music; graduated from piano department of South Dakota University under Franz Ballasegus of Berlin; studied under Bruno Zrontscher of Leipsic; taught two years in University of South Dakota, three years in the Oregon State Normal at Monmouth and has been in the Washington State Normal since 1897.

Bethesda I. Beals, Ph. B., Instructor in Latin and English; graduated with Ph. B. and Ped. B., University of Washington, 1898; student at graduate school of Yale College, 1898-1900; principal of Union High school, Sedro-Woolley, 1900-1901; instructor in English, University of Washington, 1901-1902; instructor in Latin, State Normal school since 1902.

Miss Margaret Steinbach, Assistant in Training School; graduated by Washington State Normal school in 1898; taught three years in North Yakima and three years in Everett public schools; came back to her alma mater in 1903.

Mrs. C. V. Warner acts as librarian, Miss Anna L. Frost as secretary and Mrs. E. J. Arthur as matron of the girls' dormitory. The present board of trustees is composed of Dr. J. A. Mahan, president, Ellensburg; Stanton Warburton, Tacoma, and H. M. Baldwin, also of Ellensburg; Prof. J. H. Morgan acts as secretary of the board.

A complete list of the teachers that have been employed by the Normal since its establishment is as follows:

Benjamin F. Barge, principal, 1891-1894; W. N. Hull, 1891-1893; Fannie C. Norris, 1891-1892; Rose M. Rice, model teacher, 1891-1892; Elvira Marquis, English, 1892-1897; Christiana S. Hyatt, principal training school, 1892-1894; J. A. Mahan, sciences, 1893-1897; J. H. Morgan, vice-principal, mathematics, 1893-; Elizabeth A. Cartwright, elocution, physical training, 1893-; Anna L. Steward, critic teacher, 1893-1898; C. H. Knapp, history and geography, 1893-1896; Fanny A. Ayres, music, 1894-1897; P. A. Getz, principal, 1894-1898; Ruth A. Turner, drawing, 1894-1897; George E. St. John, geography, history, pedagogics, 1896-1897; Annie Klingensmith, principal training school, 1896-1898; W. L. German, physical sciences, 1897-1898; Blanche Page, geography, history and pedagogics, 1897-1898; Lillian J. Throop, music, 1897-1898; Lucy J. Anderson, physical training, 1897-1899; Agnes Stowell, literature and rhetoric, 1897-1899; Mary A. Grupe, drawing, principal training school, 1897-; W. E. Wilson, principal, 1898-; E. J. Saunders, physical sciences, 1898-; Jessie B. Wilcox, geography, history, 1898-; Annette V. Bruce, music, 1898-; Colema Dickey, model teacher, 1898-1902; J. P. Munson, biology, sociology, 1899-; Laura G. Riddell, English, 1899-1902; Ida M. Remmele, physical training, reading, 1899-1903; Charlotte Sanford, assistant, 1899-1902; Lucinda P. Boggs, principal primary training school, 1901-1902; Mary A. Proudfoot, art, kindergarten, 1901-; Ella I. Harris, English language and literature, 1902-; Ruth C. Hoffman, principal primary training school, 1902-; Jennie H. Evans, music (substitute), 1902-1903; Bethesda I. Beals, Latin, English, 1902-; Margaret Steinbach, assistant, 1903-.

The following gentlemen have served on the board of trustees: W. R. Abrams, 1891-1893; Dr. T. J. Newland, 1891-1896; Fred W. Agatz, 1891-1893; Ralph Kauffman, 1893-1898; S. W. Barnes, 1893-1898; B. S. Scott, 186-1898; C. V. Warner, 1898-1904; Johnson Nickens, 1898-1900; Eugene Wager, 1898-1902; Stanton Warburton, 1900-; Dr. J. A. Mahan, 1902-; and H. M. Baldwin, 1904-.

WOODCOCK ACADEMY.

Woodcock Academy, situated in the Ahtanum valley, eight miles northwest of North Yakima, is an institution that, for a number of years, has been doing a good educational work in Yakima county. Following out the suggestion of Dr. G. H. Atkinson, the Yakima Association of Congregational churches, in the fall of 1889, appointed a committee to receive offers of money and land for an academy to be located within the bounds of the association at the point giving the most financial encouragement. Sixty acres of valuable land was offered by Fen B. Woodcock and wife and a subscription in money and labor amounting to about $3,000 accompanied the offer of the land. The association voted its hearty approval of the proposition to found such an institution and approved of its location in the Ahtanum valley. The following board of trustees was secured and incorporated in June, 1890, namely, Hon. R. K. Nichols, president; Rev. S. H. Cheadle, secretary; Fen B. Woodcock, treasurer; Rev. Samuel Greene, Rev. Frank T. McConaughy, Hon. D. W. Stair, John Cowan, Captain J. H. Thomas and Daniel W. Nelson, trustees. In 1891-92 a building was erected and furnished at a cost of $8,000, and, on September 26th, the school was opened. After the death of Fen B. Woodcock in January, 1897, the trustees voted to change the corporate name of the academy from Ahtanum Academy to Woodcock Academy. The academy has the support not only of the association but of the whole Congregational body in the state of Washington. Whitman College and the University of Washington admit graduates without examination and similar arrangements are to be made with other colleges.

ST. JOSEPH'S ACADEMY.

was established at Yakima City in November, 1875, by Sister Superior Blandina, one of the founders of the society of St. Joseph at Vancouver, Washington, in 1856. In 1885 the institution was removed to North Yakima, where the present commodious and substantial building was erected for the use of the academy. Last year 280 pupils were enrolled and the services of eight teachers were required besides those of the sister superior.

KLICKITAT ACADEMY,

located at Goldendale, the early history of which has been outlined elsewhere, is a well equipped and flourishing institution with an enrollment of about 160 students. The academy has been conducted for seven successive years and in its progress and achievements has abundantly justified the expectations of its founders and early supporters. Three courses of study are offered to students, the Classical, for students, who look forward to a professional life; the Normal, for teachers; and the Commercial, for those who expect to engage in business. The founders of the institution were fortunate in securing the services of Prof. Charles Timblin, who has been principal of the academy since its beginning and has earnestly labored for its success. Within the last few weeks it has been decided to change the academy into a public high school, and as such it will be opened in September, 1904. It will, however, be under the same efficient management as in former years and there is every reason to believe that the same high standard of work will be maintained.

ACADEMY EMMANUEL.

An attempt was made by Martinus O. Klitten and Mrs. Caroline Klitten to found a private academy at Kennewick to be known as the Academy Emmanuel. An excellent building, formerly erected in the town for other purposes, was purchased and remodeled for a school building. Arrangements were made to give general academic instruction, also preparatory and business courses. Before the school was ready to open, the building took fire and burned down, in December, 1903, preventing the plans from being carried out as intended. It is, however, said to be the purpose of those interested in the academy to rebuild at an early date and to open the school as soon as circumstances will permit.

The development of this section of the country has been so rapid as to have rendered it difficult, at times, for its educational systems to keep pace with its growth. The building of new railroads, the construction of irrigation systems and the development of mining districts have caused such large influxes of population to this group of counties that the resourcefulness of the people has been taxed to the utmost to keep pace with the growing demand for the extension of educational advantages. For this reason at times the most expedient rather than the best methods have been resorted to, and the results have not always been the best that could be hoped for, but the successes of the past give earnest of still greater ones to be achieved in the future, and we may rest assured that the sons and daughters of those who established the educational systems of this district will carry them on to full maturity of development.

CHAPTER III.

THE PRESS OF CENTRAL WASHINGTON.

Among the forces which figure in the upbuilding of a community none, perhaps, is more potential than a lively, up-to-date newspaper. The newspaper man, however, like others who labor for the general good of humanity, is usually but poorly compensated for his toil and effort, and unless he can find a large part of his reward in the consciousness of having been a blessing to his neighborhood, he must forever remain in a large measure unremunerated for his long hours of labor. Very many times the pioneer newspaper man is editor, compositor, reporter and pressman combined into one. His paper must appear each week, must appear on time, if the overburdened editor has to work twenty-four hours out of the day. He is expected to keep the advantages of his town and county constantly before the public eye. He must not fail to give praise where praise is due, and if he fearlessly administers rebuke, when rebuke is merited, he is liable to be confronted by an injured innocent armed with a horsewhip or a revolver.

Then, too, the editor and his work seem never to be fully appreciated. Even the most sagacious and public-spirited men of most communities fail to rightly estimate the value of a local newspaper as an agent in advancing the business interests of the town or city in which it is published and in augmenting its importance. In every town are to be found a very considerable proportion of business men who willingly give time and effort to the organization and maintenance of boards of trade and to other movements for the attraction of outside enterprise and capital. These men may subscribe liberally for the establishment of promising enterprises, though they contribute little or nothing to a means of greater importance and efficiency in the upbuilding of the town, the support of their local paper. Seldom does one find a newspaper that does not flatteringly portray the actual character of the town or community in which it is established. Into many a home does it each week come as a constant reminder of the town and its resources and many a sample copy finds its way into the far distant homes of persons contemplating a change of residence, doing what it can to attract immigration and outside capital. Persons desiring to learn of conditions in a new country almost invariably write to the newspaper editor, feeling certain to receive a reply, for the newspaper man is invariably public-spirited, though the advantages to be reaped by him from the development of the community are slight compared to those accruing to other business men.

We will not attempt the almost impossible task of exhaustively tracing the history of the numerous journals which have gone out of existence. The newspaper business is a precarious one everywhere and the mortality among aspiring local journals is always very great, and in this respect central Washington has been no exception. Of course some of the papers now deceased were started for special purposes and were not designed to outlive the cause which produced them, while others set out hopefully, expecting a long life, but sooner or later succumbed to the pressure of accumulating liabilities, to meet which the earnings of the business proved inadequate. The oldest newspaper in this group of counties still in existence is published in the oldest county, Klickitat. It is known as and is published in Goldendale every Wednesday, W. F. Byars, editor and manager. The Sentinel has the distinction of being the oldest newspaper in eastern Washington outside the Walla Walla country and perhaps the Colville section, being now in its twenty-seventh volume. The pioneer paper of this county was the Sun, published for about six months in 1877 and 1878 by a man who is said to have become demented. The plant passed into the hands of Joseph Verden, who sold it to C. K. and K. A. Seitz. They founded the Klickitat Sentinel, the first number appearing in May, 1878, since which time the Sentinel has appeared uninterruptedly. In January, 1881, Captain W. A. Wash, who had come to Goldendale in 1879 and had founded a private academy there, commenced the publication of a rival newspaper, the Goldendale Gazette. These papers alone occupied the local field during the early eighties.
